

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THE objects and scope of this work are explained in the Introductory Remarks which follow the Preface. Here it is desired to say a few words as to its history.

The book originated in a correspondence between the present writer, who was living at Palermo, and the late lamented ARTHUR BURNELL, of the Madras Civil Service, one of the most eminent of modern Indian scholars, who during the course of our communications was filling judicial offices in Southern and Western India, chiefly at Tanjore. We had then met only once—at the India Library; but he took a kindly interest in work that engaged me, and this led to an exchange of letters, which went on after his return to India. About 1872—I cannot find his earliest reference to the subject—he mentioned that he was contemplating a vocabulary of Anglo-Indian words, and had made some collections with that view. In reply it was stated that I likewise had long been taking note of such words, and that a notion similar to his own had also been at various times floating in my mind. And I proposed that we should combine our labours.

I had not, in fact, the linguistic acquirements needful for carrying through such an undertaking alone; but I had gone through an amount of reading that would largely help in instances and illustrations, and had also a strong natural taste for the kind of work.

This was the beginning of the portly double-columned edifice which now presents itself, the completion of which my friend has not lived to see. It was built up from our joint contributions till his untimely death in 1882, and since then almost daily additions have continued to be made to the material and to the structure. The subject, indeed, had taken so comprehensive a shape, that it was becoming difficult to say where its limits lay, or why it should ever end, except for the old reason which had received such poignant illustration: Ars longa, vita brevis. And so it has been wound up at last.

The work has been so long the companion of my horae subsivae, a thread running through the joys and sorrows of so many years, in the search for material first, and then in their handling and adjustment to the edifice—for their careful building up has been part of my duty from the beginning, and the whole of the matter has, I suppose, been written and re-written with my own hand at least four times—and the work has been one of so much interest to dear friends, of whom not a few are no longer here to welcome its appearance in print,* that I can hardly speak of the work except as mine.

Indeed, in bulk, nearly seven-eighths of it is so. But BURNELL contributed so much of value, so much of the essential; buying, in the search for illustration, numerous rare and costly books which were not otherwise accessible to him in India; setting me, by his example, on lines of research with which I should have else possibly remained unacquainted; writing letters with such fulness, frequency, and interest on the details of the work up to the summer of his death; that the measure of bulk in contribution is no gauge of his share in the result.

In the Life of Frank Buckland occur some words in relation to the church-bells of Ross, in Herefordshire, which may with some aptness illustrate our mutual relation to the book:

“It is said that the Man of Ross” (John Kyrle) “was present at the casting of the tenor, or great bell, and that he took with him an old silver tankard, which, after drinking claret and sherry, he threw in, and had cast with the bell.”

John Kyrle’s was the most precious part of the metal run into the mould, but the shaping of the mould and the larger part of the material came from the labour of another hand.

At an early period of our joint work BURNELL sent me a fragment of an essay on the words which formed our subject, intended as the basis of an introduction. As it stands, this is too incomplete to print, but I have made use of it to some extent, and given some extracts from it in the Introduction now put forward.†

* The dedication was sent for press on 6th January; on the 13th, G. U. Y. departed to his rest.

† Three of the mottoes that face the title were also sent by him.

The alternative title (Hobson-Jobson) which has been given to this book (not without the expressed assent of my collaborator), doubtless requires explanation.

A valued friend of the present writer many years ago published a book, of great acumen and considerable originality, which he called Three Essays, with no Author's name; and the resulting amount of circulation was such as might have been expected. It was remarked at the time by another friend that if the volume had been entitled A Book, by a Chap, it would have found a much larger body of readers. It seemed to me that A Glossary or A Vocabulary would be equally unattractive, and that it ought to have an alternative title at least a little more characteristic. If the reader will turn to Hobson-Jobson in the Glossary itself, he will find that phrase, though now rare and moribund, to be a typical and delightful example of that class of Anglo-Indian argot which consists of Oriental words highly assimilated, perhaps by vulgar lips, to the English vernacular; whilst it is the more fitted to our book, conveying, as it may, a veiled intimation of dual authorship. At any rate, there it is; and at this period my feeling has come to be that such is the book's name, nor could it well have been anything else.

In carrying through the work I have sought to supplement my own deficiencies from the most competent sources to which friendship afforded access. Sir JOSEPH HOOKER has most kindly examined almost every one of the proof-sheets for articles dealing with plants, correcting their errors, and enriching them with notes of his own. Another friend, Professor ROBERTSON SMITH, has done the like for words of Semitic origin, and to him I owe a variety of interesting references to the words treated of, in regard to their occurrence, under some cognate form, in the Scriptures. In the early part of the book the Rev. GEORGE MOULE (now Bishop of Ningpo), then in England, was good enough to revise those articles which bore on expressions used in China (not the first time that his generous aid had been given to work of mine). Among other friends who have been ever ready with assistance I may mention Dr. REINHOLD ROST, of the India Library; General ROBERT MACLAGAN, R.E.; Sir GEORGE BIRDWOOD, C.S.I.; Major-General R. H. KEATINGE, V.C., C.S.I.; Professor TERRIEN DE LA COUPERIE; and Mr. E. COLBORNE BABER, at present Consul-General in Corea. Dr. J. A. H. MURRAY, editor of the great English Dictionary, has also been most kind and courteous in the interchange of communications, a circumstance which will account for a few cases in which the passages cited in both works are the same.

My first endeavour in preparing this work has been to make it accurate; my next to make it—even though a Glossary—interesting. In a work intersecting so many fields, only a fool could imagine that he had not fallen into many mistakes; but these when pointed out, may be amended. If I have missed the other object of endeavour, I fear there is little to be hoped for from a second edition.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

THE twofold hope expressed in the closing sentence of Sir Henry Yule's Preface to the original Edition of this book has been amply justified. More recent research and discoveries have, of course, brought to light a good deal of information which was not accessible to him, but the general accuracy of what he wrote has never been seriously impugned—while those who have studied the pages of Hobson-Jobson have agreed in classing it as unique among similar works of reference, a volume which combines interest and amusement with instruction, in a manner which few other Dictionaries, if any, have done.

In this edition of the Anglo-Indian Glossary the original text has been reprinted, any additions made by the Editor being marked by square brackets. No attempt has been made to extend the vocabulary, the new articles being either such as were accidentally omitted in the first edition, or a few relating to words which seemed to correspond with the general scope of the work. Some new quotations have been added, and some of those included in the original edition have been verified and new references given. An index to words occurring in the quotations has been prepared.

I have to acknowledge valuable assistance from many friends. Mr. W. W. SKEAT has read the articles on Malay words, and has supplied many notes. Col. Sir R. TEMPLE has permitted me to use several of his papers on Anglo-Indian words, and has kindly sent me advance sheets of that portion of the Analytical Index to the first edition by Mr. C. PARTRIDGE, which is being published in the Indian Antiquary. Mr. R. S. WHITEWATER has given me numerous extracts from Portuguese writers; Mr. W. FOSTER, quotations from unpublished records in the India Office; Mr. W. IRVINE, notes on the later Moghul period. For valuable suggestions and information on disputed points I am indebted to Mr.

H. BEVERIDGE, Sir G. BIRDWOOD, Mr. J. BRANDT, Prof. E. G. BROWNE, Mr. M. LONGWORTH DAMES, Mr. G. R. DAMPIER, Mr. DONALD FERGUSON, Mr. C. T. GARDNER, the late Mr. E. J. W. GIBB, Prof. H. A. GILES, Dr. G. A. GRIERSON, Mr. T. M. HORSFALL, Mr. L. W. KING, Mr. J. L. MYRES, Mr. J. PLATT, jun., Prof. G. U. POPE, Mr. V. A. SMITH, Mr. C. H. TAWNEY, and Mr. J. WEIR.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

WORDS of Indian origin have been insinuating themselves into English ever since the end of the reign of Elizabeth and the beginning of that of King James, when such terms as calico, chintz, and gingham had already effected a lodgment in English warehouses and shops, and were lying in wait for entrance into English literature. Such outlandish guests grew more frequent 120 years ago, when, soon after the middle of last century, the numbers of Englishmen in the Indian services, civil and military, expanded with the great acquisition of dominion then made by the Company ; and we meet them in vastly greater abundance now.

Vocabularies of Indian and other foreign words, in use among Europeans in the East, have not unfrequently been printed. Several of the old travellers have attached the like to their narratives ; whilst the prolonged excitement created in England, a hundred years since, by the impeachment of Hastings and kindred matters, led to the publication of several glossaries as independent works ; and a good many others have been published in later days. At the end of this Introduction will be found a list of those which have come under my notice, and this might no doubt be largely added to.*

Of modern Glossaries, such as have been the result of serious labour, all, or nearly all, have been of a kind purely technical, intended to facilitate the comprehension of official documents by the explanation of terms used in the Revenue department, or in other branches of Indian administration. The most notable examples are (of brief and occasional character), the Glossary appended to the famous Fifth Report of the Select Committee of 1812, which was compiled by Sir Charles Wilkins ; and (of a far more vast and comprehensive sort), the late Professor Horace Hayman Wilson's Glossary of Judicial and Revenue Terms (4to, 1855) which leaves far behind every other attempt in that kind.†

That kind is, however, not ours, as a momentary comparison of a page or two in each Glossary would suffice to show. Our work indeed, in the long course of its compilation, has gone through some modification and enlargement of scope ; but hardly such as in any degree to affect its distinctive character, in which something has been aimed at differing in form from any work known to us. In its original conception it was intended to deal with all that class of words which, not in general pertaining to the technicalities of administration, recur constantly in the daily intercourse of the English in India, either as expressing ideas really not provided for by our mother-tongue, or supposed by the speakers (often quite erroneously) to express something not capable of just denotation by any English term. A certain percentage of such words have been carried to England by the constant reflux to their native shore of Anglo-Indians, who in some degree imbue with their notions and phraseology the circles from which they had gone forth. This effect has been still more promoted by the currency of a vast mass of literature, of all qualities and for all ages, dealing with Indian subjects; as well as by the regular appearance, for many years past, of Indian correspondence in English newspapers, insomuch that a considerable number of the expressions in question have not only become familiar in sound to English ears, but have become naturalised in the English language, and are meeting with ample recognition in the great Dictionary edited by Dr. Murray at Oxford.

* See Note A. at end of Introduction.

Of words that seem to have been admitted to full franchise, we may give examples in curry, toddy, veranda, cheroot, loot, nabob, teapoy, sepoy, cowry; and of others familiar enough to the English ear, though hardly yet received into citizenship, compound, batta, pucka, chowry, baboo, mahout, aya, nautch,* first-chop, competition-wallah, griffin, &c. But beyond these two classes of words, received within the last century or so, and gradually, into half or whole recognition, there are a good many others, long since fully assimilated, which really originated in the adoption of an Indian word, or the modification of an Indian proper name. Such words are the three quoted at the beginning of these remarks, chintz, calico, gingham, also shawl, bamboo, pagoda, typhoon, monsoon, mandarin, palanquin,† &c., and I may mention among further examples which may perhaps surprise my readers, the names of three of the boats of a man-of-war, viz. the cutter, the jolly-boat, and the dingy, as all (probably) of Indian origin.‡ Even phrases of a different character—slang indeed, but slang generally supposed to be vernacular as well as vulgar—e.g. ‘that is the cheese’;‡ or supposed to be vernacular and profane—e.g. ‘I don’t care a dam’‡—are in reality, however vulgar they may be, neither vernacular nor profane, but phrases turning upon innocent Hindustani vocables.

We proposed also, in our Glossary, to deal with a selection of those administrative terms, which are in such familiar and quotidian use as to form part of the common Anglo-Indian stock, and to trace all (so far as possible) to their true origin—a matter on which, in regard to many of the words, those who hourly use them are profoundly ignorant—and to follow them down by quotation from their earliest occurrence in literature.

A particular class of words are those indigenous terms which have been adopted in scientific nomenclature, botanical and zoological. On these Mr. Burnell remarks:—

“The first Indian botanical names were chiefly introduced by Garcia de Orta (Colloquios, printed at Goa in 1563), C. d’Acosta (Tractado, Burgos, 1578), and Rhede van Drakenstein (Hortus Malabaricus, Amsterdam, 1682). The Malay names were chiefly introduced by Rumphius (Herbarium Am-

* Nautch, it may be urged, is admitted to full franchise, being used by so eminent a writer as Mr. Browning. But the fact that his use is entirely misusæ, seems to justify the classification in the text (see GLOSS., s.v.). A like remark applies to compound. See for the tremendous fiasco made in its intended use by a most intelligent lady novelist, the last quotation s.v. in GLOSS.

† GLOSS., s.v. (note p. 659, col. a), contains quotations from the Vulgate of the passage in Canticles iii. 9, regarding King Solomon’s ferculum of Lebanon cedar. I have to thank an old friend for pointing out that the word palanquin has, in this passage, received solemn sanction by its introduction into the Revised Version.

boinense, completed before 1700, but not published till 1741). The Indian zoological terms were chiefly due to Dr. F. Buchanan, at the beginning of this century. Most of the N. Indian botanical words were introduced by Roxburgh."

It has been already intimated that, as the work proceeded, its scope expanded somewhat, and its authors found it expedient to introduce and trace many words of Asiatic origin which have disappeared from colloquial use, or perhaps never entered it, but which occur in old writers on the East. We also judged that it would add to the interest of the work, were we to investigate and make out the pedigree of a variety of geographical names which are or have been in familiar use in books on the Indies; take as examples Bombay, Madras, Guardafui, Malabar, Moluccas, Zanzibar, Pegu, Sumatra, Quilon, Seychelles, Ceylon, Jara, Ara, Japan, Deah, Punjab, &c., illustrating these, like every other class of word, by quotations given in chronological series.

Other divagations still from the original project will probably present themselves to those who turn over the pages of the work, in which we have been tempted to introduce sundry subjects which may seem hardly to come within the scope of such a glossary.

The words with which we have to do, taking the most extensive view of the field, are in fact organic remains deposited under the various currents of external influence that have washed the shores of India during twenty centuries and more. Rejecting that derivation of *elephant which would connect it with the Ophir trade of Solomon, we find no existing Western term traceable to that episode of communication; but the Greek and Roman commerce of the later centuries has left its fossils on both sides, testifying to the intercourse that once subsisted. Agallochum, carcharias, camphor, sandal, musk, nard, pepper (πέπερι, from Skt. pippali, 'long pepper'), ginger (ζιγγίβερις, see under Ginger), lac, costus, opal, malabathrum or folium indicum, beryl, sugar (σάκχαρ, from Skt. sarkara, Prak. sakkara), rice (ῥιζα, but see s.v.), were products or names, introduced from India to the Greek and Roman world, to which may be added a few terms of a different character, such as Βραχμᾶνες, Σαρμᾶνες (śramāṇas, or Buddhist ascetics), ξύλα σαγάνισα καὶ σασάμινα (logs of teak and shisham), the σάγγαπα (rafts) of the Periplus (see Jangar in GLOSS.); whilst dīndra, dramma, perhaps kastūra ('tin,' κάσσιτερος), kastūrī ('musk,' καστόριον, properly a different, though analogous animal product), and a very few more, have remained in Indian literature as testimony to the same intercourse.†

The trade and conquests of the Arabs both brought foreign words to India and picked up and carried westward, in form more or less corrupted, words of Indian origin, some of which have in one way or other become part of the heritage of all succeeding foreigners in the East. Among terms which are familiar items in the Anglo-Indian colloquial, but which had, in some shape or other, found their way at an early date into use on the shores of the Mediterranean, we may instance bazaar, cacoe, hamman, brinjoul, gingely, safflower, grab, maramut, deicaun (dogana, douane, &c.). Of others which are found in medieval literature, either West-Asiatic or European, and which still have a place in Anglo-Indian or English vocabulary, we may mention amber-gris, chank, junk, jogy, kincoh, kedgerer, fanam, calay, bankshall, mudiliar, tindal, cranny.

* See this word in GLOSS.

† See A. Weber, in Indian Antiquary, ii. 143 seqq. Most of the other Greek words, which he traces in Sanskrit, are astronomical terms derived from books.

The conquests and long occupation of the Portuguese, who by the year 1540 had established themselves in all the chief ports of India and the East, have, as might have been expected, bequeathed a large number of expressions to the European nations who have followed, and in great part superseded them. We find instances of missionaries and others at an early date who had acquired a knowledge of Indian languages, but these were exceptional.* The natives in contact with the Portuguese learned a bastard variety of the language of the latter, which became the lingua franca of intercourse, not only between European and native, but occasionally between Europeans of different nationalities. This Indo-Portuguese dialect continued to serve such purposes down to a late period in the last century, and has in some localities survived down nearly to our own day.† The number of people in India claiming to be of Portuguese descent was, in the 17th century, very large. Bernier, about 1660, says :—

“For he (Sultan Shujā’, Aurangzeb’s brother) much courted all those Portugal Fathers, Missionaries, that are in that Province. . . . And they were indeed capable to serve him, it being certain that in the kingdom of Bengale there are to be found not less than eight or nine thousand families of Franquis, Portugals, and these either Natives or Mesticks.” (Bernier, E.T. of 1684, p. 27.)

A. Hamilton, whose experience belonged chiefly to the end of the same century, though his book was not published till 1727, states :—

“Along the Sea-coasts the Portuguese have left a Vestige of their Language, tho’ much corrupted, yet it is the Language that most Europeans learn first to qualify them for a general Converse with one another, as well as with the different inhabitants of India.” (Preface, p. xii.)

Lockyer, who published 16 years before Hamilton, also says :—

“This they (the Portuguese) may justly boast, they have established a kind of Lingua Franca in all the Sea Ports in India, of great use to other Europeans, who would find it difficult in many places to be well understood without it.” (An Account of the Trade in India, 1711, p. 286.)

The early Lutheran Missionaries in the South, who went out for the S.P.C.K., all seem to have begun by learning Portuguese, and in their diaries speak of preaching occasionally in Portuguese.‡ The foundation of this lingua franca was the Portuguese of the beginning of the 16th century ; but it must have soon degenerated, for by the beginning of the last century it had lost nearly all trace of inflexion.§

It may from these remarks be easily understood how a large number of

* Varthema, at the very beginning of the 16th century, shows some acquaintance with Malayālam, and introduces pieces of conversation in that language. Before the end of the 16th century, printing had been introduced at other places besides Goa, and by the beginning of the 17th, several books in Indian languages had been printed at Goa, Cochin, and Ambalakkādu.—(A. B.)

† “At Point de Galle, in 1860, I found it in common use, and also, somewhat later, at Calcut.”—(A. B.)

‡ See “Notices of Madras and Cuddalore, &c., by the earlier Missionaries.” Longman, 1858, passim. See also Manual, &c. in BOOK-LIST, infra p. xxxix. Dr Carey, writing from Serampore as late as 1800, says that the children of Europeans by native women, whether children of English, French, Dutch, or Danes, were all called Portuguese. Smith’s Life of Carey, 152.

our Anglo-Indian colloquialisms, even if eventually traceable to native sources (and especially to Mahratti, or Dravidian originals) have come to us through a Portuguese medium, and often bear traces of having passed through that alembic. Not a few of these are familiar all over India, but the number current in the South is larger still. Some other Portuguese words also, though they can hardly be said to be recognized elements in the Anglo-Indian colloquial, have been introduced either into Hindustani generally, or into that shade of it which is in use among natives in habitual contact with Europeans. Of words which are essentially Portuguese, among Anglo-Indian colloquialisms, persistent or obsolete, we may quote guglet, gram, plantain, muster, caste, peon, padre, mistry or maistry, almira, api, cobra, mosquito, pomfret, cameez, palmyra, still in general use; picotta, rolan, piat, fogass, margosa, preserved in the South; batel, brab, foras, oart, rollard in Bombay; juss, compradore, linguist in the ports of China; and among more or less obsolete terms, Moor, for a Mahomedan, still surviving under the modified form Moorman, in Madras and Ceylon; Gentoo, still partially kept up, I believe, at Madras in application to the Telugu language, mustos, custos, bandeju ('a tray'), Kittysol ('an umbrella,' and this survived ten years ago in the Calcutta customs tariff), cuspadore ('a spittoon'), and corid ('a cubit or ell'). Words of native origin which bear the mark of having come to us through the Portuguese may be illustrated by such as palanquin, mandarin, mangelin (a small weight for pearls, &c.) monsoon, typhoon, mango, mangosteen, jack-fruit, butta, curry, chop, congee, coir, cutch, catamaran, cassamar, nabab, avadarat, betel, areca, benzoin, corge, copra.* A few examples of Hindustani words borrowed from the Portuguese are chābī ('a key'), bāda ('a port-manteau'), baltī ('a bucket'), martol ('a hammer'), tanliqa ('a towel,' Port. toalha), sābūn ('soap'), bāsan ('plate' from Port. lacin), lilām and nīlām ('an auction'), besides a number of terms used by Lascars on board ship.

The Dutch language has not contributed much to our store. The Dutch and the English arrived in the Indies contemporaneously, and though both inherited from the Portuguese, we have not been the heirs of the Dutch to any great extent, except in Ceylon, and even there Portuguese vocables had already occupied the colloquial ground. Petersilly, the word in general use in English families for 'parsley,' appears to be Dutch. An example from Ceylon that occurs to memory is burgher. The Dutch admitted people of mixt descent to a kind of citizenship, and these were distinguished from the pure natives by this term, which survives. Burgher in Bengal means 'a rafter,' properly bargā. A word spelt and pronounced in the same way had again a curiously different application in Madras, where it was a corruption of Vadagar, the name given to a tribe in the Nilgherry hills; to say nothing of Scotland, where Burghers and Antiburghers were Northern tribes (celati Gog et Magog!) which have long been condensed into elements of the United Presbyterian Church——!

Southern India has contributed to the Anglo-Indian stock words that are in hourly use also from Calcutta to Peshawar (some of them already noted under another cleavage), e.g. betel, mango, jack, cheroot, mongoose, pariah, bandicoot, teak, patcharee, chatty, catechu, top ('a grove'), curry, melligatauna, congee. Mamooty (a digging tool) is familiar in certain branches of the service, owing to its having long had a place in the nomenclature of Ordnance department. It is Tamil, manrètti, 'earth-cutter.' Of some very familiar words the origin remains either dubious, or matter only for conjecture. Examples are hackery (which arose apparently in Bombay), floric topaz.

* The nasal termination given to many Indian words, when adopted into European use, as in palanquin, mandarin, &c., must be attributed mainly to the Portuguese; but it cannot be entirely due to them. For we find the nasal termination of Arbān, in Mahomedan writers (see p. 3), and that of Cochin before the Portuguese time (see p. 225), whilst the conversion of Pāsci, in Sumatra, into Pācam, as the Portuguese call it, is already indicated in the Barna of Marco Polo.

As to Hindustani words adopted into the Anglo-Indian colloquial subject is almost too wide and loose for much remark. The habit of introducing these in English conversation and writing seems to prevail more largely in the Bengal Presidency than in any other, and especially more than in Madras, where the variety of different vernaculars in use has tended to make their acquisition by the English less universal than is in the north that of Hindustani, which is so much easier to learn, and also to make the use in former days of Portuguese, and now of English, by natives in contact with foreigners, and of French about the French settlements, very much more common than it is elsewhere. It is this bad habit of interlarding English with Hindustani phrases which has so often excited the just wrath of high English officials, not accustomed to it from their youth, and which (e.g.) drew forth in orders the humorous indignation of Sir Charles Napier.

One peculiarity in this use we may notice, which doubtless exemplifies some obscure linguistic law. Hindustani verbs which are thus used are habitually adopted into the quasi-English by converting the imperative into an infinitive. Thus to bunow, to lugow, to foozilow, to puckarow, to dumow, to sumjow, and so on, almost ad libitum, are formed as we have indicated.

It is curious to note that several of our most common adoptions are what may be most especially called the Oordoo (Urdū) or 'Camp' terms, being terms which the hosts of Chinghiz brought from the steppes of Eastern Asia—e.g. "The old Bukshee is an awful bahadur, but he is a first-rate bobachee." That is a sentence which might easily have been heard without remark at an Anglo-Indian mess-table thirty years ago, and might be heard still. Each of the outlandish terms embraced in it is of the depths of Mongolia in the thirteenth century. Chick (in the sense of cane-blind), daroga, oordoo itself, are other examples.

With the gradual assumption of administration after the middle of the nineteenth century, we adopted into partial colloquial use an immense number of new words, very many of them Persian or Arabic, belonging to technicalities of the military and other departments, and largely borrowed from our Mahomedan predecessors. Malay has contributed some of our most familiar words, owing partly to the ceaseless roving among the Eastern Archipelago of the Portuguese, through whom a part of these reached us, and partly to the fact that our early dealings and the sites of our early settlements were much more on the shores of the Eastern Archipelago than on the Continental India. Paddy, godown, compound, bankshall, a-muck, prow, and cadjan, junk, crease, are some of these. Several of them may be traced eventually to Indian origin, but it is not the less certain that we got them through the Malay, just as we have already indicated through the Portuguese.

We used to have a very few words in French form, such as mort-de-chien. But these two are really distortions of Portuguese.

A few words from China have settled on the Indian soil, and have been adopted by Anglo-India, but most of them are, I think other products which have been imported, such as loquat, leeches, chow-chow, cumquat, ginseng, &c. and (recently) jinrickshaw. For it must be noted that a considerable proportion of words much used in Chinese ports, and often ascribed to a Chinese origin, such as mandarin, junk, chop, pagoda, and (as I believe) typhoon (though this is a word much debated) are not Chinese at all, but words of Indian languages, or of Malay, which have been precipitated in Chinese waters during the flux and reflux of foreign trade.

Within my own earliest memory Spanish dollars were current in England at a specified value if they bore a stamp from the English mint. And similarly there are certain English words, often obsolete in Europe, which have received in India currency with a special stamp of meaning; whilst in other cases our language has formed in India new compounds applicable to new objects or shades of meaning. To one or other of these classes belong outcry, buggy, home, interloper, rogue (-elephant), tiffin, furlough, elk, roundel ('an umbrella,' obsolete), pish-pash, earth-oil, hog-deer, flying-fox, garden-house, musk-rat, nor-wester, iron-wood, long-drawers, barking-deer, custard-apple, grass-cutter, &c.

Other terms again are corruptions, more or less violent, of Oriental words and phrases which have put on an English mask. Such are maund, fool's rack, bearer, cot, boy, belly-band, Penang-lawyer, buckshaw, goddess (in the Malay region, representing Malay gūdīs, 'a maiden'), compound, college-pheasant, chopper, summer-head,* eagle-wood, jackass-copal, bobbery, Upper Roger (used in a correspondence given by Dalrymple, for Yuva Raja, the 'Young King,' or Caesar, of Indo-Chinese monarchies), Isle-o'-Bats (for Allahābād or Ilahābād as the natives often call it), hobson-jobson (see Preface), St. John's. The last proper name has at least three applications. There is "St. John's" in Guzerat, viz. Sanjdn, the landing-place of the Parsee immigration in the 8th century; there is another "St. John's" which is a corruption of Shang-Chuang, the name of that island off the southern coast of China whence the pure and ardent spirit of Francis Xavier fled to a better world: there is the group of "St. John's Islands" near Singapore, the chief of which is properly Pulo-Sikajang.

Yet again we have hybrids and corruptions of English fully accepted and adopted as Hindustani by the natives with whom we have to do, such as simkin, port-shrah, brandy-pānī, apīl, rasīd, tumlet (a tumbler), gilds ('glass,' for drinking vessels of sorts), rail-ghārī, lumber-dār, jail-khāna, bottle-khāna, buggy-khāna, 'et omne quod exit in' khāna, including gymkhāna, a very modern concoction (q.v.), and many more.

Taking our subject as a whole, however considerable the philological interest attaching to it, there is no disputing the truth of a remark with which Burnell's fragment of intended introduction concludes, and the application of which goes beyond the limit of those words which can be considered to have 'accrued as additions to the English language': "Considering the long intercourse with India, it is noteworthy that the additions which have thus accrued to the English language are, from the intellectual standpoint, of no intrinsic value. Nearly all the borrowed words refer to material facts, or to peculiar customs and stages of society, and, though a few of them furnish allusions to the penny-a-liner, they do not represent new ideas."

It is singular how often, in tracing to their origin words that come within the field of our research, we light upon an absolute dilemma, or bifurcation, i.e. on two or more sources of almost equal probability, and in themselves entirely diverse. In such cases it may be that, though the use of the word originated from one of the sources, the existence of the other has invigorated that use, and contributed to its eventual diffusion.

An example of this is boy, in its application to a native servant. To this application have contributed both the old English use of boy (analogous to that of puer, garçon, Knabe) for a camp-servant, or for a slave, and the Hindī-Marāṭhī bhoi, the name of a caste which has furnished palanquin and umbrella-bearers to many generations of Europeans in India. The habitual use of the word by the Portuguese, for many years before any English influence had touched the shores of India (e.g. bóy de sombrero, bóy d'agua, bóy de palanquy), shows that the earliest source was the Indian one.

Cooly, in its application to a carrier of burdens, or performer of inferior labour, is another example. The most probable origin of this is from a nomen gentile, that of the Kolis, a hill-people of Guzerat and the Western Ghats (compare the origin of slave). But the matter is perplexed by other facts which it is difficult to connect with this. Thus, in S. India, there is a Tamil word kūli, in common use, signifying 'daily hire or wages,' which H. H. Wilson regards as the true origin of the word which we call cooly. Again, both in Oriental and Osmali Turkish, kol is a word for a slave, and in the latter also there is kūleh, 'a male slave, a bondsman.' Khol is, in Tibetan also, a word for a slave or servant.

Tank, for a reservoir of water, we are apt to derive without hesitation, from stagnum, whence Sp. estanc, old Fr. estang, old Eng. and Lowland Scotch stank, Port. tanque, till we find that the word is regarded by the Portuguese themselves as Indian, and that there is excellent testimony to the existence of tānkā in Guzerat and Rajputana as an indigenous word, and with a plausible Sanskrit etymology.

Veranda has been confidently derived by some etymologists (among others by M. Defréméry, a distinguished scholar) from the Pers. barāmada, 'a projection,' a balcony; an etymology which is indeed hardly a possible one, but has been treated by Mr. Beames (who was evidently unacquainted with the facts that do make it hardly possible) with inappropriate derision, he giving as the unquestionable original a Sanskrit word barāṇḍa, 'a portico.' On this Burnell has observed that the word does not belong to the older Sanskrit, but is only found in comparatively modern works. Be that as it may, it need not be doubted that the word veranda, as used in England and France, was imported from India, i.e. from the usage of Europeans in India; but it is still more certain that either in the same sense, or in one closely allied, the word existed, quite independent of either Sanskrit or Persian, in Portuguese and Spanish, and the manner in which it occurs in the very earliest narrative of the Portuguese adventure to India (Roteiro do Viagem de Vasco da Gama, written by one of the expedition of 1497), confirmed by the Hispano-Arabic vocabulary of Pedro de Alcalá, printed in 1505, preclude the possibility of its having been adopted by the Portuguese from intercourse with India.

Mangrove, John Crawford tells us, has been adopted from the Malay manggi-manggi, applied to trees of the genus Rhizophora. But we learn from Oviedo, writing early in the sixteenth century, that the name mangle was applied by the natives of the Spanish Main to trees of the same, or a kindred genus, on the coast of S. America, which same mangle is undoubtedly the parent of the French manglier, and not improbably therefore of the English form mangrove.*

* Mr. Skeat's Etym. Dict. does not contain mangrove. [It will be found in his Concise Etymological Dict. ed. 1901.]

The words bearer, mate, cotical, partake of this kind of dual or doubtful ancestry, as may be seen by reference to them in the Glossary.

Before concluding, a word should be said as to the orthography used in the Glossary.

My intention has been to give the headings of the articles under the most usual of the popular, or, if you will, vulgar quasi-English spellings, whilst the Oriental words, from which the headings are derived or corrupted, are set forth under precise transliteration, the system of which is given in a following "Nota Bene." When using the words and names in the course of discursive elucidation, I fear I have not been consistent in sticking either always to the popular or always to the scientific spelling, and I can the better understand why a German critic of a book of mine, once upon a time, remarked upon the etwas schwankende yulische Orthographie. Indeed it is difficult, it never will for me be possible, in a book for popular use, to adhere to one system in this matter without the assumption of an ill-fitting and repulsive pedantry. Even in regard to Indian proper names, in which I once advocated adhesion, with a small number of exceptions, to scientific precision in transliteration, I feel much more inclined than formerly to sympathise with my friends Sir William Muir and General Maclagan, who have always favoured a large and liberal recognition of popular spelling in such names. And when I see other good and able friends following the scientific Will-o'-the-Wisp into such bogs as the use in English composition of sipāhī and jungāl, and verandah—nay, I have not only heard of bagī, but have recently seen it—instead of the good English words 'sepoy,' and 'jungle,' 'veranda,' and 'buggy,' my dread of pedantic usage becomes the greater.*

For the spelling of Mahratta, Mahratti, I suppose I must apologize (though something is to be said for it), Marāṭhī having established itself as orthodox.

NOTE A.—LIST OF GLOSSARIES.

1. Appended to the Roteiro de Vasco da Gama (see Book-list, p. xliii.) is a Vocabulary of 138 Portuguese words with their corresponding word in the Lingua de Calicut, i.e. in Malayālam.

2. Appended to the Voyages, &c., du Sieur de la Boullaye-le-Gouz (Book-list, p. xxxii.), is an Explication de plusieurs mots dont l'intelligence est nécessaire au Lecteur (pp. 27).

3. Fryer's New Account (Book-list, p. xxxiv.) has an Index Explanatory, including Proper Names, Names of Things, and Names of Persons (12 pages).

4. "Indian Vocabulary, to which is prefixed the Forms of Impeachment." 12mo. Stockdale, 1788 (pp. 136).

5. "An Indian Glossary, consisting of some Thousand Words and Forms commonly used in the East Indies . . . extremely serviceable in assisting Strangers to acquire with Ease and Quickness the Language of that Country." By T. T. Roberts, Lieut., &c., of the 3rd Regt. Native Infantry, E.I. Printed for Murray & Highley, Fleet Street, 1800. 12mo. (not paged).

6. "A Dictionary of Mohammedan Law, Bengal Revenue Terms, Shanscrit, Hindoo, and other words used in the East Indies, with full explanations, the leading word used in each article being printed in a new Nustaluk Type," &c. By S. Rousseau. London, 1802. 12mo. (pp. lxiv.-287). Also 2nd ed. 1805.

* 'Buggy' of course is not an Oriental word at all, except as adopted from us by Orientals. I call sepoy, jungle, and veranda, good English words; and so I regard them, just as good as alligator, or hurricane, or canoe, or Jerusalem artichoke, or cheroot. What would my friends think of spelling these in English books as alugarto, and kuracan, and canoa, and girasole, and shuruttu?

7. Glossary prepared for the Fifth Report (see Book-list, p. xxiv.), by Sir Charles Wilkins. This is dated in the preface "E. I. House, 1813." The copy used is a Parliamentary reprint, dated 1830.

8. The Folio compilation of the Bengal Regulations, published in 1828-29, contains in each volume a Glossarial Index, based chiefly upon the Glossary of Sir C. Wilkins.

9. In 1842 a preliminary "Glossary of Indian Terms," drawn up at the E. I. House by Prof. H. H. Wilson, 4to, unpublished, with a blank column on each page "for Suggestions and Additions," was circulated in India, intended as a basis for a comprehensive official Glossary. In this one the words are entered in the vulgar spelling, as they occur in the documents.

10. The only important result of the circulation of No. 9. was "Supplement to the Glossary of Indian Terms, A—J," By H. M. Elliot, Esq., Bengal Civil Service, Agra, 1845. 8vo. (pp. 447).

This remarkable work has been revised, re-arranged, and re-edited, with additions from Elliot's notes and other sources, by Mr. John Beames, of the Bengal Civil Service, under the title of "Memoirs on the Folk-Lore and Distribution of the Races of the North-Western Provinces of India, being an amplified edition of" (the above). 2 vols. 8vo. Trübner, 1869.

11. To "Morley's Analytical Digest of all the Reported Cases Decided in the Supreme Courts of Judicature in India," Vol. I., 1850, there is appended a "Glossary of Native Terms used in the Text" (pp. 20).

12. In "Wanderings of a Pilgrim" (Book-list, p. xlv.), there is a Glossary of some considerable extent (pp. 10 in double columns).

13. "The Zillah Dictionary in the Roman character, explaining the Various Words used in Business in India," By Charles Philip Brown, of the Madras Civil Service, &c. Madras, 1852. Imp. 8vo. (pp. 132).

14. "A Glossary of Judicial and Revenue Terms, and of Useful Words occurring in Official Documents, relating to the Administration of the Government of British India, from the Arabic, Persian, Hindustani, Sanskrit, Hindi, Bengali, Uriya, Marathi, Guzerathi, Telugu, Kannata, Tamil, Malayalam, and other languages." By H. H. Wilson, M.A., F.R.S., Boden Professor, &c. London, 1855. 4to. (pp. 585, besides copious Index).

15. A useful folio Glossary published by Government at Calcutta between 1860 and 1870, has been used by me and is quoted in the present GLOSS. as "Calcutta Glossary." But I have not been able to trace it again so as to give the proper title.

16. Ceylonese Vocabulary. See Book-list, p. xxxi.

17. "Kachakri Technicalities, or A Glossary of Terms, Rural, Official, and General, in Daily Use in the Courts of Law, and in Illustration of the Tenures, Customs, Arts, and Manufactures of Hindustan." By Patrick Carnegy, Commissioner of Rai Bareli, Oudh. 8vo. 2nd ed. Allahabad, 1877 (pp. 361).

18. "A Glossary of Indian Terms, containing many of the most important and Useful Indian Words Designed for the Use of Officers of Revenue and Judicial Practitioners and Students." Madras, 1877. 8vo. (pp. 255).

19. "A Glossary of Reference on Subjects connected with the Far East" (China and Japan). By H. A. Giles. Hong-Kong, 1878, 8vo. (pp. 182).

20. "Glossary of Vernacular Terms used in Official Correspondence in the Province of Assam." Shillong, 1879. (Pamphlet).

21. "Anglo-Indian Dictionary. Glossary of such Indian Terms used English, and such English or other Indian terms as have obtained special meanings in India." By George Eli Whitworth, Bombay Civil Service, London, 8vo, 1885 (pp. xv.—350).

NOTE B.—THE INDO-PORTUGUESE PATOIS

(BY A. C. BURNELL.)

The phonetic changes of Indo-Portuguese are few. F is substituted for p; whilst the accent varies according to the race of the speaker.* The vocabulary varies, as regards the introduction of native Indian terms, from the same cause.

Grammatically, this dialect is very singular :

1. All traces of genders are lost—e.g. we find sua poco (Mat. i. 21); sua nome (Id. i. 23); sua filho (Id. i. 25); sua filhos (Id. ii. 18); sua olhos (Acts, ix. 8); o dias (Mat. ii. 1); o rey (Id. ii. 2); kum co: tinha oucido (Id. ii. 18).

2. In the plural, s is rarely added; generally, the plural is the same as the singular.

3. The genitive is expressed by de, which is not combined with the article—e.g. conforme de o tempo (Mat. ii. 16); Depois de o morte (Id. ii. 19).

4. The definite article is unchanged in the plural: como o discipulos (Acts, ix. 19).

5. The pronouns still preserve some inflexions: Eu, mi; nos, nosotros; minha, nossos, &c.; tu, ti, vossos; tua, vossos; Elle, ella, ellotros, elles, sua, suas, lo, la.

6. The verb substantive is (present) tem, (past) timha, and (subjunctive) seja.

7. Verbs are conjugated by adding, for the present, te to the only form, viz., the infinitive, which loses its final r. Thus, te falla; te faze; te ri. The past is formed by adding ja—e.g. ja falla; ja olha. The future is formed by adding er. To express the infinitive, pr is added to the Portuguese infinitive deprived of its r.

* Unfortunately, the translators of the Indo-Portuguese New Testament have, as much as possible, preserved the Portuguese orthography.

NOTA BENE

IN THE USE OF THE GLOSSARY

(A.) The dates attached to quotations are not always quite consistent. In beginning the compilation, the dates given were those of the publication quoted; but as the date of the composition, or of the use of the word in question, is often much earlier than the date of the book or the edition in which it appears, the system was changed, and, where possible, the date given is that of the actual use of the word. But obvious doubts may sometimes rise on this point.

The dates of publication of the works quoted will be found, if required, from the Book List, following this Nota bene.

(B.) The system of transliteration used is substantially the same as the modification of Sir William Jones's which is used in Shakespear's Hindustani Dictionary. But—

The first of the three Sanskrit sibilants is expressed by (ś), and, as in Wilson's Glossary, no distinction is marked between the Indian aspirated and the Arabic gutturals kh, gh. Also, in words transliterated from Arabic the sixteenth letter of the Arabic alphabet is expressed by (ṭ). This is the same type that is used for the cerebral Indian (ṭ). Though it can hardly give rise to any confusion, it would have been better to mark them by different types. The fact is, that it was wished at first to make as few distinctions as possible for distinct types, and, having begun so, change could not be made.

The fourth letter of the Arabic alphabet is in several cases rendered by (th) when Arabic use is in question. In Hindustani it is pronounced as ṭh.

Also, in some of Mr. Burnell's transliterations from S. Indian he has used (R) for the peculiar Tamil hard (r), elsewhere (r), and in Tamil and Malayālam (k) when preceded and followed by a vowel.

- Correa, Gaspar, Lendas da India por. This most valuable, interesting, and detailed chronicle of Portuguese India was not published till in our own day it was issued by the Royal Academy of Lisbon—4 vols. in 7, in 4to, 1858-1864. The author went to India apparently with Jorge de Mello in 1512, and at an early date began to make notes for his history. The latest year that he mentions as having in it written a part of his history is 1561. The date of his death is not known.
- Most of the quotations from Correa, begun by Burnell and continued by me, are from this work published in Lisbon. Some are, however, taken from "The Three Voyages of Vasco da Gama and his Viceroyalty, from the Lendas da India of Gaspar Correa," by the Hon. E. J. Stanley (now Lord Stanley of Alderley). HAK. SOC. 1869.
- Coryat, T. Crudities. Reprinted from the ed. of 1611. 8 vols. 8vo. 1778.

- Couto, Diogo de. The edition of the Decadas da Asia quoted habitually is that of 1778 (see Barros). The 4th Decade (Couto's first) was published first in 1602, fol.; the 5th, 1612; the 6th, 1614; the 7th, 1616; the 8th, 1673; 5 books of the 12th, Paris, 1645. The 9th was first published in an edition issued in 1736; and 120 pp. of the 10th (when, is not clear). But the whole of the 10th, in ten books, is included in the publication of 1778. The 11th was lost, and a substitute by the editor is given in the ed. of 1778. Couto died 10th Dec. 1616.

Roger, Abraham. La Porte Ouverte . . . ou la Vraye Representation, &c. 41 Amsterdam, 1670.

The author was the first Chaplain Pulicat (1631-1641), and then for six years at Batavia (see Havart, p. 13). He returned home in 1647 and died 1649, at Gonda (Pref. p. 3). The book was brought out by his widow. That at the time that the English Chaplain Lord (q.v.) was studying the religion the Hindus at Surat, the Dutch Chaplain Roger was doing the same at Pulicat. The work of the last is in every way vastly superior to the former. was written at Batavia (see p. 117), and owing to its publication after his death there are a few misprints of Indi-words. The author had his information from a Brahman named Padmanaba (Padmanabha), who knew Dutch, and who gave him a Dutch translation of Bhartihari's Satakas, which is printed at the end of the book. It is the first translation from Sanskrit into an European language (A.B.).

Varthema, Lodovico di. The Travels of. Tr. from the orig. Italian Edition of 1510 by T. Winter Jones, F.S.A., and edited, &c., by George Percy Badger. Hak. Soc. 1863.

This is the edn. quoted with a few exceptions. Mr. Burnell writes :

"We have also used the second edition of the original (?) Italian text (12mo. Venice, 1517). A third edition appeared at Milan in 1523 (4to.), and a fourth at Venice in 1535. This interesting Journal was translated into English by Eden in 1576 (8vo.), and Purchas (ii. pp. 1483-1494) gives an abridgement; it is thus one of the most important sources."

Neither Mr. Winter Jones nor my friend Dr. Badger, in editing Varthema, seem to have been aware of the disparagement cast on his veracity in the famous Colloquios of Garcia de Orta (f. 29r. and f. 30). These affect his statements as to his voyages in the further East; and deny his ever having gone beyond Calicut and Cochin; a thesis which it would not be difficult to demonstrate out of his own narrative.

A GLOSSARY

OF

ABADA, s. A word used by old Spanish and Portuguese writers for a 'rhinoceros,' and adopted by some of the older English narrators. The origin is a little doubtful. If it were certain that the word did not occur earlier than c. 1530-40, it would most probably be an adoption from the Malay badak, 'a rhinoceros.' The word is not used by Barros where he would probably have used it if he knew it (see quotation under GANDA); and we have found no proof of its earlier existence in the language of the Peninsula; if this should be established we should have to seek an Arabic origin in such a word as abadat, ābid, fem. ābida, of which one meaning is (v. Lane) 'a wild animal.' The usual form abada is certainly somewhat in favour of such an origin. [Prof. Skeat believes that the a in abada and similar Malay words represents the Arabic article, which was commonly used in Spanish and Portuguese prefixed to Arabic and other native words.] It will be observed that more than one authority makes it the female rhinoceros, and in the dictionaries the word is feminine. But so Barros makes Ganda. [Mr W. W. Skeat suggests that the female was the more dangerous animal, or the one most frequently met with, as is certainly the case with the crocodile.]

1541.—"Mynes of Silver, Copper, Tin, and Lead, from whence great quantities thereof were continually drawn, which the Merchants carried away with Troops of Elephants and Rhinoceroses (em cafilas de elefantes e badas) for to transport into the Kingdoms of Sornau, by us called Siam, Passiloco, Sarady, (Savady in orig.), Tangu, Prom, Calaminham and other Provinces"—Pinto (orig. cap. xli.) in Cogan, p. 49. The kingdoms named here are Siam (see under SARNAU); Pitchalok and Sawatti (now 1544.—"Now the King of Tartary was fallen upon the city of Pequin with so great an army as the like had never been seen since Adam's time; in this army . . . were seven and twenty Kings, under whom marched 1,800,000 men . . . with four score thousand Rhinoceroses" (donde partirao com oitenta mil badas).—Ibid. (orig. cap. cvii.) in Cogan, p. 149.

1585.—"It is a very fertile country, with great stoare of prouisioun; there are elephants in great number and abadas, which is a kind of beast so big as two great buls, and hath vppon his snowt a little horne."—Mendoza, ii. 311.

1592.—"We sent commodities to their king to barter for Amber-greese, and for the hornes of Abath, whereof the Kinge onely hath the traffique in his hands. Now this Abath is a beast that hath one horne only in her forehead, and is thought to be the female Vnicorne, and is highly esteemed of all the Moores in those parts as a most soveraigne remedie against poyson."—Barker in Hakl. ii. 591.

1598.—"The Abada, or Rhinoceros, is not in India,* but onely in Bengala and Patane."—Linschoten, 88. [Hak. Soc. ii. 8.]

"Also in Bengala we found great numbers of the beasts which in Latin are called Rhinocerotus, and of the Portingalles Abadas."—Ibid. 28. [Hak. Soc. i. 96.]

c. 1606.—". . . ove portano le loro mercanzie per venderle a Cinesi, particolarmente . . . molti corni della Bada, detto Rinoceronte . . ."—Carletti, p. 199.

1611.—"Bada, a very fierce animal, called by another more common name Rhinoceros. In our days they brought to the King Philip II., now in glory, a Bada which was long at Madrid, having his horn sawn off, and being blinded, for fear he should hurt anybody. . . . 1726.—"Abada, s. f. La hembra del Rhincero."—Dicc. de la Lengua Castellana.

ABCÁREE, ABKÁRY. H. from P. āb-kārī, the business of distilling or selling (strong) waters, and hence elliptically the excise upon such business. This last is the sense in which it is used by Anglo-Indians. In every district of India the privilege of selling spirits is farmed to contractors, who manage the sale through retail shopkeepers. This is what is called the 'Abkary System.' The system has often been attacked as promoting tippling, and there are strong opinions on both sides. We subjoin an extract from a note on the subject, too long for insertion in integrity, by one of much experience in Bengal—Sir G. U. Yule.

June, 1879.—"Natives who have expressed their views are, I believe, unanimous in ascribing the increase of drinking to our Abkaree system. I don't say that this is putting the cart before the horse, but they are certainly too forgetful of the increased means in the country, which, if not the sole cause of the increased consumption, has been at least a very large factor in that result. I myself believe that more people drink now than formerly; but I knew one gentleman of very long and intimate knowledge of Bengal, who held that there was as much drinking in 1820 as in 1860."

In any case exaggeration is abundant. All Sanskrit literature shows that tippling is no absolute novelty in India. [See the article on "Spirituos Drinks in Ancient India," by Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 389 seqq.]

1790.—"In respect to Abkarry, or Tax on Spirituous Liquors, which is reserved for Taxation . . . it is evident that we cannot establish a general rate, since the quantity of consumption and expense of manufacture, etc., depends upon the vicinity of principal stations. For the amount leviable upon different Stills we must rely upon officers' local knowledge. The public, indeed, cannot suffer, since, if a few stills are suppressed by over-taxation, drunkenness is diminished."—In a Letter from Board of Revenue (Bengal) to Government, 12th July. MS. in India Office.

1797.—"The stamps are to have the words 'Abcaree licenses' inscribed in the Persian and Hindu languages and character."—Bengal Regulations, x. 33.

ABIHÓWA. Properly P. āb-o-hawā, 'water and air.' The usual Hindustani expression for 'climate.'

1786.—"What you write concerning the death of 500 Koorgs from small-pox is understood . . . they must be kept where the climate [āb-o-hawā] may best agree with them."—Tippoo's Letters, 269.

ABYSSINIA, n.p. This geographical name is a 16-century Latinisation of the Arabic Hubash, through the Portuguese Abex, bearing much the same pronunciation, minus the aspirate. [See HUBSHEE.]

1617.—"He sent mee to buy three Abassines."—Sir T. Roe, Travels, Hak. Soc. ii. 445.]

A. C. (i.e. 'after compliments'). In official versions of native letters these letters stand for the omitted formalities of native compliments.

ACHÁNOCK, n.p. H. Chānak and Achānak. The name by which the station of Barrackpore is commonly known to Sepoys and other natives. Some have connected the name with that of Job Charnock, or, as A. Hamilton calls him, Channock, the founder of Calcutta, and the quotations render this probable. Formerly the Cantonment of Secrole at Benares was also known, by a transfer no doubt, as Chhotā (or 'Little') Achānak. Two additional remarks may be relevantly made: (1) Job's name was certainly Charnock, and not Channock. It is distinctly signed "Job Charnock," in a MS. letter from the factory at "Chutta," i.e. Chuttanuttee (or Calcutta) in the India Office records, which I have seen. (2) The map in Valentijn which shows the village of Tajannok, though published in 1726, was apparently compiled by Van der Broecke in 1662. Hence it is not probable that it took its name from Job Charnock, who seems to have entered the Company's service in 1688. When he went to Bengal we have not been able to ascertain. [See Diary of Hedges, edited by Sir H. Yule, ii., xcix. In some "Documentary Memoirs of Job Charnock," which form part of vol. lxxv. (1888) of the Hakluyt Soc., Job is said to have "arrived in India in 1655 or 1656."]

1677.—"The ship Falcons to go up the river to Hughly, or at least to Chanook."—Court's Letter to Ft. St. Geo. of 12th December. In Notes and Extracts, Madras, 1871, No. 1., p. 21; see also p. 23.

1711.—"Chanook-Reach hath two shoals, the upper one in Chanook, and the lower one on the opposite side . . . you must from below Dagon as aforesaid, keep the starboard shore aboard until you come up with a Lime-Tree . . . and then steer over with Chanook Trees and house between the two shoals, until you come mid-river, but no nearer the house."—The English Pilot, 55.

1726.—"t stedeken Tujanook."—Val-eutijn, v. 163. In Val's map of Bengal also, we find opposite to Oepli (Hoogly), Tujanook, and then Collocatie, and Calcutta.

1758.—"Notwithstanding these solemn assurances from the Dutch it was judged expedient to send a detachment of troops . . . to take possession of Tanna Fort and Charnock's Battery opposite to it."—Narrative of Dutch attempt in the Hoogly, in Malcolm's Life of Clive, ii. 76.

1810.—"The old village of Achanook stood on the ground which the post of Barrackpore now occupies."—M. Graham, 142.

1848.—"From an oral tradition still prevalent among the natives at Barrackpore . . . we learn that Mr. Charnock built a bungalow there, and a flourishing bazar arose under his patronage, before the settlement of Calcutta had been determined on. Barrackpore is at this day best known to the natives by the name of Chanook."—The Bengal Obituary, Calc. p. 2.

ACHAR, s. P. achār, Malay achār, adopted in nearly all the vernaculars of India for acid and salt relishes. By Europeans it is used as the equivalent of 'pickles,' and is applied to all the stores of Croese and Blackwell in that kind. We have adopted the word through the Portuguese; but it is not impossible that Western Asiatics got it originally from the Latin acetaria.—(See Plin. Hist. Nat. xix. 19).

1563.—"And they prepare a conserve of it (Anacardium) with salt, and when it is green (and this they call Achar), and this is sold in the market just as olives are with us."—Garcia, f. 17.

1596.—Linshoten in the Dutch gives the word correctly, but in the English version (Hak. Soc. ii. 28) it is printed Maehar.

[1612.—"Achar none to be had except one jar."—Danvers, Letters, i. 230.]

1616.—"Our juribasse's (Juribasse) wife came and brought me a small jar of Achar for a present, desyring me to exkeuse her husband in that he abosted hymselfe to take phisik."—Cocks, i. 135.

1623.—"And all these preserved in a way that is really very good, which they call acchar."—P. della Valle, ii. 708. [Hak. Soc. ii. 327.]

1687.—"Achar I presume signifies sauce. They make in the East Indies, especially at Siam and Pegu, several sorts of Achar, as of the young tops of Bamboos, &c. Bambo-Achar and Mango-Achar are most used."—Dampier, i. 301.

1727.—"And the Soldiery, Fishers, Peasants, and Handicrafts (of Goa) feed on a little Rice boiled in Water, with a little bit of Salt Fish, or Achaar, which is pickled Fruits or Roots."—A. Hamilton, i. 252. [And see under KEDGELEE.]

1783.—We learn from Forrest that Khon, salted for sea-use against scurvy, were used by the Chulias (Choolia), and were called alohar (Voyage to Merqui, 40). Thus the word passed to Java, as in next quotation:

1768-71.—"When green it (the mango) is made into atchar; for this the kernel is taken out, and the space filled in with ginger, pimento, and other spicy ingredients, after which it is pickled in vinegar."—Storonus, i. 237.

ACHEEN, n.p. (P. Āchin [Tam. Atti, Malay Achak, Achik] 'a wood-leech'). The name applied by us to the State and town at the N.W. angle of Sumatra, which was long, and especially during the 16th and 17th centuries, the greatest native power on that Island. The proper Malay name of the place is Acheh. The Portuguese generally called it Achem (or frequently by the adhesion of the genitive preposition, Dachem, so that Sir F. Greville below makes two kingdoms), but our Acheen seems to have been derived from mariners of the P. Gulf or W. India, for we find the name so given (Āchin) in the Āin-i-Akbari, and in the Geog. Tables of Sādik Isfahāni. This form may have been suggested by a jingling analogy, such as Orientalis Love, present footing. (On the original history and constitution of the Courts see Fifth Report, 1812, p. 6.)

What follows applies only to the Bengal Presidency, and to the administration of justice under the Company's Courts beyond the limits of the Presidency town. Brief particulars regarding the history of the Supreme Courts and those Courts which preceded them will be found under SUPREME COURT.

The grant, by Shāh 'Ālam, in 1765, of the Dewanny of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa to the Company, transferred all power, civil and military, in those provinces, to that body. But no immediate attempt was made to undertake the direct detailed administration of either revenue or justice by the agency of the European servants of the Company. Such superintendence, indeed, of the administration was maintained in the prior acquisitions of the Company—viz., in the Zemindary of Calcutta, in the Twenty-four Pergunnas, and in the Chucklas (Chucklah) or districts of Burdwan, Midnapoor, and Chittagong, which had been transferred by the Nawab, Kāsim 'Ali Khān, in 1760; but in the rest of the territory it was confined to the agency of a Resident at the Moorshedabad Durbar, and of a 'Chief' at Patna. Justice was administered by the Mohammedan courts under the native officials of the Dewanny.

In 1770, European officers were appointed in the districts, under the name of Supervisors, with powers of control over the natives employed in the collection of the Revenue and the administration of justice, whilst local councils, with superior authority in all branches, were established at Moorshedabad and Patna. It was not till two years later that, under express orders from the Court of Directors, the effective administration of the provinces was undertaken by the agency of the Company's covenanted servants. At this time (1772) Courts of Civil Justice (Mofussil Dewanny Adawlut) were established in each of the Districts then recognised. There were also District Criminal Courts (Foujdary Adawlut) held by Cazee or Mufty under the superintendence, like the Civil Court, of the Collectors, as the Supervisors were now styled; whilst Superior Courts (Sudder Dewanny, Sudder Nizamut Adawlut) were established at the Presidency, to be under the superintendence of three or four members of the Council of Fort William.

In 1774 the Collectors were recalled, and native 'Amils (Aumil) appointed in their stead. Provincial Councils were set up for the divisions of Calcutta, Burdwan, Dacca, Moorshedabad, Dinagepore, and Patna, in whose hands the superintendence, both of revenue collection and of the administration of civil justice, was vested, but exercised by the members in rotation.

The state of things that existed under this system was discreditable. As Courts of Justice the provincial Councils were only "colourable imitations of courts, which had abdicated their functions in favour of their own subordinate (native) officers, and though their decisions were nominally subject to the Governor-General in Council, the Appellate Court was even a more shadowy body than the Courts of first instance. The Court never sat at all, though there are some traces of its having at one time decided appeals on the report of the head of the Khalsa, or native exchequer, just as the Provincial Council decided them on the report of the Cazis and Muftis." *

In 1770 the Government resolved that Civil Courts, independent of the Provincial Councils, should be established in the six divisions named above,† each under a civilian judge with the title of Superintendent of the Dewanny Adawlut; whilst to the Councils should still pertain the trial of causes relating to the public revenue, to the demands of zemindars upon their tenants, and to boundary questions. The appeal from the District Courts still lay to the Governor-General and his Council, as forming the Court of Sudder Dewanny; but that this might be real, a judge was appointed its head in the person of Sir Elijah Impey, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, an appointment which became famous. For it was represented as a transaction intended to compromise the acute dissensions which had been going on between that Court and the Bengal Government, and in fact as a bribe to Impey. It led, by an address from the House of Commons, to the recall of Impey, and constituted one of the charges in the abortive impeachment of that personage. Hence his charge of the Sudder Dewanny ceased in November, 1782, and it was resumed in form by the Governor-General and Council.

* Sir James Stephen, in Nuncomar and Impey, ii. 221.

† These six were increased in 1781 to eight.

In 1787, the first year of Lord Cornwallis's government, in consequence of instructions from the Court of Directors, it was resolved that, with an exception as to the Courts at Moorshedabad, Patna, and Dacca, which were to be maintained independently, the office of judge in the Mofussil Courts was to be attached to that of the collection of the revenue; in fact, the offices of Judge and Collector, which had been divorced since 1774, were to be reunited. The duties of Magistrate and Judge became mere appendages to that of Collector; the administration of justice became a subordinate function; and in fact all Regulations respecting that administration were passed in the Revenue Department of the Government.

Up to 1790 the criminal judiciary had remained in the hands of the native courts. But this was now altered; four Courts of Circuit were created, each to be superintended by two civil servants as judges; the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut at the Presidency being presided over by the Governor-General and the members of Council.

In 1793 the constant succession of revolutions in the judicial system came to something like a pause, with the entire reformation which was enacted by the Regulations of that year. The Collection of Revenue was now entirely separated from the administration of justice; Zillah Courts under European judges were established (Reg. iii.) in each of 23 Districts and 3 cities, in Bengal, Behar, and Orissa; whilst Provincial Courts of Appeal, each consisting of three judges (Reg. v.), were established at Moorshedabad, Patna, Dacca, and Calcutta. From these Courts, under certain conditions, further appeal lay to the Sudder Dewanny Adawluts at the Presidency.

As regarded criminal jurisdiction, the judges of the Provincial Courts were also (Reg. ix., 1793) constituted Circuit Courts, liable to review by the Sudder Nizamut. Strange to say, the impracticable idea of placing the duties of both of the higher Courts, civil and criminal, on the shoulders of the executive Government was still maintained, and the Governor-General and his Council were the constituted heads of the Sudder Dewanny and Sudder Nizamut. This of course continued as unworkable as it had been; and in Lord Wellesley's time, eight years later, the two Sudder Adawluts were reconstituted, with three regular judges to each, though it was still ruled (Reg. ii., 1801) that the chief judge in each Court was to be a member of the Supreme Council, not being either the Governor-General or the Commander-in-Chief. This rule was rescinded by Reg. x. of 1805.

The number of Provincial and Zillah Courts was augmented in after years with the extension of territory, and additional Sudder Courts, for the service of the Upper Provinces, were established at Allahabad in 1831 (Reg. vi.), a step which may be regarded as the inception of the separation of the N.W. Provinces into a distinct Lieutenant-Governorship, carried out five years later. But no change that can be considered at all organic occurred again in the judiciary system till 1862; for we can hardly consider as such the abolition of the Courts of Circuit in 1829 (Reg. i.), and that of the Provincial Courts of Appeal initiated by a section in Reg. v. of 1831, and completed in 1833.

1822.—“This refers to a traditional story which Mr. Elphinstone used to relate During the progress of our conquests in the North-West many of the inhabitants were encountered flying from the newly-occupied territory. ‘Is Lord Lake coming?’ was the enquiry. ‘No,’ was the reply, ‘the Adawlut is coming.’”—Life of Elphinstone, ii. 131.

1826.—“The adawlut or Court-house was close by.”—Pandurang Hari, 271 [ed. 1873, ii. 90].

ADIGAR, s. Properly adhikār, from Skt. adhikārin, one possessing authority; Tam. adhikāri, or -kāren. The title was formerly in use in South India, and perhaps still in the native States of Malabar, for a rural headman. [See quot. from Logan below.] It was also in Ceylon (adikdrama, adikdr) the title of chief minister of the Candyen Kings. See PATEL.

1544.—“Fac te comem et humanum cum isti Genti praebeas, tum praesertim magistratibus eorum et Praefectis Pagorum, quos Adigares vocant.”—S. Fr. Xav. Epist. 113.

Thomè, doue stanno i Portoghesi, un miglio, sotto la scorta d'un loro Capitano, che risiede in detta città . . . et questo Capitano è da loro chiamato Adicario.*”—Balbi, f. 87.

1803.—“The highest officers of State are the Adigars or Prime Ministers. They are two in number.”—Percival's Ceylon, 256.

[1810-17.—“Announcing in letters . . . his determination to exercise the office of Serv Adikar.”—Wilks, Mysoor, i. 264.

1887.—“Each amsam or parish has now besides the Adhikari or man of authority, headman, an accountant.”—Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 90.]

ADJUTANT, s. A bird so called (no doubt) from its comical resemblance to a human figure in a stiff dress pacing slowly on a parade-ground. It is the H. hargilā, or gigantic crane, and popular scavenger of Bengal, the Leptoptilus argala of Linnæus. The H. name is by some dictionaries derived from a supposed Skt. word hadḍa-gila, ‘bone-swallower.’ The compound, however appropriate, is not to be found in Böhrling and Roth’s great Dictionary. The bird is very well described by Aelian, under the name of Kḗλα, which is perhaps a relic of the still preserved vernacular one. It is described by another name, as one of the peculiarities of India, by Sultan Baber. See PELICAN.

“The feathers known as Marabou or Comercolly feathers, and sold in Calcutta, are the tail-coverts of this, and the Lept. Javanica, another and smaller species” (Serdon). The name marabout (from the Ar. murābit, ‘quiet,’ and thence ‘a hermit,’ through the Port. marabuto) seems to have been given to the bird in Africa on like reason to that of adjutant in India. [Comer-

c. A.D. 250.—“And I hear that there is in India a bird Kēla, which is 3 times as big as a bustard; it has a mouth of a frightful size, and long legs, and it carries a huge crop which looks like a leather bag; it has a most dissonant voice, and whilst the rest of the plumage is ash-coloured, the tail-feathers are of a pale (or greenish) colour.”—Aelian, de Nat. Anim. xvi. 4.

c. 1530.—“One of these (fowls) is the ding, which is a large bird. Each of its wings is the length of a man; on its head and neck there is no hair. Something like a bag hangs from its neck; its back is black, its breast white; it frequently visits Kābul. One year they caught and brought me a ding, which became very tame. The flesh which they threw it, it never failed to catch in its beak, and swallowed without ceremony. On one occasion it swallowed a shoe well shod with iron; on another occasion it swallowed a good-sized fowl right down, with its wings and feathers.”—Baber, 321.

1754.—“In the evening excursions . . . we had often observed an extraordinary species of birds, called by the natives Argill or Hargill, a native of Bengal. They would majestically stalk along before us, and at first we took them for Indians naked. . . . The following are the exact marks and dimensions. . . . The wings extended 14 feet and 10 inches. From the tip of the bill to the extremity of the claw it measured 7 feet 6 inches. . . . In the craw was a Terapin or land-tortoise, 10 inches long; and a large black male cat was found entire in its stomach.”—Ives, 183-4.

1798.—“The next is the great Heron, the Argali or Adjutant, or Gigantic Crane of Latham. . . . It is found also in Guinea.”—Pennant's View of Hindostan, ii. 156.

1810.—“Every bird saving the vulture, the Adjutant (or argeelah) and kite, retires to some shady spot.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 3.

[1880.—Ball (Jungle Life, 82) describes the “snake-stone” said to be found in the head of the bird.]

AFGHÂN, n.p. P.—H—Afghân. The most general name of the predominant portion of the congeries of tribes beyond the N.W. frontier of India, whose country is called from them Afghânistân. In England one often hears the country called Afgunist-un, which is a mispronunciation painful to an Anglo-Indian ear, and even Afgann, which is a still more excruciating solecism. [The common local pronunciation of the name is Aoghân, which accounts for some of the forms below. Bellevins insists on the distinction between the Afghân and the Pathân (PUTTAN). "The Afghan is a Pathan merely because he inhabits a Pathan country, and has to a great extent mixed with its people and adopted their language" (Races of Af., p. 25). The name represents Skt. asvaka in the sense of a 'cavalier,' and this reappears scarcely modified in the Assakani or Assakeni of the historians of the expedition of Alexander.]

c. 1020.—"... Afghâns and Khiljis . . ." —'Utbi in Elliot, ii. 24; see also 50, 114.

c. 1265.—"He also repaired the fort of Jalâlî, which he garrisoned with Afghâns." —Târikh-i-Firozshâhî in do. iii. 106.

14th cent.—The Afghans are named by the continuator of Rashiduddin among the tribes in the vicinity of Herat (see N. & E. xiv. 494).

1504.—"The Afghans, when they are reduced to extremities in war, come into the presence of their enemy with grass between their teeth; being as much as to say, 'I am your ox.'" —Baber, 159.

c. 1556.—"He was afraid of the Afghâns." —Sidi 'Ali, in J. As., 1st S., ix. 201.

1609.—"Agwans and Potans." — W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 521.

c. 1665.—"Such are those petty Sovereigns, who are seated on the Frontiers of Persia, who almost never pay him anything, no more than they do to the King of Persia. As also the Balouches and Augans, and other Mountaineers, of whom the greatest part pay him but a small matter, and even care but little for him: witness the Affront they did him, when they stopped his whole Army by cutting off the Water . . . when he passed from Atek on the River Indus to Caboul to lay siege to Kandahar . . ." —Bernier, E. T. 64 [ed. Constable, 205].

1676.—"The people called Augans who inhabit from Candahar to Caboul . . a sturdy sort of people, and great robbers in the night-time." —Tavernier, E. T. ii. 44; [ed. Ball, i. 92].

1767.—"Our final sentiments are that we have no occasion to take any measures against the Afghans' King if it should appear he comes only to raise contributions, but if he proceeds to the eastward of Delhi to make an attack on your allies, or threatens the peace of Bengal, you will concert such measures with Sujah Dowla as may appear best adapted for your mutual defence." —Court's Letter, Nov. 20. In Long, 486; also see ROHILLA.

1838.—"Professor Dorn . . . discusses severally the theories that have been maintained of the descent of the Afghans: 1st, from the Copts; 2nd, the Jews; 3rd, the Georgians; 4th, the Toorks; 5th, the Moguls; 6th, the Armenians: and he mentions more cursorily the opinion that they are descended from the Indo-Scythians, Medians, Sogdians, Persians, and Indians: on considering all which, he comes to the rational conclusion, that they cannot be traced to any tribe or country beyond their present seats and the adjoining mountains." —Elphinstone's Camboul, ed. 1839, i. 209.

1682.—"Here we met with y^e Barbadoes Merchant . . . James Cock, Master, laden with Salt, Mules, and Africos." —Hedges, Diary, Feb. 27. [Hak. Soc. i. 16.]

[AGAM, adj. A term applied to certain cloths dyed in some particular way. It is the Ar. 'ajam (lit. "one who has an impediment or difficulty in speaking Arabic"), a foreigner, and in particular, a Persian. The adj. 'ajami thus means "foreign" or "Persian," and is equivalent to the Greek βάρβαρος and the Hind. mlec̥ha. Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Rec., p. 145) quotes from Hieronimo di Santo Stefano (1494-99), "in company with some Armenian and Azami merchants": and (ibid.) from Varthema: "It is a country of very great traffic in merchandise, and particularly with the Persians and Azumini, who come so far as there."]

1614.—"Persia will vent five hundred cloths and one thousand kerseys, Agam colours, per annum." —Ibid. ii. 237.]

AGAR-AGAR, s. The Malay name of a kind of sea-weed (Spherooccus lichenoides). It is succulent when boiled to a jelly; and is used by the Chinese with birdsnest (q.v.) in soup. They also employ it as a glue, and apply it to silk and paper intended to be transparent. It grows on the shores of the Malay Islands, and is much exported to China.—(See Crawford, Dict. Ind. Arch., and Milburn, ii. 304).

AGDAUN, s. A hybrid H. word from H. āg and P. dān, made in imitation of pik-dān, kalam-dān, shama-dān ('spit-toon, pencease, candlestick'). It means a small vessel for holding fire to light a cheroot.

ĀG-GĀRI, s. H. 'Fire carriage.' In native use for a railway train.

* This symbolical action was common among beldars (Bildar), or native navvies, employed on the Ganges Canal many years ago, when they came before the engineer to make a petition. But besides grass in mouth, the beldar stood on one leg, with hands joined before him.

in the 16th and 17th centuries, and thus probably became known to them by a name taken from the Pagoda.—(From a note by Sir Arthur Phayre.) [Col. Temple writes—"The only derivation which strikes me as plausible, is from the Agyattaw Phaya, near which, on the island of Sittwé, a Cantonment was formed after the first Burmese war, on the abandonment of Mrohaung or Arakan town in 1825, on account of sickness among the troops stationed there. The word Agyattaw is spelt Akhyap-taw, whence probably the modern name."]

[1826.—"It (the despatch) at length arrived this day (3rd Dec. 1826), having taken two months in all to reach us, of which forty-five days were spent in the route from Akyab in Aracan."—Crawford, Arca, 289.]

ALA-BLAZE PAN, s. This name is given in the Bombay Presidency to a tinned-copper stew-pan, having a cover, and staples for straps, which is carried on the march by European soldiers, for the purpose of cooking in, and eating out of. Out on picnics a larger kind is frequently used, and kept continually going, as a kind of pot-au-feu. [It has been suggested that the word may be a corr. of some French or Port. term—Fr. braiser; Port. braz-ciro, 'a fire-pan,' braza, 'hot coals.']

ALBACORE, s. A kind of rather large sea-fish, of the Tunny genus (Thynnus albacora, Lowe, perhaps the same as Thynnus macropterus, Day); from the Port. albacor or albecora. The quotations from Ovington and Grose below refer it to albo, but the word is, from its form, almost certainly Arabic, though Dozy says he has not found the word in this sense in Arabic dictionaries, which are very defective in the names of fishes (p. 61). The word albacora in Sp. is applied to a large early kind of fig, from Ar. al-bukūr, 'praecox' (Dozy), Heb. bikkūra, in Micah vii. 1.—See Cobarruvias, s. v. Albacora. [The N.E.D. derives it from Ar. al-bukr, 'a young camel, a heifer,' whence Port. bacoro, 'a young pig.' Also see Gray's note on Pyrard, i. 9.]

1579.—"These (flying fish) have two enemies, the one in the sea, the other in the aire. In the sea the fish which is called Albocore, as big as a salmon."—Letter from Goa, by T. Stevens, in Hakl. ii. 583.

1592.—"In our passage over from S.

Laurence to the maine, we had exceeding great store of Bonitos and Albocores."—Barker, in Hakl. ii. 592.

1696.—"We met likewise with shoals of Albicores (so call'd from a piece of white Flesh that sticks to their Heart) and with multitudes of Bonettoes, which are named from their Goodness and Excellence for eating; so that sometimes for more than twenty Days the whole Ship's Company have feasted on these curious fish."—Ovington, p. 48.

c. 1760.—"The Albacore is another fish of much the same kind as the Bonito . . . from 60 to 90 pounds weight and upward. The name of this fish too is taken from the Portuguese, importing its white colour."—Grose, i. 5.

ALBATROSS, s. The great sea-bird (Diomedea exulans, L.), from the Port. alcatraz, to which the forms used by Hawkins and Dampier, and by Flacourt (according to Marcel Devic) closely approach. [Alcatraz 'in this sense altered to albi-, albe-, albatross (perhaps with etymological reference to albus, "white," the albatross being white, while the alcatraz was black.) N.E.D. s.v.] The Port. word properly means 'a pelican.' A reference to the latter word in our Glossary will show another curious misapplication. Devic states that alcatruz in Port. means 'the bucket of a Persian wheel,' * representing the Ar. al-kaddā, which is again from kādos. He supposes that the pelican may have got this name in the same way that it is called in ordinary Ar. sakka, 'a water-carrier.' It has been pointed out by Dr Murray, that the alcatruz of some of the earlier voyagers, e.g., of Davis below, is not the Diomedea, but the Man-of-War (or Frigate) Bird (Fregatus aquilus). Hawkins, at p. 187 of the work quoted, describes, without naming, a bird which is evidently the modern albatross. In the quotation from Mocquet again, alcatruz is applied to some smaller sea-bird. The passage from Shelvocke is that which suggested to Coleridge "The Ancient Mariner."

1564.—"The 8th December we ankered by a small Island called Alcatrassa, wherein at our going a shoare, we found nothing but sea-birds, as we call them Ganets, but by the Portugals called Alcatrasses, who for that cause gave the said Island the same name."—Hawkins (Hak. Soc.), 15.

* Also see Dozy, s. v. alcaduz. Alcaduz, according to Cobarruvias, is in Sp. one of the earthen pots of the noria or Persian wheel.

1593.—“The dolphins and bonitoes are the houndes, and the alcatraroes the hawkes, and the flying fishes the game.”—Ibid. 152.

1604.—“The other foule called Alcatraz is a kind of Hawke that liueth by fishing. For when the Bonitos or Dolphins doe chase the flying fish vnder the water . . . this Alcatraz flyeth after them like a Hawke after a Partridge.”—Davis (Hak. Soc.), 158.

c. 1608-10.—“Alcatraz sont petis oiseaux ainsi comme estourneaux.”—Mocquet, Voyages, 226.

1672.—“We met with those feathered Harbingers of the Cape . . . Albetrosses . . . they haue great Bodies, yet not proportionate to their Wings, which mete out twice their length.”—Fryer, 12.

1690.—“They have several other Signs, whereby to know when they are near it, as by the Sea Fowl they meet at Sea, especially the Algatrosses, a very large long-winged Bird.”—Dampier, i. 531.

1719.—“We had not had the sight of one fish of any kind, since we were come Southward of the Streights of Le Mair, nor one sea-bird, except a disconsolate black Albitross, who accompanied us for several days, hovering about us as if he had lost himself, till Hatley (my second Captain) observing, in one of his melancholy fits, that this bird was always hovering near us, imagin'd from his colour, that it might be some ill omen. . . . But be that as it would, he after some fruitless attempts, at length shot the Albitross, not doubting (perhaps) that we should have a fair wind after it. . . .”—Shelvrocke's Voyage, 72, 73.

1740.—“. . . a vast variety of sea-fowl, amongst which the most remarkable are the Penguins; they are in size and shape like a goose, but instead of wings they have short stumps like fins . . . their bills are narrow like those of an Albitross, and they stand and walk in an erect posture. From this and their white bellies, Sir John Narborough has whimsically likened them to little children standing up in white aprons.”—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. (1756), p. 68.

1754.—“An albatrose, a sea-fowl, was shot off the Cape of Good Hope, which measured $17\frac{1}{2}$ feet from wing to wing.”—Ives, 5.

“At length did cross an Albatross;
Thorough the fog it came;
As if it had been a Christian soul
We hailed it in God's name.”

The Ancient Mariner.

c. 1861.—
“Souvent pour s'amuser, les hommes d'équipage Prennent des albatros, vastes oiseaux des mers,
Qui suivent, indolents compagnons de voyage,
Le navire glissant sur les gouffres amers.”
Baudelaire, L'Albatros.

ALCATIF, s. This word for ‘a carpet’ was much used in India in the 16th century, and is treated by some travellers as an Indian word. It is not however of Indian origin, but is an Arabic word (katif, ‘a carpet with long pile’) introduced into Portugal through the Moors.

c. 1540.—“There came aboard of Antonio de Faria more than 60 batels, and balloons, and manhuas (q. q. v.) with awnings and flags of silk, and rich alcatifas.”—Pinto, ch. lxviii. (orig.).

1560.—“The whole tent was cut in a variety of arabesques, inlaid with coloured silk, and was carpeted with rich alcatifas.”—Tenreiro, Itin., c. xvii.

1578.—“The windows of the streets by which the Viceroy passes shall be hung with carpets (alcatifadas), and the doors decorated with branches, and the whole adorned as richly as possible.”—Archiv. Port. Orient., fascic. ii. 225.

[1598.—“Great store of rich Tapestry, which are called alcatifas.”—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 47.]

1608-10.—“Quand elles vont à l'Eglise on les porte en palanquin . . . le dedans est d'un grand tapis de Perse, qu'ils appellent Alcatif . . .”—Pyrard, ii. 62; [Hak. Soc. ii. 102].

1648.—“. . . many silk stuffs, such as satin, contenijis (Cuttanee) attelap (read attelas), alegie . . . ornijs [H. orhnt, ‘A woman's sheet’] of gold and silk for women's wear, gold alacatijven . . .”—Van Twist, 50.

1726.—“They know nought of chairs or tables. The small folks eat on a mat, and the rich on an Alcatief, or carpet, sitting with their feet under them, like our Tailors.”—Valentijn, v. Chorom, 55.

ALCORANAS, s. What word does Herbert aim at in the following? [The Stanf. Dict. regards this as quite distinct from Alcordn, the Korān, or sacred book of Mohammedans (for which see N.E.D. s.v.), and suggests Al-qorūn, ‘the horns,’ or al-qirūn, ‘the vertices.’] 1665.—“Some (mosques) have their Alcorana's high, slender, round steeples or towers, most of which are terrassed near the top, like the Standard in Cheapside, but twice the height.”—Herbert, Travels, 3rd ed. 164.

ALCOVE, s. This English word comes to us through the Span. alcova and Fr. alcove (old Fr. aucube), from Ar. al-kubbāh, applied first to a kind of tent (so in Hebr. Numbers xxv. 8) and then to a vaulted building or recess. An edifice of Saracenic struction at Palermo is still known as La Cuba; and another, a domed tomb, as La Cubola. Whatever be the true formation of the last word, it seems to have given us, through the Italian, Cupola. [Not so in N.E.D.]

1738.—“Cubba, commonly used for the vaulted tomb of marub-butts” [Adjutant.]—Shaw's Travels, ed. 1757, p. 40.

ALDEA, s. A village; also a villa. Port. from the Ar. al-da'a, ‘a farm or villa.’ Bluteau explains it as ‘Povoção menor que lugar.’ Lane gives among other and varied meanings of the Ar. word: ‘An estate consisting of land or of land and a house, . . . land yielding a revenue.’ The word forms part of the name of many towns and villages in Spain and Portugal.

1547.—“The Governor (of Baçam) Dom João de Castro, has given and gives many aldeas and other grants of land to Portuguese who served and were wounded at the fortress of Dio, and to others of long service. . . .”—Simão Botelho, Cartas 3.

[1609.—“Aldeas in the Country.”—Dunvers, Letters, i. 25.]

1673.—“Here . . . in a sweet Air, stood a Magnificent Rural Church; in the way to which, and indeed all up and down this Island, are pleasant Aldeas, or villages and hamlets that . . . swarm with people.”—Valentijn, v. (Malabar), 11.

1780.—“The Coast between these is filled with Aldeas, or villages of the Indians.”—Dunn, N. Directory, 5th ed., 110.

1782.—“Il y a aussi quelques Aldées considérables, telles que Navar et Portenove, qui appartiennent aux Princes du pays.”—Sonnerat, Voyage, i. 37.

ALEPPEE, n.p. On the coast of Travancore; properly Alappuli. [Mal. alappuzha, ‘the broad river’—(Mad. Adm. Man. Gloss. s.v.).]

[ALFANDICA, s. A custom-house and resort for foreign merchants in an oriental port. The word comes through the Port. alfandega, Span. fundago, Ital. fondaco, Fr. fondeque or fondique, from Ar. al-funduk, ‘the inn,’ and this from Gk. παραδοκείον or παραδοκίων, ‘a pilgrim’s hospice.’]

[c. 1610.—“The conveyance of them thence to the alfandigue.”—Pyrard della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 361.]

[1615.—“The Iudge of the Alfandica came to invite me.”—Sir T. Roe, Embassy. Hak. Soc. i. 72.]

ALGUADA, n.p. The name of a reef near the entrance to the Bassein branch of the Irawadi R., on which a splendid lighthouse was erected by Capt. Alex. Fraser (now Lieut.-General Fraser, C.B.) of the Engineers, in 1861-65. See some remarks and quotations under NEGRAIS.

ALJOFAR, s. Port. ‘seed-pearl.’ Colarruvias says it is from Ar. al-jauhar, ‘jewel.’

1404.—“And from these bazars (alcacerias), issue certain gates into certain streets, where they sell many things, such as cloths of silk and cotton, and sendals, and taslanas, and silk, and pearl (alxofar).”—Clavijo, § lxxxi. (comp. Markham, 81).

1508.—“The aljofar and pearls that (your Majesty) orders me to send you I cannot have as they have them in Ceylon and in Caille, which are the sources of them: I would buy them with my blood, and with my money, which I have only from your giving. The Sinabuffs (sinabafus), porcelain vases (porcellanas), and wares of that sort are further off. If for my sins I stay here longer I will endeavour to get everything. The slave girls that you order me to send you must be taken from prizes,* for the heathen women of this country are black, and are mistresses to everybody by the time they are ten years old.”—Letter of the Viceroy D. Francisco d'Almeida to the King, in Correa, i. 908-9.

[1665.—“As it (the idol) was too deformed, they made hands for it of the small pearls which we call ‘pearls by the ounce.’”—Tavernier, ed. Ball, ii. 228.]

ALLAHABAD, n.p. This name, which was given in the time of Akbar to the old Hindu Prayāg or Prāg (PRAAG) has been subjected to a variety of corrupt pronunciations, both European and native. Illahābāz is a not uncommon native form, converted by Europeans into Halabas, and further by English soldiers formerly into Isle o' bats. And the Illiabad, which we find in the Hastings charges, survives in the Elleabad still heard occasionally.

* Query, from captured vessels containing foreign (non-Indian) women? The words are as follows: “As escravas que me diz que lhe mande, tomiose de pretas, que as Gentias d'esta terra são pretas, e manobras do mundo como cheião a dez annos.”

f. 17v.). Oviedo, on another page of the same volume, calls them "Lagarti o dragoni" (f. 62).

Bluteau gives "Lagarto, Crocodilo" and adds: "In the Oriente Conquistado (Part I. f. 823) you will find a description of the Crocodile under the name of Lagarto."

One often, in Anglo-Indian conversation, used to meet with the endeavour to distinguish the two well-known species of the Ganges as Crocodile and Alligator, but this, like other applications of popular and general terms to mark scientific distinctions, involves fallacy, as in the cases of 'panther, leopard,' 'camel, dromedary,' 'attorney, solicitor,' and so forth. The two kinds of Gangetic crocodile were known to Aelian (c. 250 A.D.), who writes: "It (the Ganges) breeds two kinds of crocodiles; one of these is not at all hurtful, while the other is the most voracious and cruel eater of flesh; and these have a horny prominence on the top of the nostril. These latter are used as ministers of vengeance upon evil-doers; for those convicted of the greatest crimes are cast to them; and they require no executioner."

1493.—"In a small adjacent island . . . our men saw an enormous kind of lizard (lagarto muy grande), which they said was as large round as a calf, and with a tail as long as a lance . . . but bulky as it was, it got into the sea, so that they could not catch it."—Letter of Dr. Chanca, in Select Letters of Columbus by Major, Hak. Soc. 2nd ed., 43.

1539.—"All along this River, that was not very broad, there were a number of Lizards (lagartos), which might more properly be called Serpents . . . with scales upon their backs, and mouths two foot wide . . . there be of them that will sometimes get upon an almadia . . . and overturn it with their tails, swallowing up the men whole, without dismembering of them."—Pinto, in Cogan's tr. 17 (orig. cap. xiv.).

1552.—" . . . aquatic animals such as . . . very great lizards (lagartos), which in form and nature are just the crocodiles of the Nile."—Barros, I. iii. 8.

1568.—"In this River we killed a monstrous Lagarto, or Crocodile . . . he was 23 foote by the rule, headed like a hogge. . . ."—Job Hortop, in Hakl. iii. 580.

1579.—"We found here many good commodities . . . besides alagartoes, munckeyes, and the like."—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc. 112.

1591.—"In this place I have seen very great water aligartos (which we call in English crocodiles), seven yards long."— Master Antonie Knivet, in Purchas, iv. 1228.

1593.—"In this River (of Guayaquill) and all the Rivers of this Coast, are great abundance of Alagartoes . . . persons of credit have certified to me that as small fishes in other Rivers abound in scales, so the Alagartoes in this"—Sir Richard Hawkins, in Purchas, iv. 1400.

1596.—"Once he would needs defend a rat to be animal rationale . . . because she eate and gnawd his bookes . . . And the more to confirme it, because everie one laught at him . . . the next rat he seaz'd on hee made an anatomic of, and read a lecture of 3 dayes long upon everie artire or musckle, and after hanged her over his head in his studie in stead of an apothecarie's crocodile or dride Alligator."—T. Nashe's 'Hare with you to Saffron Walden.' Repr. in J. Payne Collier's Misc. Tracts, p. 72.

1610.—"These Blackes . . . told me the River was full of Aligatas, and if I saw any I must fight with him, else he would kill me."—D. Middleton, in Purchas, i. 244.

1881.—"The Hooghly alone has never been so full of sharks and alligators as now. We have it on undoubted authority that within the past two months over a hundred people have fallen victims to these brutes."—Pioneer Mail, July 10th.

ALLIGATOR-PEAR, s. The fruit of the Laurus persea, Lin., Persa gratissima, Gaertn. The name as here given is an extravagant, and that of avocato or avugato a more moderate, corruption of aguacate or ahuacatl (see below), which appears to have been the native name in Central America, still surviving there. The Quichua name is patta, which is used as well as aguacate by Cieza de Leon, and also by Joseph de Acosta. Grainger (Sugarcane, Bk. I.) calls it "rich sabbaca," which he says is "the Indian name of the avocado, avocado, avigato, or as the English corruptly call it, alligator pear." The Spaniards in S. America call it Aguacate, and under that name it is described by Ulloa." In French it is called avocat. The praise which Grainger, as quoted below, "liberally bestows" on this fruit, is, if we might judge from the specimens occasionally met with in India, absurd. With liberal pepper and salt there may be a remote suggestion of marrow: but that is all. Indeed it is hardly a fruit in the ordinary sense. Its common sea name of 'midshipman's butter' [or 'subaltern's butter'] is suggestive of its merits, or demerits.

Though common and naturalised throughout the W. Indies and E. coasts of tropical S. America, its actual native country is unknown. Its introduction into the Eastern world is comparatively recent; not older than the middle of 18th century. Had it been worth eating it would have come long before.

1532-50.—"There are other fruits belonging to the country, such as fragrant pines and plantains, many excellent guaras, caymilos, aguacates, and other fruits."—Cieza de Leon, 16.

1608.—"The Patta is a great tree, and carries a faire leafe, which hath a fruite like to great peares; within it hath a great stone, and all the rest is soft meate, so as when they are full ripe, they are, as it were, butter, and have a delicate taste."—Joseph de Acosta, 250.

c. 1660.—

"The Aguacat no less is Venus Friend
(To th' Indies Venus Conquest doth extend)

A fragrant Leaf the Aguacata bears;
Her Fruit in fashion of an Egg appears,
With such a white and spermy Juice it swells

As represents moist Life's first Principles."

Cowley, Of Plantes, v.

1680.—"This Tavoga is an exceeding pleasant Island, abounding in all manner of fruits, such as Pine-apples . . . Albecatos, Pears, Mammes."—Capt. Sharpe, in Dampier, iv.

1685.—"The Avogato Pear-tree is as big as most Pear-trees . . . and the Fruit as big as a large Lemon. . . . The Substance in the inside is green, or a little yellowish, and soft as Butter. . . ."—Dampier, i. 203.

1736.—"Avogato, Baum. . . . This fruit itself has no taste, but when mixt with sugar and lemon juice gives a wholesome and tasty flavour."—Zeidler's Lexicon, s.v.

"And thou green avocado, charm of sense, Thy ripen'd marrow liberally bestows't."

1830.—"The avocada, with its Broh-dignag pear, as large as a purser's lantern."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 40.

[1861.—"There is a well-known West Indian fruit which we call an avocado or alligator pear."—Tylor, Anahuac, 227.]

1870.—"The aguacate or Alligator pear."—Squier, Honduras, 142.

1873.—"Thus the fruit of the Persea gratissima was called Ahuacatl by the ancient Mexicans; the Spaniards corrupted it to avocado, and our sailors still further to 'Alligator pears.'"—Bell's Nicaragua, 107.

[ALLYGOLE, ALIGHOL, ALLYGOOL, ALLEEGOLE, s. H.—P. 'aligol, from 'ali 'lofty, excellent,' Skt. gola, a troop; a nondescript word used for "irregular foot in the Maratha service, without discipline or regular arms. According to some they are so named from charging in a dense mass and invoking 'Ali, the son-in-law of Mohammed, being chiefly Moham-medans."—(Wilson.)

1796.—"The Nezihs (Nujeeb) are matchlockmen, and according to their different casts are called Allegoles or Rohillas; they are indifferently formed of high-cast Hindoos and Musselmans, armed with the country Bandoock (bundoock), to which the ingenuity of De Boigne had added a Bayonet."—W. H. Tone, A Letter on the Maratta People, p. 50.

1804.—"Alleegole, A sort of chosen light infantry of the Rohilla Patans: sometimes the term appears to be applied to troops supposed to be used generally for desperate service."—Fraser, Military Memoirs of Skinner, ii. 71 note, 75, 76.

1817.—"The Allygools answer nearly the same description."—Blacker, Mem. of Operations in India, p. 22.]

ALMADIA, s. This is a word introduced into Portuguese from Moorish Ar. al-ma'diya. Properly it means 'a raft' (see Dozy, s.v.). But it is generally used by the writers on India for a canoe, or the like small native boat.

“Plantains, the golden and the green,
Malaya's nectar'd mangosteen;
Prunes of Bokhara, and sweet nuts
From the far groves of Samarkand.”

Moore, Lalla Rookh.

ALPEEN, s. H. alpin, used in Bombay. A common pin, from Port. alfinete (Panjab N. & Q., ii. 117).

AMAH, s. A wet nurse; used in Madras, Bombay, China and Japan. It is Port. ama (comp. German and Swedish amme).

1839.—“.... A sort of good-natured housekeeper-like bodies, who talk only of ayahs and amahs, and bad nights, and babies, and the advantages of Hodgson's ale while they are nursing: seeming in short devoted to ‘suckling fools and chronicling small beer.’”—Letters from Madras, 294. See also p. 106.

AMBAREE, s. This is a P. word (‘amārī) for a Howdah, and the word occurs in Colebrooke's letters, but is quite unusual now. Gladwin defines Amaree as “an umbrella over the Howdah” (Index to Ayeen, i.). The proper application is to a canopied howdah, such as is still used by native princes.

[c. 1661.—“Aurengzebe felt that he might venture to shut his brother up in a covered embary, a kind of closed litter in which women are carried on elephants.”—Bernier (ed. Constable), 69.]

c. 1665.—“On the day that the King went up the Mountain of Pire-ponjale . . . being followed by a long row of elephants, upon which sat the Women in Mikdembers and Embarys . . .”—Bernier, E.T. 130 [ed. Constable, 407].

1798.—“The Rajah's Sowcarree was very grand and superb. He had twenty elephants, with richly embroidered ambarrehs, the whole of them mounted by his sirdars, —he himself riding upon the largest, put in the centro.”—Skinner, Mem. i. 157.

1799.—“Many of the largest Ceylon and other Deccany Elephants bore ambāris on which all the chiefs and nobles rode, dressed with magnificence, and adorned with the richest jewels.”—Life of Colebrooke, p. 164.

1805.—“Amaury, a canopied seat for an elephant. An open one is called Houza or Howda.”—Dict. of Words used in E. Indies, 2nd ed. 21.

1807.—“A royal tiger which was started in beating a large cover for game, sprang up so far into the umbarry or state howdah, in which Sujah Dowlah was seated, as to leave little doubt of a fatal issue.”—Williamson, Orient. Field Sports, 15.

AMBARREH, s. Dekh. Hind. and Mahr. ambārā, ambārī [Skt. amla-vāt-ika], the plant Hibiscus cannabinus, affording a useful fibre.

AMBOYNA, n.p. A famous island in the Molucca Sea, belonging to the Dutch. The native form of the name is Ambun [which according to Marsden means ‘dew’].

[1605.—“He hath sent hither his forces which hath expelled all the Portingalls out of the fforts they here hould att Ambweno and Tydore.”—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 68.]

AMEEN, s. The word is Ar. amin, meaning ‘a trustworthy person,’ and then an inspector, intendant, &c. In India it has several uses as applied to native officials employed under the Civil Courts, but nearly all reducible to the definition of fide-commissarius. Thus an ameen may be employed by a Court to investigate accounts connected with a suit, to prosecute local enquiries of any kind bearing on a suit, to sell or to deliver over possession of immovable property, to carry out legal process as a bailiff, &c. The name is also applied to native assistants in the duties of land-survey. But see Sudder Ameen (SUDDER).

1817.—“Native officers called atumeens were sent to collect accounts, and to obtain information in the districts. The first incidents that occurred were complaints against these atumeens for injurious treatment of the inhabitants. . . .”—Mill. Hist., ed. 1840, iv. 12.

1861.—“Bengallee dewans, once pure, are converted into demons; Ameens, once harmless, become tigers; magistrates, supposed to be just, are converted into oppressors.”—Peterson, Speech for Prosecution in Nil Durpan case.

1878.—“The Ameen employed in making the partition of an estate.”—Life in the Mofussil, i. 206.

1882.—“A missionary . . . might, on the other hand, be brought to a standstill when asked to explain all the terms used by an amin or valuator who had been sent to fix the judicial rents.”—Saty. Rev., Dec. 30, p. 866.

AMEER, s. Ar. Amīr (root amr, ‘commanding,’ and so) ‘a commander, chief, or lord,’ and, in Ar. application, any kind of chief from the Amīru’ l-mūminīn, ‘the Amīr of the Faithful’

i.e. the Caliph, downwards. The word in this form perhaps first became familiar as applied to the Princes of Sind, at the time of the conquest of that Province by Sir C. J. Napier. It is the title affected by many Musulman sovereigns of various calibres, as the Amīr of Kābul, the Amīr of Bokhārā, &c. But in sundry other forms the word has, more or less, taken root in European languages since the early Middle Ages. Thus it is the origin of the title 'Admiral,' now confined to generals of the sea service, but applied in varying forms by medieval Christian writers to the Amīrs, or lords, of the court and army of Egypt and other Mohammedan States. The word also came to us again, by a later importation from the Levant, in the French form, Emir or Emer.—See also Omrah, which is in fact Umarā, the pl. of Amīr. Byzantine writers use 'Ἀμῆρ, 'Ἀμῆρας, 'Ἀμῆρας, 'Ἀμῆρας, &c. (See Ducange, Gloss. Græcit.) It is the opinion of the best scholars that the forms Amiral, Ammiraglio, Admiral &c., originated in the application of a Low Latin termination -alis or -alius, though some doubt may still attach to this question. (See Marcel Devic, s.v. Amiral, and Dozy, Qosterlingen, s.v. Admiraal [and N.E.D. s.v. Admiral]. The d in admiral probably came from a false imagination of connection with admirari.

1250.—"Li grand amiraus des galies m'envoia querre, et me demanda si j'estoie cousins le roy; et je le di que nanin"—Joinville, p. 178. This passage illustrates the sort of way in which our modern use of the word admiral originated.

c. 1345.—"The Master of the Ship is like a great amīr; when he goes ashore the archers and the blackamoors march before him with javelins and swords, with drums and horns and trumpets."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 93.

Compare with this description of the Commander of a Chinese Junk in the 14th century, A. Hamilton's of an English Captain in Malabar in the end of the 17th:

"Captain Beawes, who commanded the Albemarle, accompanied us also, carrying a Drum and two Trumpets with us, so as to make our Compliment the more solemn."—i. 294.

And this again of an "interloper" skipper at Hooghly, in 1683:

1683.—"Alley went in a splendid Equipage, habitted in scarlet richly laced. Ten Englishmen in Blue Capps and Coats edged with Red, all armed with Blunderbusses, went before his pallankeen, 80 (? 8) Poms before them, and 4 Musicians playing on the Weights with 2 Flags, before him, like an Agent . . ."—Hedges, Oct. 8 (Hak. Soc. i. 123).

1615.—"The inhabitants (of Sidon) are of sundry nations and religions; governed by a succession of Princes whom they call Emers: descended, as they say, from the Druses."—Sandys, Journey, 210.

AMOY, n.p. A great seaport of Fokien in China, the name of which in Mandarin dialect is Hia-men, meaning 'Hall Gate,' which is in the Changchau dialect A-mui. In some books of the last century it is called Emoy and the like. It is now a Treaty-Port.

1687.—"Amoy or Anhay, which is a city standing on a Navigable River in the Province of Fokien in China, and is a place of vast trade."—Dampier, i. 417. (This looks as if Dampier confounded the name of Amoy, the origin of which (as generally given) we have stated, with that of An-hai, one of the connected ports, which lies to the N.E., about 30 m., as the crow flies, from Amoy).

1727.—"There are some curiosities in Amoy. One is a large Stone that weighs above forty Tuns . . . in such an Equilibrium, that a Youth of twelve Years old can easily make it move."—A. Hamilton, ii. 243.

AMSHOM, s. Malayāl. aṁśam, from Skt. āṁśah, 'a part,' defined by Gundert as "part of a Talook, formerly called hobili, greater than a tara." [Logan (Man. Malabar, i. 87) speaks of the amsam as a 'parish.'] It is further explained in the following quotation:—

1878.—"The amshom is really the smallest revenue division there is in Malabar, and is generally a tract of country some square miles in extent, in which there is no such thing as a village, but a series of scattered homesteads and farms, where the owner of the land and his servants reside . . . separate and apart, in single separate huts, or in scattered collections of huts."—Report of Census Com. in India.

A MUCK, to run, v. There is we believe no room for doubt that, to us at least, this expression came from the Malay countries, where both the phrase and the practice are still familiar. Some valuable remarks on the phenomenon, as prevalent among the Malays, to certain Hindus whom he saw in S. Malabar near Quilon, whose duty it was to defend the Syrian Christians with their lives. There are reasons for thinking that the worthy priest got hold of the story of a cock and a bull; but in any case the Hindus referred to were really Jangadas."] (See JANCADA).

De Gubernatis has indeed suggested that the word amouchi was derived from the Skt. amokshya, 'that cannot be loosed'; and this would be very consistent with several of the passages which we shall quote, in which the idea of being 'bound by a vow' underlies the conduct of the persons to whom the term was applicable both in Malabar and in the Archipelago. But amokshya is a word unknown to Malayalam, in such a sense at least.

We have seen a-muck derived from the Ar. ahmak, 'fatuous' [(e.g. Bull, Jungle Life, 358).] But this is etymology of the kind which scorns history.

The phrase has been thoroughly naturalised in England since the days of Dryden and Pope. [The earliest quotation for "running amuck" in the N.E.D. is from Marvell (1672).]

c. 1430.—Nicolo Conti, speaking of the greater Islands of the Archipelago under the name of the Two Javas, does not use the word, but describes a form of the practice:—

"Homicide is here a jest, and goes without punishment. Debtors are made over to their creditors as slaves; and some of these, preferring death to slavery, will with drawn swords rush on, stabbing all whom they fall in with of less strength than themselves, until they meet death at the hands of some one more than a match for them. This man, the creditors then sue in Court for the dead man's debt."—In India in the XVth C. 45.

1516.—"There are some of them (Javanese) who if they fall ill of any severe illness vow to God that if they remain in health they will of their own accord seek another more honourable death for his service, and as soon as they get well they take a dagger in their hands, and go out into the streets and kill as many persons as they meet, both men, women, and children, in such wise that they go like mad dogs, killing until they are killed. These are called Amuco. And as soon as they see them begin this work, they cry out, saying Amuco, Amuco, in order that people may take care of themselves, and they kill them with dagger and spear thrusts."—Barbosa, Hak. Soc. 194. This passage seems to show that the word amuk must have been commonly used in Malay countries before the arrival of the Portuguese there, c. 1511.

1539.—" . . . The Tyrant (o Rey Ache) sallied forth in person, accompanied with 5000 resolute men (cinco mil Amoucos) and charged the Batuas very furiously."—Pinto (orig. cap. xvii.) in Logan, p. 20.

1552.—De Barros, speaking of the capture of the Island of Beth (Beut, off the N.W. point of Kāthiāwār) by Nuno da Cunha in 1531, says: "But the natives of Guzarat stood in such fear of Sultan Badur that they would not consent to the terms. And so, like people determined on death, all that night they shaved their heads (this is a superstitious practice of those who despise life, people whom they call in India Aman-cos) and betook themselves to their mosque, and there devoted their persons to death . . . and as an earnest of this vow, and an example of this resolution, the Captain ordered a great fire to be made, and cast into it his wife, and a little son that he had, and all his household and his goods, in fear lest anything of his should fall into our possession." Others did the like, and then they fell upon the Portuguese.—Dec. IV. iv. 13.

c. 1561.—In war between the Kings of Calicut and Cochin (1503) two princes of Cochin were killed. A number of these desperadoes who have been spoken of in the quotations were killed. . . . "But some remained who were not killed, and these went in shame, not to have died avenging their lords . . . these were more than 200, who all, according to their custom, shaved off all their hair, even to the eyebrows, and embraced each other and their friends and relations, as men about to suffer death. In this case they are as madmen—known as amoucos—and count themselves as already among the dead. These men dispersed, seeking wherever they might find men of Calicut, and among these they rushed fearless, killing and slaying till they were slain. And some of them, about twenty, reckoning more highly of their honour, desired to turn their death to better account; and these separated, and found their way secretly to Calicut, determined to slay the king. But as it became known that they were amoucos, the city gave the alarm, and the King sent his servants to slay them as they slew others. But they like desperate men played the devil (fazido diabruras) before they were slain, and killed many people, with women and children. And five of them got together to a wood near the city, which they haunted for a good while after, making robberies and doing much mischief, until the whole of them were killed."—Correa, i. 364-5.

1566.—"The King of Cochin . . . hath a great number of gentlemen which he calleth Amocchi, and some are called Nairi: these two sorts of men esteem not their lives anything, so that it may be for the honour of their King."—M. Cesar Frederike in Purchas, ii. 1708. [See Logan, Man. Malabar, i. 138.]

1581.—"Their forces (in Cochin) consist in a kind of soldiers whom they call amocchi, who are under obligation to die at the King's pleasure, and all soldiers who in war lose their King or their general lie under this obligation. And of such the King makes use in urgent cases, sending them to die fighting."—Letter of F. Sassetti to Francesco I., Gd. D. of Tuscany, in De Gubernatis, 154.

c. 1584.—"There are some also who are called Amocchi . . . who being weary of living, set themselves in the way with a weapon in their hands, which they call a Crise, and kill as many as they meet with, till somebody killeth them; and this they doe for the least anger they conceive, as desperate men."—G. Balbi in Purchas, ii. 1724.

1602.—De Couto, speaking of the Javanese: "They are chivalrous men, and of such determination that for whatever offence may be offered them they make themselves amoucos in order to get satisfaction thereof. And were a spear run into the stomach of such an one he would still press forward without fear till he got at his foe."—Dec. IV. iii. 1.

„ In another passage (ib. vii. 14) De Couto speaks of the amoucos of Malabar just as Della Valle does below. In Dec. VI. viii. 8 he describes how, on the death of the King of Pimenta, in action with the Portuguese, "nearly 4000 Nairs made themselves amoucos with the usual ceremonies, shaving their heads on one side, and swearing by their pagoda to avenge the King's death."

1604.—"Auia hecho vna junta de Amocos, con sus ceremonias para venir a morir adonde el Panical auia sedo muerto."—Guerrero, Relacion, 91.

1611.—"Viceroy. What is the meaning of amoucos? Soldier. It means men who have made up their mind to die in killing as many as they can, as is done in the parts about Malaca by those whom they call amoucos in the language of the country."—Couto, Dialogo do Soldado Pratico, 2nd part, p. 9.—(Printed at Lisbon in 1790).

1615.—"Hos inter Nairos genus est et ordo quem Amocas vocant quibus ob studium rei bellicae praeipua laus tribuitur, et omnium habentur validissimi."—Jarric, Thesaurus, i. 65.

Amoco, and so they say that the Amoco of the Samori lasts one day; the Amoco of the king of Cochin lasts a life-time; and so of others."—P. della Valle, ii. 745 [Hak. Soc., ii. 380 seq.].

1648.—"Derrière ces palissades s'estoit caché un coquin de Bantamois qui estoit revenu de la Mecque et jouoit à Moqua . . . il court par les rues et tue tous ceux qu'il rencontre. . . ."—Tavernier, V. des Indes, liv. iii. ch. 24 [Ed. Ball, ii. 361 seq.].

1659.—"I saw in this month of February at Batavia the breasts torn with red-hot tongs off a black Indian by the executioner; and after this he was broken on the wheel from below upwards. This was because through the evil habit of eating opium (according to the godless custom of the Indians) he had become mad and raised the cry of Amocle (misp. for Amock) . . . in which mad state he had slain five persons. . . . This was the third Amock-crier whom I saw during that visit to Batavia (a few months) broken on the wheel for murder."

"Such a murderer and Amock-runner has sometimes the fame of being an invincible hero because he has so manfully repulsed all who tried to seize him. . . . So the Netherlands Government is compelled when such an Amock-runner is taken alive to punish him in a terrific manner."—Walter Schulzens Ost-Indische Reise-Beschreibung (German ed.), Amsterdam, 1676, pp. 19-20 and 227.

1672.—"Every community (of the Malabar Christians), every church has its own Amouchi, which . . . are people who take an oath to protect with their own lives the persons and places put under their safeguard, from all and every harm."—P. Vincenzo Maria, 145.

„ "If the Prince is slain the amouchi, who are numerous, would avenge him desperately. If he be injured they put on festive raiment, take leave of their parents, and with fire and sword in hand invade the hostile territory, burning every dwelling, and slaying man, woman, and child, sparing none, until they themselves fall."—Ibid. 237-8.

1673.—"And they (the Mohammedans) are hardly restrained from running a muck (which is to kill whoever they meet, till they be slain themselves), especially if they have been at Hodge [Hadgee] a Pilgrimage to Mecca."—Fryer, 91.

1687.—Dryden assailing Burnet:—

"Prompt to assault, and careless of defence,
Invulnerable in his impudence,
He dares the World; and eager of a name,
He thrusts about and justles into fame.
Frontless and satire-proof, he scours the streets
And runs an Indian Muck at all he meets."

The Hind and the Panther, line 2477.

1689.—"Those that run these are called Amouki, and the doing of it Running a Muck."—Ovington, 231.

1712.—“Amouco (Termo da India) val o mesmo que homem determinado e apostado que despreza a vida e não teme a morte.”—Bluteau, s.v.

1727.—“I answered him that I could no longer bear their Insults, and, if I had not Permission in three Days, I would run a Muck (which is a mad Custom among the Mallayas when they become desperate).”—A. Hamilton, ii. 231.

“Satire’s my weapon, but I’m too discreet
To run a muck, and tilt at all I meet.”
Pope, Im. of Horace, B. ii. Sat. i. 69.

1768-71.—“These acts of indiscriminate murder are called by us mucks, because the perpetrators of them, during their frenzy, continually cry out amok, amok, which signifies kill, kill. . .”—Stavorinus, i. 291.

1783.—At Bencoolen in this year (1760)—“the Count (d’Estaing) afraid of an insurrection among the Buggesses . . . invited several to the Fort, and when these had entered the Wicket was shut upon them; in attempting to disarm them, they mangamoed, that is ran a muck; they drew their crosses, killed one or two Frenchmen, wounded others, and at last suffered themselves, for supporting this point of honour.”—Forrest’s Voyage to Mergui, 77.

1784.—“It is not to be controverted that these desperate acts of indiscriminate murder, called by us mucks, and by the natives mongamo, do actually take place, and frequently too, in some parts of the east (in Java in particular).”—Maraden, H. of Sumatra, 239.

1788.—“We are determined to run a muck rather than suffer ourselves to be forced away by these Hollanders.”—Mem. of a Malayan Family, 66.

1798.—“At Batavia, if an officer take one of these amoks, or mohawks, as they have been called by an easy corruption, his reward is very considerable; but if he kill them, nothing is added to his usual pay. . .”—Translator of Stavorinus, i. 294.

1803.—“We cannot help thinking, that one day or another, when they are more full of opium than usual, they (the Malays) will run a muck from Cape Comorin to the Caspian.”—Sydney Smith, Works, 3rd ed., iii. 6.

1846.—“On the 8th July, 1846, Sunan, a respectable Malay house-builder in Penang, ran amok . . . killed an old Hindu woman, a Kling, a Chinese boy, and a Kling girl about three years old . . . and wounded two Hindus, three Klings, and two Chinese, of whom only two survived. . . On the trial Sunan declared he did not know what he was about, and persisted in this at the place of execution. . . The amok took place on the 8th, the trial on the 13th, and the execution on the 15th July,—all within 8 days.”—J. Ind. Arch., vol. iii. 460-61.

1849.—“A man sitting quietly among his friends and relatives, will without provocation suddenly start up, weapon in hand, and slay all within his reach. . . . Next day when interrogated . . . the answer has invariably been, “The Devil entered into me, my eyes were darkened, I did not know what I was about.” I have received the same reply on at least 20 different occasions: on examination of these monomaniacs, I have generally found them labouring under some gastric disease, or troublesome ulcer. . . . The Bugis, whether from revenge or disease, are by far the most addicted to run amok. I should think three-fourths of all the cases I have seen have been by persons of this nation.”—Dr T. Oxley, in J. Ind. Archip., iii. 532.

1873.—“They (the English) . . . crave governors who, not having bound themselves beforehand to ‘run amuck,’ may give the land some chance of repose.”—Blackwood’s Magazine, June, p. 759.

1875.—“On being struck the Malay at once stabbed Arshad with a kriss; the blood of the people who had witnessed the deed was aroused, they ran amok, attacked Mr Birch, who was bathing in a floating bath close to the shore, stabbed and killed him.”—Sir W. D. Jeronis to the E. of Carnarvon, Nov. 16, 1875.

1876.—“Twice over, while we were wending our way up the steep hill in Galata, it was our luck to see a Turk ‘run a muck’ . . . nine times out of ten this frenzy is feigned, but not always, as for instance in the case where a priest took to running a-muck on an Austrian Lloyd’s boat on the Black Sea, and after killing one or two passengers, and wounding others, was only stopped by repeated shots from the Captain’s pistol.”—Barkley, Five Years in Bulgaria, 240-41.

1877.—The Times of February 11th mentions a fatal muck run by a Spanish sailor, Manuel Alves, at the Sailors’ Home, Liverpool; and the Overland Times of India (31st August) another run by a sepoy at Meerut.

1879.—“Running a-muck does not seem to be confined to the Malays. At Ravenna, on Monday, when the streets were full of people celebrating the festa of St John the Baptist, a maniac rushed out, snatched up a knife from a butcher’s stall and fell upon everyone he came across . . . before he was captured he wounded more or less seriously 11 persons, among whom was one little child.”—Pall Mall Gazette, July 1.

“Captain Shaw mentioned . . . that he had known as many as 40 people being injured by a single ‘amok’ runner. When the cry ‘amok! amok!’ is raised, people fly to the right and left for shelter, for after the blinded madman’s kriss has once ‘drunk blood,’ his fury becomes ungovernable, his sole desire is to kill: he strikes here and there; he stabs fugitives in the back, his kris drips blood, he rushes on yet more wildly, blood and murder in his course; there are shrieks and groans, his bloodshot eyes start from their sockets, his frenzy gives him unnatural strength; then all of a sudden he drops, shot through the heart, or from sudden exhaustion, clutching his bloody kris."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 358.

ANACONDA, s. This word for a great python, or boa, is of very obscure origin. It is now applied in scientific zoology as the specific name of a great S. American water-snake. Cuvier has "L'Anacondo (Boa scytale et murina, L.—Boa aquatica, Prince Max.)," (Règne Animal, 1829, ii. 78). Again, in the Official Report prepared by the Brazilian Government for the Philadelphia Exhibition of 1876, we find: "Of the genus Boa . . . we may mention the . . . sucuriu or sucuriuba (B. anaconda), whose skins are used for boots and shoes and other purposes." And as the subject was engaging our attention we read the following in the St James' Gazette of April 3, 1882:—"A very unpleasant account is given by a Brazilian paper, the Voz do Povo of Diamantino, of the proceedings of a huge water-snake called the sucuruçu, which is to be found in some of the rivers of Brazil. . . . A slave, with some companions, was fishing with a net in the river, when he was suddenly seized by a sucuruçu, who made an effort with his hinder coils to carry off at the same time another of the fishing party." We had naturally supposed the name to be S. American, and its S. American character was rather corroborated by our finding in Ramusio's version of Pietro Martire d'Angheria such S. American names as Anacauchoa and Anacaona. Serious doubt was however thrown on the American origin of the word when we found that Mr H. W. Bates entirely disbelieved it, and when we failed to trace the name in any older books about S. America.

In fact the oldest authority that we have met with, the famous John Ray, distinctly assigns the name, and the serpent to which the name properly belonged, to Ceylon. This occurs in his Synopsis Methodica Animalium Quadrupedum et Serpentine Generis, Lond. 1693. In this he gives a Catalogue of Indian Serpents, which he had received from his friend Dr Tancred Robinson, and which the latter had noted in Museo Leydensi. No. 8 in this list runs as follows:—

"8. Serpens Indicus Bubalinus, Anacandaia Zeylonensibus, id est Bubalorum aliorumque jumentorum membra conterens," p. 332.

The following passage from St Jerome, giving an etymology, right or wrong, of the word boa, which our naturalists now limit to certain great serpents of America, but which is often popularly applied to the pythons of E. Asia, shows a remarkable analogy to Ray's explanation of the name Anacandaia:—

c. A.D. 395-400.—"Si quidem draco mirae magnitudinis, quos gentili sermone Boas vocant, ab eo quod tam grandes sint ut boves glutire soleant, omnem late vastabat provinciam, et non solum armenta et pecudes sed agricolas quoque et pastores tractos ad se vi spiritus absorbebat."—In Vita Scti. Hilarionis Eremitae, Opera Scti. Eus. Hieron. Venetiis, 1767, ii. col. 35.

Ray adds that on this No. 8 should be read what D. Cleverus has said in the Ephem. German. An 12. obser. 7, entitled: De Serpente magno Indiae Orientalis Urobubalum deglutiente. The serpent in question was 25 feet long. Ray quotes in abridgment the description of its treatment of the buffalo; how, if the resistance is great, the victim is dragged to a tree, and compressed against it; how the noise of the crashing bones is heard as far as a cannon: how the crushed carcass is covered with saliva, etc. It is added that the country people (apparently this is in Amboyna) regard this great serpent as most desirable food.

The following are extracts from Clever's paper, which is, more fully cited, Miscellanea Curiosa, sive Ephemeridum Medico-Physicarum Germanicarum Academiae Naturae Curiosorum, Dec. ii.—Annus Secundus, Anni MDCLXXXIII. Norimbergae. Anno MDCLXXXIV. pp. 18-20. It is illustrated by a formidable but inaccurate picture showing the serpent seizing an ox (not a buffalo) by the muzzle, with huge teeth. He tells how he dissected a great snake that he bought from a huntsman in which he found a whole stag of middle age, entire in skin and every part; and another which contained a wild goat with great horns, likewise quite entire; and a third which had swallowed a porcupine armed with all his "sagittiferis aculeis." In Amboyna a woman great with child had been swallowed by such a serpent. . . .

"Quod si animal quoddam robustius renitatur, ut spiris anguinis enecari non possit, serpens crebris cum animali convolutionibus caudâ suâ proximam arborem in auxilium et robur corporis arripit eamque circumdat, quo eo fortius et valentius gyris suis animal comprimere, suffocare, et demum enecare possit. . . ."

"Factum est hoc modo, ut (quod ex fide dignissimis habeo) in Regno Aracan . . . talis vasti corporis anguis prope flumen quoddam, cum Uro-bubalo, sive sylvestri bubalo aut uro . . . immani spectaculo congregi visus fuerit, eumque dicto modo occiderit; quo conflictu et plusquam hostili amplexu fragor ossium in bubalo comminutorum ad distantiam tormenti bellici majoris . . . a spectatoribus sat eminens stantibus exaudiri potuit. . . ."

The natives said these great snakes had poisonous fangs. These Cleyer could not find, but he believes the teeth to be in some degree venomous, for a servant of his scratched his hand on one of them. It swelled, greatly inflamed, and produced fever and delirium:

"Nec prius cessabant symptomata, quam Serpentinus lapis (see SNAKE-STONE) quam Patres Jesuitae hic componunt, vulnere adaptatus omne venenum extraheret, et ubique symptomata convenientibus antidotis essent profligata."

Again, in 1768, we find in the Scotts Magazine, App. p. 673, but quoted from "London pap. Aug. 1768," and signed by R. Edwin, a professed eye-witness, a story with the following heading: "Description of the Anaconda, a monstrous species of serpent. In a letter from an English gentleman, many years resident in the Island of Ceylon in the East Indies. . . . The Ceylonese seem to know the creature well: they call it Anaconda, and talked of eating its flesh when they caught it." He describes its seizing and disposing of an enormous "tyger." The serpent darts on the "tyger" from a tree, attacking first with a bite, then partially crushing and dragging it to the tree. . . . "winding his body round both the tyger and the tree with all his violence, till the ribs and other bones began to give way . . . each giving a loud crack when it burst . . . the poor creature all this time was living, and at every loud crash of its bones gave a houl, not loud, yet piteous enough to pierce the cruelest heart."

Then the serpent drags away its victim, covers it with slaver, swallows it, etc. The whole thing is very cleverly told, but is evidently a romance founded on the description by "D. Cleyerus," which is quoted by Ray. There are no tigers in Ceylon. In fact, "R. Edwin" has developed the Romance of the Anaconda out of the description of D. Cleyerus, exactly as "Mynheer Försch" some years later developed the Romance of the Upas out of the older stories of the poison tree of Macassar. Indeed, when we find "Dr Andrew Cleyer" mentioned among the early relators of these latter stories, the suspicion becomes strong that both romances had the same author, and that "R. Edwin" was also the true author of the wonderful story told under the name of Foersch. (See further under UPAS.)

In Percival's Ceylon (1803) we read: "Before I arrived in the island I had heard many stories of a monstrous snake, so vast in size as to devour tigers and buffaloes, and so daring as even to attack the elephant" (p. 303). Also, in Pridham's Ceylon and its Dependencies (1849, ii. 750-51): "Pimbera or Anaconda is of the genus Python, Cuvier, and is known in English as the rock-snake." Emerson Tennent (Ceylon, 4th ed., 1860, i. 196) says: "The great python (the 'boa' as it is commonly designated by Europeans, the 'anaconda' of Eastern story) which is supposed to crush the bones of an elephant, and to swallow a tiger" It may be suspected that the letter of "R. Edwin" was the foundation of all or most of the stories alluded to in these passages. Still we have the authority of Ray's friend that Anaconda, or rather Anacondaia, was at Leyden applied as a Ceylonese name to a specimen of this python. The only interpretation of this that we can offer is Tamil ānai-kondra [ānaik-kōnda], "which killed an elephant"; an appellative, but not a name. We have no authority for the application of this appellative to a snake, though the passages quoted from Percival, Pridham, and Tennent are all suggestive of such stories, and the interpretation of the name anacondaia given to Ray: "Bubalorum . . . membra conterens," is at least quite analogous as an appellative. It may be added that in Malay anakanda signifies "one that is well-born," which does not help us. . . [Mr Skeat is unable to trace the word in Malay, and rejects the derivation from anakanda given above. A more plausible explanation is that given by Mr D. Ferguson (8 Ser. N. & Q. xii. 123), who derives anacondaia from Singhalese Henakandayā (hena, 'lightning'; kanda, 'stem, trunk,') which is a name for the whip-snake (Passerita mycterizans); the name of the smaller reptile being by a blunder transferred to the greater. It is at least a curious coincidence that Ogilvy (1670) in his "Description of the African Isles" (p. 690), gives: "Anakandef, a sort of small snakes," which is the Malagasy Anakandify, 'a snake.']

1859.—"The skins of anacondas offered at Bangkok come from the northern provinces."—D. O. King, in J. R. G. Soc., xxx. 184.

ANANAS, s. The Pine-apple (Ananassa sativa, Lindl.; Bromelia Ananas, L.), a native of the hot regions of Mexico and Panama. It abounded, as a cultivated plant, in Hispaniola and all the islands according to Oviedo. The Brazilian Nana, or perhaps Nanas, gave the Portuguese Ananas or Ananaz. This name has, we believe, accompanied the fruit whithersoever, except to England, it has travelled from its home in America. A pine was brought home to Charles V., as related by J. D'Acosta below. The plant is stated to have been first, in Europe, cultivated at Leyden about 1650 (?). In England it first fruited at Richmond, in Sir M. Decker's garden, in 1712.* But its diffusion in the East was early and rapid. To one who has seen the hundreds of acres covered with pine-apples on the islands adjoining Singapore, or their profusion in a seemingly wild state in the valleys of the Kasia country on the eastern borders of Bengal, it is hard to conceive of this fruit as introduced in modern times from another hemisphere. But, as in the case of tobacco, the name bewrayeth its true origin, whilst the large natural family of plants to which it belongs is exclusively American. The names given by Oviedo, probably those of Hispaniola, are Iaiama as a general name, and Boniana and Aiagua for two species. Pine-apples used to cost a pardao (a coin difficult to determine the value of in those days) when first introduced in Malabar, says Linschoten, but "now there are so many grown in the country, that they are good cheape" (91); [Hak. Soc. ii. 19]. Athanasius Kircher, in the middle of the 17th century, speaks of the ananas as produced in great abundance in the Chinese provinces of Canton, Kiangsu and Fuhkien. In Ibn Muhammad Wali's H. of the Conquest of Assam, written in 1662, the pine-apples of that region are commended for size and flavour. In the last years of the preceding century Carletti (1599) already commends the excellent ananas of Malacca. But even some 20 or 30 years earlier the fruit was grown profusely in W. India, as we learn from Chr. d'Acosta (1578). And we know from the Āin that (about 1590) the ananas was habitually served at the table of Akbar, the price of one being reckoned at only 4 dams, or $\frac{1}{16}$ of a rupee; whilst Akbar's son Jahāngīr states that the fruit came from the sea-ports in the possession of the Portuguese.—(See Āin, i. 66-68.)

In Africa too, this royal fruit has spread, carrying the American name along with it. "The Mānānāzi† or pine-apple," says Burton, "grows luxuriantly as far as 3 marches from the coast (of Zanzibar). It is never cultivated, nor have its qualities as a fibrous plant been discovered." (J.R.G.S. xxix. 35). On the Ile Ste Marie, of Madagascar, it grew in the first half of the 17th century as manasse (Flacourt, 29).

Abul Fazl, in the Āin, mentions that the fruit was also called kathal-i-safari, or 'travel jack-fruit,' "because young plants put into a vessel may be taken on travels and will yield fruits." This seems a nonsensical pre-

* The English Cyclop. states on the authority of the Sloane MSS. that the pine was brought into England by the Earl of Portland, in 1690. [See Encycl. Brit., 9th ed., xix. 106.]

† M is here a Suāhili prefix. See Bleek's Comp. Grammar, 189.

ANANAS.

1590.—“The Pine, or Pine-apples, are of the same fashion and forme outwardly to those of Castille, but within they wholly differ. . . . One presented one of these Pine-apples to the Emperour Charles the fift, which must have cost much paine and care to bring it so farre, with the plant from the Indies, yet would he not trie the taste.”—Jas. de Acosta, E. T. of 1604 (Hak. Soc.), 236-7.

1595.—“... with diuers sortes of excellent fruits and rootes, and great abundance of Pinus, the princesse of fruits that grow vnder the Sun.”—Raleigh, Disc. of Guiana (Hak. Soc.), 73.

c. 1610.—“Ananata, et plusieurs autres fruits.”—P. de Laval, i. 236 [Hak. Soc. i. 328].

1616.—“The ananas or Pine, which seems to the taste to be a pleasing compound, made of strawberries, claret-wine, rose-water, and sugar, well tempered together.”—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1469.

1623.—“The ananas is esteemed, and with reason, for it is of excellent flavour, though very peculiar, and rather acid than otherwise, but having an indescribable dash of sweetness that renders it agreeable. And as even these books (Clusius, &c.) don't mention it, if I remember rightly, I will say in brief that when you regard the entire fruit externally, it looks just like one of our pine-cones (pigna), with just such scales, and of that very colour.”—P. della Valle, ii. 582 [Hak. Soc., i. 135].

1631.—Bontius thus writes of the fruit:—
“Qui legitis Cynaras, atque Indica dulcia fraga,
No nimis haec comedas, fugito hinc, latet anguis in herba.”
Lib. vi. cap. 50, p. 145.

1661.—“I first saw the famous Queen Pine brought from Barbados and presented to his Majestie; but the first that were ever seen in England were those sent to Cromwell House foure years since.”—Keelyn's Diary, July 19.

[c. 1665.—“Among other fruits, they preserve large citrons, such as we have in Europe, a certain delicate root about the length of sarsaparilla, that common fruit of the Indies called amba, another called ananas”—Bernier (ed. Constable), 438.]

qui luy succede en toutes ses admirables qualitez.”—P. Du Tertre, Hist. Gén. des Antilles Habitées par les François, ii. 127.

1668.—“Standing by his Majesty at dinner in the Presence, there was of that rare fruit call'd the King-pine, grown in the Barbadoes and the West Indies, the first of them I have ever seene. His Majesty having cut it up was pleas'd to give me a piece off his owne plate to taste of, but in my opinion it falls short of those ravishing varieties of deliciousness describ'd in Capt. Ligon's history and others.”—Keelyn, July 19.

1673.—“The fruit the English call Pine-Apple (the Moors Ananas) because of the Resemblance.”—Fryer, 182.

1716.—“I had more reason to wonder that night at the King's table” (at Hanover) “to see a present from a gentleman of this country what I thought, worth all the rest, two ripe Ananasses, which to my taste are a fruit perfectly delicious. You know they are naturally the growth of the Brasil, and I could not imagine how they came here but by enchantment.”—Lady M. W. Montagu, Letter XIX.

Unboastful worth, above fastidious pomp;
Witness, thou best Anana, thou the pride
Of vegetable life, beyond whate'er
The poets imaged in the golden age.”

Thomson, Summer.

The poet here gives the word an unusual form and accent.

c. 1730.—“They (the Portuguese) cultivate the skirts of the hills, and grow the best products, such as sugar-cane, pine-apples, and rice.”—Khafī Khān, in Elliot, vii. 345.

A curious question has been raised regarding the ananas, similar to that discussed under CUSTARD-APPLE, as in the existence of the pine-apple to the Old World, before the days of Columbus.

In Prof. Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies (i. 578), it is stated in reference to ancient Assyria: “Fruits were highly prized; amongst those of most repute were pomegranates, grapes, citrons, and apparently pine-apples.” A foot-note adds: “The representation is so exact that I can hardly doubt the pine-apple being intended. Mr Layard expresses himself on this point with some hesitation (Nineveh and Babylon, p. 338).” The cut given is something like the conventional figure of a pine-apple, though it seems to us by no means very exact as such. Again, in Winter Jones's tr. of Conti (c. 1430) in India in the 15th Century, the traveller, speaking of a place called Panconia (read Pauconia apparently Pegu) is made to say: "they have pine-apples, oranges, chestnuts, melons, but small and green, white sandal-wood and camphor."

We cannot believe that in either place the object intended was the Ananas, which has carried that American name with it round the world. Whatever the Assyrian representation was intended for, Conti seems to have stated, in the words pinus habent (as it runs in Poggio's Latin) merely that they had pine-trees. We do not understand on what ground the translator introduced pine-apples. If indeed any fruit was meant, it might have been that of the screw-pine, which though not eaten might perhaps have been seen in the bazars of Pegu, as it is used for some economical purposes. But pinus does not mean a fruit at all. 'Pine-cones' even would have been expressed by pineas or the like. [A reference to Mr L. W. King was thus answered: "The identity of the tree with the date-palm is, I believe, acknowledged by all naturalists who have studied the trees on the Assyrian monuments, and the 'cones' held by the winged figures have obviously some connection with the trees. I think it was Prof. Tylor of Oxford (see Academy, June 8, 1886, p. 283) who first identified the ceremony with the fertilization of the palm, and there is much to be said for his suggestion. The date-palm was of very great use to the Babylonians and Assyrians, for it furnished them with food, drink, and building materials, and this fact would explain the frequent repetition on the Assyrian monuments of the ceremony of fertilisation. On the other hand, there is no evidence, so far as I know, that the pine-apple was extensively grown in Assyria." Also see Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 556 seq.; on the use of the pine-cone in Greece, Fraser, Pausanias, iii. 65.]

ANCHEDIVA, ANJEDIVA, n.p.

A small island off the W. coast of India, a little S. of Carwar, which is the subject of frequent and interesting mention in the early narratives. The name is interpreted by Malayālim as añju-divu, 'Five Islands,' and if this is correct belongs to the whole group. This may, however, be only an endeavour to interpret an old name, which is perhaps traceable in 'Ανχιδίω Νῆσος of Ptolemy. It is a remarkable example of the slovenliness of English professional map-making that Keith Johnston's Royal Atlas map of India contains no indication of this famous island. [The Times Atlas and Constable's Hand Atlas also ignore it.] It has, between land surveys and sea-charts, been omitted altogether by the compilers. But it is plain enough in the Admiralty charts; and the way Mr Birch speaks of it in his translation of Albuquerque as an "Indian seaport, no longer marked on the maps," is odd (ii. 168).

c. 1345.—Ibn Batuta gives no name, but Anjediva is certainly the island of which he thus speaks: "We left behind us the island (of Sindābūr or Goa), passing close to it, and cast anchor by a small island near the mainland, where there was a temple, with a grove and a reservoir of water. When we had landed on this little island we found there a Jogi leaning against the wall of a Budkhānah or house of idols."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 63.

The like may be said of the Roteiro of V. da Gama's voyage, which likewise gives no name, but describes in wonderful correspondence with Ibn Batuta; as does Correa, even to the Jogi, still there after 150 years!

1498.—"So the Captain-Major ordered Nicolas Coello to go in an armed boat, and see where the water was; and he found in the same island a building, a church of great ashlar-work, which had been destroyed by the Moors, as the country people said, only the chapel had been covered with straw, and they used to make their prayers to three black stones in the midst of the body of the chapel. Moreover they found, just beyond the church, a tanque of wrought ashlar, in which we took as much water as we wanted; and at the top of the whole island stood a great tanque of the depth of 4 fathoms, and moreover we found in front of the church a beach where we careened the ship."—Roteiro, 95.

1510.—"I quitted this place, and went to another island which is called Anzediva. . . There is an excellent port between the island and the mainland, and very good water is found in the said island."—Varthema, 120.

c. 1552.—"Dom Francesco de Almeida arriving at the Island of Anchediva, the first thing he did was to send João Homem with letters to the factors of Cananor, Cochin, and Coulão. . . ."—Barros, I. viii. 9.

c. 1561.—"They went and put in at Ange-diva, where they enjoyed themselves much; there were good water springs, and there was in the upper part of the island a tank built with stone, with very good water, and much wood; . . . there were no inhabitants, only a beggar man whom they called Joguedes . . . —Correa, Hak. Soc. 239.

1727.—“In January, 1664, my Lord (Marlborough) went back to England . . . and left Sir Abraham with the rest, to pass the westerly Monsoons, in some Port on the Coast, but being unacquainted, chose a desolate Island called Anjadwa, to winter at. . . Here they stayed from April to October, in which time they buried above 200 of their Men.”—A. Hamilton, i. 182. At p. 274 the name is printed more correctly Anjediva.

ANDAMAN, n.p. The name of a group of islands in the Bay of Bengal, inhabited by tribes of a negrito race, and now partially occupied as a convict settlement under the Government of India. The name (though perhaps obscurely indicated by Ptolemy—see H. Y. in P.R.G.S. 1881, p. 665) first appears distinctly in the Ar. narratives of the 9th century. [The Ar. dual form is said to be from Agamitae, the Malay name of the aborigines.] The persistent charge of cannibalism seems to have been unfounded. [See E. H. Man, On the Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands, Intro. xiii. 45.]

A.D. 851.—“Beyond are two islands divided by a sea called Andāmān. The natives of these isles devour men alive; their hue is black, their hair woolly; their countenance and eyes have something frightful in them . . . they go naked, and have no boats. . . .”—Relation des Voyages, &c. par Reinand, i. 8.

c. 1050.—These islands are mentioned in the great Tanjore temple-inscription (11th cent.) as Timaitūm, ‘Islands of Impurity,’ inhabited by cannibals.

c. 1292.—“Angamanain is a very large Island. The people are without a King and are idolators, and are no better than wild beasts . . . they are a most cruel generation, and eat everybody that they can catch if not of their own race.”—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. c. 13.

c. 1430.—“. . . leaving on his right hand an island called Andemania, which means the island of Gold, the circumference of which is 800 miles. The inhabitants are cannibals. No travellers touch here unless driven to do so by bad weather, for when taken they are torn to pieces and devoured by these cruel savages.”—Conti, in India in XV. Cent., 8.

c. 1566.—“Da Nicubar sinò a Pegu é vna catena d’Isole infinite, delle quali molte sono habitate da gente seluaggia, e chiamansi Isole d’Andeman . . . e se per disgratia si perde in queste Isole qualche naue, come già se n’ha perso, non ne scampa alcuno, che tutti gli amazzano, e mangiano.”—Cesare de’ Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391.

1727.—“The Islands opposite the Coast of Tanacerin are the Andemans. They lie about 80 leagues off, and are surrounded by many dangerous Banks and Rocks; they are all inhabited with Canibals, who are so fearless that they will swim off to a Boat if she approach near the shore, and attack her with their wooden Weapons . . .”—A. Hamilton, ii. 65.

ANDOR, s. Port. ‘a litter,’ and used in the old Port. writers for a palankin. It was evidently a kind of Muncheel or Dandy, i.e. a slung hammock rather than a palankin. But still, as so often is the case, comes in another word to create perplexity. For andas is, in Port., a bier or a litter, appearing in Bluteau as a genuine Port. word, and the use of which by the writer of the Roteiro quoted below shows that it is so indeed. And in defining Andor the same lexicographer says: “A portable vehicle in India, in those regions where they do not use beasts, as in Malabar and elsewhere. It is a kind of contrivance like an uncovered Andas, which men bear on their shoulders, &c. . . . Among us Andor is a machine with four arms in which images or reliques of the saints are borne in processions.” This last term is not, as we had imagined an old Port. word. It is Indian, in fact Sanskrit, hindola, ‘a swing, a swinging cradle or hammock,’ whence also Mahr. hindolā, and H. hindolā or handolā. It occurs, as will be seen, in the old Ar. work about Indian wonders, published by MM. Van der Lith and Marcel Devic. [To this Mr Skeat adds that in Malay andor means ‘a buffalo-sledge for carting rice,’ &c. It would appear to be the same as the Port. word, though it is hard to say which is the original.]

1013.—“Le même m’a conté qu’à Sérendib, les rois et ceux qui se comportent à la façon des rois, se font porter dans le handoul (handūl) qui est semblable à une litière, soutenu sur les épaules de quelques piétons.”—Kitāb ‘Ajāib-ul Hind, p. 118.

1498.—“After two days had passed he (the Catual [Cotwal]) came to the factory in an andor which men carried on their shoulders, and these (andors) consist of great canes which are bent overhead and arched, and from these are hung certain cloths of a half fathom wide, and a fathom and a half long, and at the ends are pieces of wood to bear the cloth which hangs from the cane; and laid over the cloth there is a great mattresses of the same size, and this all made of silk-stuff wrought with gold-thread, and with many decorations and fringes and tassels; whilst the ends of the cane are mounted with silver, all very gorgeous, and rich, like the lords who travel so."—Correa, i. 102.

1552.—"The Moors all were on foot, and their Captain was a valiant Turk, who as being their Captain, for the honour of the thing was carried in an Andor on the shoulders of 4 men, from which he gave his orders as if he were on horseback."—Barros, II. vi. viii.

[1574.—See quotation under PUNDIT.]

1623.—Della Valle describes three kinds of shoulder-borne vehicles in use at Goa: (1) reti or nets, which were evidently the simple hammock, muncheel or dandy; (2) the andor; and (3) the palankin. "And these two, the palankins and the andors, also differ from one another, for in the andor the cane which sustains it is, as it is in the reti, straight; whereas in the palankin, for the greater convenience of the inmate, and to give more room for raising his head, the cane is arched upward like this. Ω . For this purpose the canes are bent when they are small and tender. And these vehicles are the most commodious and honourable that have the curved canes, for such canes, of good quality and strength to bear the weight, are not numerous; so they sell for 100 or 120 pardaos each, or about 60 of our endi."—P. della Valle, ii. 610.

c. 1760.—"Of the same nature as palankens, but of a different name, are what they call andolas . . . these are much cheaper, and less esteemed."—Grose, i. 155.

ANDRUM, s. Malayāl. āndrum. The form of hydrocele common in S. India. It was first described by Kaempfer, in his Decas, Leyden, 1694. —(See also his Amoenitates Exoticae, Fascic. iii. pp. 557 seqq.)

ANGELY-WOOD, s. Tam. anjili-, or anjali-maram; artocarpus hirsuta Lam. [in Malabar also known as Iyne (āyini) (Logan, i. 39)]. A wood of great value on the W. Coast, for shipbuilding, house-building, &c.

c. 1550.—"In the most eminent parts of it (Siam) are thick Forests of Angelin wood, whereof thousands of ships might be made."—Pinto, in Cogua, p. 285; see also p. 64.

1598.—"There are in India other wonderful and thicke trees, whereof Shippes are made: there are trees by Cochin, that are called Angelina, whereof certaine scutes or skiffes called Tones [Doney] are made . . . it is so strong and hard a woode that Iron in tract of time would bee consumed thereby by reason of the hardness of the woode."—Lincolnton, ch. 58 [Hak. Soc. ii. 56].

1644.—"Another thing which this province of Mallavar produces, in abundance and of excellent quality, is timber, particularly that called Angelim, which is most durable, lasting many years, inasmuch that even if you desire to build a great number of ships, or vessels of any kind . . . you may make them all in a year."—Barros, MS. f. 315.

ANGENGO, n.p. A place on the Travancore coast, the site of an old English Factory; properly said to be Añju-tengu, Añchutennu, Malayāl; the trivial meaning of which would be "five cocoa-nuts." This name gives rise to the marvellous rhapsody of the once famous Abbé Raynal, regarding "Sterne's Eliza," of which we quote below a few sentences from the 3½ pages of close print which it fills.

1711.—". . . Anjengo is a small Fort belonging to the English East India Company. There are about 40 Soldiers to defend it . . . most of whom are Topazes, or mungrel Portuguese."—Lockyer, 189.

1782.—"Territoire d'An'inga; tu n'es rien; mais tu as donné naissance à Eliza. Un jour, ces entrepôts . . . ne subsisteront plus . . . mais si mes écrits ont quelque durée, le nom d'An'inga restera dans le mémoire des hommes . . . Anjinga, c'est à l'influence de ton heureux climat qu'elle devoit, sans doute, cet accord presque incompatible de volupté et de décence qui accompagnoit toute sa personne, et qui se mêloit à tous ses mouvements, &c., &c."—Hist. Philosophique des Deux Indes, ii. 72-73.

ANICUT, s. Used in the irrigation of the Madras Presidency for the dam constructed across a river to fill and regulate the supply of the channels drawn off from it; the cardinal work in fact of the great irrigation systems. The word, which has of late years become familiar all over India, is the Tam. comp. anai-kattu, 'Dam-building.'

1776.—"Sir . . . We have received your letter of the 24th. If the Rajah pleases to go to the Anacut, to see the repair of the bank, we can have no objection, but it will not be shares in land, or shares in a speculation. Thus a one-anna share is $\frac{1}{16}$ of such right, or a share of $\frac{1}{16}$ in the speculation; a four-anna is $\frac{1}{4}$, and so on. In some parts of India the term is used as subdivision ($\frac{1}{16}$) of the current land measure. Thus, in Sangor, the anna=16 rūsā, and is itself $\frac{1}{16}$ of a kuncha (Elliot, Gloss. s.v.). The term is also sometimes applied colloquially to persons of mixt parentage. 'Such a one has at least 2 annas of dark blood,' or 'coffee-colour.' This may be compared with the Scotch expression that a person of deficient intellect 'wants twopence in the shilling.'

1708.—"Provided . . . that a debt due from Sir Edward Littleton . . . of 80,407 Rupees and Eight Annas Money of Bengal, with Interest and Damages to the said English Company shall still remain to them. . . ."—Earl of Godolphin's Accord between the Old and the New E. I. Co., in Charters, &c., p. 358.

1727.—"The current money in Surat :
Bitter Almonds go 32 to a Pice :

1 Annoc is 4 Pice.
1 Rupee 16 Annocs.

In Bengal their Accounts are kept in Pice :

A. Hamilton, ii. App. pp. 5, 8.

ANT, WHITE. s. The insect (Termes bellicosus of naturalists) not properly an ant, of whose destructive powers there are in India so many disagreeable experiences, and so many marvellous stories. The phrase was perhaps taken up by the English from the Port. formigas branchas, which is in Bluteau's Dict. (1713, iv. 175). But indeed exactly the same expression is used in the 14th century by our medieval authority. It is, we believe, a fact that these insects have been established at Rochelle in France, for a long period, and more recently at St. Helena. They exist also at the Convent of Mt. Sinai, and a species in Queensland.

A.D. c. 250.—It seems probable that Aelian speaks of White Ants.—"But the Indian ants construct a kind of heaped-up dwellings, and these not in depressed or flat positions easily liable to be flooded, but in lofty and elevated positions. . ."—De Nat. Animal. xvi. cap. 15.

c. 1328.—"Est etiam unum genus parvissimarum formicarum sicut lana albarum, quarum durities dentium tanta est quod etiam ligna rodunt et venas lapidum; et quotquot breviter inveniunt siccum super terram, et pannos laneos, et bombycinos laniant; et faciunt ad modum muri crustam unam de arena minutissimā, ita quod sol non possit eas tangere; et sic remanent coepertae; verum est quod si contingat illam crustam frangi, et solem eas tangere, quam citius moriuntur.—Fr. Jordanus, p. 53.

1679.—"But there is yet a far greater inconvenience in this Country, which proceeds from the infinite number of white Emmets, which though they are but little, have teeth so sharp, that they will eat down a wooden Post in a short time. And if great care be not taken in the places where you lock up your Bales of Silk, in four and twenty hours they will eat through a Bale, as if it had been saw'd in two in the middle."—Tavernier's Tour, E. T., p. 11.

1688.—"Here are also abundance of Ants of several sorts, and Wood-lice, called by the English in the East Indies, White Ants."—Dampier, ii. 127.

1713.—"On voit encore des fourmis de plusieurs espèces: la plus pernicieuse est celle que les Européens ont nommé fourmi blanche."—Lettres Edifiantes, xii. 98.

1727.—"He then began to form Projects how to clear Accounts with his Master's Creditors, without putting anything in their Pockets. The first was on 500 chests of Japan Copper . . . and they were brought into Account of Profit and Loss, for so much eaten up by the White Ants."—A. Hamilton, ii. 169.

1751.—". . . concerning the Organ, we sent for the Revd. Mr. Bellamy, who declared that when Mr. Frankland applied to him for it that he told him that it was not in his power to give it, but wished it was removed from thence, as Mr. Pearson informed him it was eaten up by the White Ants."—Ft. Will. Cons., Aug. 12. In Long, 25.

1789.—"The White Ant is an insect greatly dreaded in every house; and this is not to be wondered at, as the devastation it occasions is almost incredible."—Munro, Narrative, 31.

1876.—"The metal cases of his baggage are disagreeably suggestive of White Ants, and such omnivorous vermin."—Sat. Review, No. 1057, p. 6.

APIL, s. Transfer of Eng. 'Appeal'; in general native use, in connection with our Courts.

1872.—"There is no Sindhi, however wild, that cannot now understand 'Rasid' (receipt) [Raseed] and 'Apil' (appeal)."—Burton, Sind Recisited, i. 283.

APOLLO BUNDER, n.p. A well-known wharf at Bombay. A street near it is called Apollo Street, and a gate of the Fort leading to it 'the Apollo

a. 1590.—"There are fine horses bred in every part of the country; but those of Cachh excell, being equal to Araba."—Ala, i. 123.

1825.—"Arabs are excessively scarce and dear; and one which was sent for me to look at, at a price of 800 rupees, was a skittish, out-legged thing."—Heber, i. 189 (ed. 1844).

c. 1844.—A local magistrate at Simla had returned from an unsuccessful investigation. An acquaintance hailed him next day: 'No I hear you came back re infecta?' 'No such thing,' was the reply; 'I came back on my grey Arab!'

" . . . the true blood-royal of his race,
The silver Arab with his purple veins
Translucent, and his nostrils caverned wide,
And flaming eye. . . ."
The Banyan Tree.

ARAKAN, ARRACAN, n.p. This is an European form, perhaps through Malay [which Mr Skeat has failed to trace], of Rakkhang, the name which the natives give themselves. This is believed by Sir Arthur Phayre [see Journ. As. Soc. Ben. xii. 24 seq.] to be a corruption of the Skt. rakshasa, Pali rakkhāso, i.e. 'ogre' or the like, a word applied by the early Buddhists to unconverted tribes with whom they came in contact. It is not impossible that the Ἀρρακάν of Ptolemy, which unquestionably represents Arakan, may disguise the name by which the country is still known to foreigners; at least no trace of the name as 'Silver-land' in old Indian Geography has yet been found. We may notice, without laying any stress upon it, that in Mr. Beal's account of early Chinese pilgrims to India, there twice occurs mention of an Indo-Chinese kingdom called O-li-ki-lo, which transliterates fairly into some name like Aryyā, and not into any other yet recognisable (see J.R.A.S. (N.S.) xiii. 560, 562).

c. 1420-30.—"Mari deinceps cum mense integro ad ostium Rachani fluvii pervenisset."—N. Conti, in Poggia, De Varietate Fortunae.

[c. 1585.—"Arquam": See CAPELAN.]

1545.—"They told me that coming from India in the ship of Jorge Manhoz (who was a householder in Goa), towards the Port of Chatigao in the kingdom of Bengal, they were wrecked upon the shoals of Racan owing to a badly-kept watch."—Pinto, cap. cxvii.

1552.—"Up to the Cape of Negraes . . . will be 100 leagues, in which space are these populated places, Chocorid, Bacold, Arracole City, capital of the kingdom so styled. . . ."
—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1568.—"Quanto Re di Rachan ha il suo stato in mezzo la costa, tra il Regno di Bengala e quello di Pegu, ed è il maggiore nemico che habbia il Re del Pegu."—Osorio de Fiterici, in Ramusio, iii. 360.

1586.—" . . . Passing by the Island of Sundina, Porto grande, or the Countrie of Tippera, the Kingdom of Racan and Mogora (Mugg) . . . our course was E. and by E. which brought us to the barre of Negraes."—R. Fitch, in Hall, ii. 391.

c. 1590.—"To the N.E. of Bengal is a large country called Arkang to which the Bander of Chittagong properly belongs."—Shadrin's Aqeen, ed. 1800, ii. 4. [Ed. Jarrett, ii. 119] in orig. (i. 388) Arkhang.

[1659.—Aracan. See TALAPOIN.]

1680.—"Despatches about this time arrived from Mu'azzam Khān, reporting his successive victories and the flight of Shuja to the country of Rakhang, leaving Bengal undefended."—Kādī Khān, in Asiatic, vii. 254.

c. 1665.—"Knowing that it is impossible to pass any Cavalry by land, so, not so much as any Infantry, from Bengale into Rakan, because of the many channels and rivers upon the Frontiers . . . he (the Governor of Bengal) thought upon this experiment, viz. to engage the Hollanders in his design. He therefore sent a kind of Ambassador to Batavia."—Bernier, E. T., 55 [(ed. Constable, 180)].

1678.—" . . . A mixture of that Race, the most accursedly base of all Mankind who are known for their Bastard-brood lurking in the Islands at the Mouths of the Ganges, by the name of Racanians."—Fryer, 219. (The word is misprinted Bucanians; but see Fryer's Index.)

1728.—"It is called by some Portuguese Orrakan, by others among them Arrakoon, and by some again Rakan (after its capital) and also Mog (Mugg)."—Faloutin, v. 140.

1727.—"Arackan has a Conventiency of a noble spacious River."—A. Hamilton, ii. 30.

ARBOL TRISTE, s. The tree or shrub, so called by Port. writers, appears to be the Nyctanthes arbor tristis, or Arabian jessamine (N. O. Jasminaceae), a native of the drier parts of India.

[The quotations explain the origin of the name.]

[c. 1610.—“Many of the trees they call tristes, of which they make saffron.”—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc., i. 411.

“That tree called triste, which is produced in the East Indies, is so named because it blooms only at night.”—Ibid. ii. 362; and see Burnell's Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 58-62.

ARCOT, n.p. Arkatt, a famous fortress and town in the Madras territory, 65 miles from Madras. The name is derived by Bp. Caldwell from Tam. arkdd, the ‘Six Forests,’ confirmed by the Tam-Fr. Dict. which gives a form drukddu=‘Six forêts’ [“the abode of six Rishis in former days. There are several places of this name in the southern districts besides the town of Arcot near Vellore. One of these in Tanjore would correspond better than that with Harkatu of Ibn Batuta, who reached it on the first evening of his march inland after landing from Ceylon, apparently on the shallow coast of Madura or Tanjore.”—Madras Ad. Man. ii. 211]. Notwithstanding the objection made by Maj.-Gen. Cunningham in his Geog. of Ancient India, it is probable that Arcot is the Ἀρκατοῦ βασιλείου Σῶπα of Ptolemy, ‘Arkatu, residence of K. Sora.’

c. 1346.—“We landed with them on the beach, in the country of Ma’bar . . . we arrived at the fortress of Harkattū, where we passed the night.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 187, 188.

1785.—“It may be said that this letter was written by the Nabob of Arcot in a moody humour. . . . Certainly it was; but it is in such humours that the truth comes out.”—Burke's Speech, Feb. 28th.

ARECA, s. The seed (in common parlance the nut) of the palm Areca catechu, L., commonly, though somewhat improperly, called ‘betel-nut’; the term Betel belonging in reality to the leaf which is chewed along with the areca. Though so widely cultivated, the palm is unknown in a truly indigenous state. The word is Malayāl. adakka [according to Bp.

Caldwell, from adai ‘close arrangement of the cluster,’ kay, ‘nut’ N.E.D.], and comes to us through the Port.

1510.—“When they eat the said leaves (betel), they eat with them a certain fruit which is called coffolo, and the tree of the said coffolo is called Arecha.”—Varthema, Hak. Soc., 144.

1516.—“There arrived there many zambucos [Sambook] . . . with areca.”—Barbosa, Hak. Soc., 64.

1521.—“They are always chewing Arecca, a certaine Fruit like a Peare, cut in quarters and rolled up in leaves of a Tree called Bettre (or Vettele), like Bay leaves; which having chewed they spit forth. It makes the mouth red. They say they doe it to comfort the heart, nor could live without it.”—Pigafetta, in Purchas, i. 38.

1548.—“In the Renda do Betel, or Betel duties at Goa are included Betel, arequa, jacks, green ginger, oranges, lemons, figs, coir, mangoes, citrons.”—Botelho, Tombo, 48. The Port. also formed a word ariqueira for the tree bearing the nuts.

1563.—“. . . and in Malabar they call it pac (Tam. pāt); and the Nairs (who are the gentlemen) call it areca.”—Garcia D'O., f. 91 b.

c. 1566.—“Great quantitie of Archa, which is a fruite of the bignesse of nutmegs, which fruite they eate in all these parts of the Indies, with the leafe of an Herbe, which they call Bettell.”—C. Frederike, transl. in Hakl. ii. 350.

1586.—“Their friends come and bring gifts, cocos, figges, arrecas, and other fruits.”—Fitch, in Hakl., ii. 395.

1689.—“. . . the Neri which is drawn from the Arequies Tree in a fresh earthen vessel, is as sweet and pleasant as Milk”—Ovington, 237. [Neri=H. and Mahr. nir, ‘sap,’ but neri is, we are told, Guzerati for toddy in some form.]

ARGEMONE MEXICANA. This American weed (N.O. Papaveraceae) is notable as having overrun India, in every part of which it seems to be familiar. It is known by a variety of names, Firinghī dhatūra, gamboge thistle, &c. [See Watt, Dict. Econ. Prod., i. 306 seqq.]

ARGUS PHEASANT, s. This name, which seems more properly to belong to the splendid bird of the Malay Peninsula (Argusianus giganteus, Tem., Pavo argus, Lin.), is confusingly applied in Upper India to the Himalayan horned pheasant Cerionis (Spp. adrya, and melanorephala) from the round white eyes or spots which mark a great part of the bird's plumage.—See remark under MOONAU.

ARRACK, RACK, s. This word is the Ar. arak, properly 'perspiration,' and then, first the exudation or sap drawn from the date palm (arak al-tamar); secondly any strong drink, 'distilled spirit,' 'essence,' etc. But it has spread to very remote corners of Asia. Thus it is used in the forms ariki and arki in Mongolia and Manchuria, for spirit distilled from grain. In India it is applied to a variety of common spirits; in S. India to those distilled from the fermented sap of sundry palms; in E. and N. India to the spirit distilled from cane-molasses, and also to that from rice. The Turkish form of the word, arak, is applied to a spirit made from grape-skins; and in Syria and Egypt to a spirit flavoured with aniseed, made in the Lebanon. There is a popular or slang Fr. word, riquiri, for brandy, which appears also to be derived from arak (Marcel Devic). Humboldt (Essays, &c., ii. 300) says that the word first appears in Pigafetta's Voyage of Magellan; but this is not correct.

c. 1420.—"At every jam (port-house) they give the travellers a sheep, a goose, a fowl . . . arak . . ."—Shah Rukh's Embassy to China, in N. & E., xiv. 396.

1516.—"And they bring cocoa-nuts, hurraes (which is something to drink) . . ."—Barbon, Hak. Soc. 69.

1518.—"que todos os mantimentos say de pão, como vinhos, arracas, arrozes, carnes, e pescados."—In Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 2, 57.

1521.—"When these people saw the politeness of the captain, they presented some fish, and a vessel of palm-wine, which they call in their language uraca . . ."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 72.

1544.—"Manueli a cruce . . . commendo ut plurimum invigilet duobus illis Christianis Carearum pagis, diligenter attendere . . . nemo potu Orracas se inebriet . . . si ex hoc deinceps tempore Punicali Orracha potetur, ipso ad mihi suo gravi damno hituros."—Sci. Fr. Xac. Rpiat., p. 111.

1554.—"And the excise on the orraqas made from palm-trees, of which there are three kinds, viz., cura, which is as it is drawn; orraqa, which is cura once boiled (curada, i.e. distilled); sharab (araso) which is boiled two or three times and is stronger than orraqa."—N. Botelho, Tombo, 50.

1563.—"One kind (of coco-palm) they keep to bear fruit, the other for the sake of the cura, which is coco musta; and this when it has been distilled they call orraqa."—Baron H.O., f. 67. (The word arad, used here, is a very ancient importation from India, for Cosmas (8th century) in his account of the coco-nut, confounding (it would seem) the milk with the toddy of that palm, says: "The Argellon is at first full of a very sweet water, which the Indians drink from the nut, using it instead of wine. This drink is called thomomara, and is extremely pleasant." It is indeed possible that the thomomara here may already be the word arrack.)

1605.—"A Chinese borne, but now turned Indian, who was our next neighbour . . . and brewed Arack which is a kind of hot drinke, that is used in most of these parts of the world, instead of Wine. . ."—E. Scot, in Purchas, i. 173.

1631.—" . . . jocur . . . a potu iustus maledicti Arac, non tantum in temperamento immutatum, sed etiam in substantia sua corrumpitur."—Jac. Barthez, lib. ii. cap. vii. p. 22.

1687.—"Two jars of Arack (made of rice as I judged) called by the Chinese Samsak [Samsakoo]."—Thompson, i. 419.

1719.—"We exchanged some of our wares for opium and some arrack . . ."—Robinson Crusoe, Pt. II.

1727.—"Mr Boucher had been 14 Months soliciting to procure his Pharmacy; but his repeated Petitions . . . had no Effect. But he had an Englishman, one Sloan, for his Interpreter, who often took a large Dose of Arrack . . . Swan got pretty near the King (Anrungenzel) . . . and cried with a loud Voice in the Persian Language that his Master wanted Justice done him" (see DOAI).—A. Hamilton, i. 97.

Rack is a further corruption; and rack-punch is perhaps not quite obsolete.

1603.—"We taking the But-ends of Pikes and Halberts and Faggot-sticks, drave them into a Racke-house."—E. Scot, in Purchas, i. 184.

Purchas also has Vraca and other forms; and at i. 618 there is mention of a strong kind of spirit called Rack-uppe (Malay spt = 'fire'). See FOOL'S RACK.

1616.—"Some small quantitie of Wine, but not common, is made among them; they call it Rack, distilled from Sugar and a spice Rinde of a Tree called Jagra [Jaggery]."—Terra, in Purchas, ii. 1470.

1622.—"We'll send him a jar of rack by next conveyance"—Letter in Sainsbury, iii. 40.

1627.—“Java hath been fatal to many of the English, but much through their own distemper with Rack.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 693.

1848.—“Joe . . . finally insisted upon having a bowl of rack punch. . . . That bowl of rack punch was the cause of all this history.”—Vanity Fair, ch. vi.

ARSENAL, s. An old and ingenious etymology of this word is arz navalis. But it is really Arabic. Hyde derives it from tars-khānah, ‘domus terroris,’ contracted into tarsdnah, the form (as he says) used at Constantinople (Syntagma Dissertt., i. 100). But it is really the Ar. dar-al-ṣind’a, ‘domus artificii,’ as the quotations from Mas’ūdī clearly show. The old Ital. forms darsena, darsinale corroborate this, and the Sp. atarazana, which is rendered in Ar. by Pedro de Alcalá, quoted by Dozy, as dar a cinaa.—(See details in Dozy, Oosterlingen, 16-18.)

A.D. 943-4.—“At this day in the year of the Hijra 332, Rhodes (Rodas) is an arsenal (dār-ṣind’a) where the Greeks build their war-vessels.”—Mas’ūdī, ii. 423. And again “dār-ṣind’at al marākib,” ‘an arsenal of ships,’ iii. 67.

1573.—“In this city (Fez) there is a very great building which they call Daraçana, where the Christian captives used to labour at blacksmith’s work and other crafts under the superintendence and orders of renegade headmen . . . here they made cannon and powder, and wrought swords, cross-bows, and arquebusses.”—Marmol, Desc. General de Affrica, lib. iii. f. 92.

1672.—“On met au Tershana deux belles galères à l’eau.”—Antoine Galland, Journ., i. 80.

ART, EUROPEAN. We have heard much, and justly, of late years regarding the corruption of Indian art and artistic instinct by the employment of the artists in working for European patrons, and after European patterns. The copying of such patterns is no new thing, as we may see from this passage of the brightest of writers upon India whilst still under Asiatic government.

c. 1665.—“. . . . not that the Indians have not wit enough to make them successful in Arts, they doing very well (as to some of them) in many parts of India, and it being found that they have inclination enough for them, and that some of them make (even without a Master) very pretty workmanship and imitate so well our work of Europe, that the difference thereof will hardly be discerned.”—Bernier, E. T., 81-82 [ed. Constable, 254].

ARTIOHOKE, s. The genealogy of this word appears to be somewhat as follows: The Ar. is al-ḥarshūf (perhaps connected with harash, ‘rough-skinned’) or al-kharshūf; hence Sp. alcarchofa and It. carcioffo and arciocco, Fr. artichaut, Eng. artichoke.

c. 1348.—“The Incense (benzoin) tree is small . . . its branches are like those of a thistle or an artichoke (al-kharshaf).”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 240. Al-kharshaf in the published text. The spelling with k instead of kh is believed to be correct (see Dozy, s.v. Alcarchofa); [also see N.E.D. s.v. Artichoke].

ARYAN, adj. Skt. Ārya, ‘noble.’ A term frequently used to include all the races (Indo-Persic, Greek, Roman, Celtic, Slavonic, &c.) which speak languages belonging to the same family as Sanskrit. Much vogue was given to the term by Pictet’s publication of Les Origines Indo-Européennes, ou les Aryas Primitifs (Paris, 1859), and this writer seems almost to claim the name in this sense as his own (see quotation below). But it was in use long before the date of his book. Our first quotation is from Ritter, and there it has hardly reached the full extent of application. Ritter seems to have derived the use in this passage from Lassen’s Pentapotamia. The word has in great measure superseded the older term Indo-Germanic, proposed by F. Schlegel at the beginning of the last century. The latter is, however, still sometimes used, and M. Hovelacque, especially, prefers it. We may observe here that the connection which evidently exists between the several languages classed together as Aryan cannot be regarded, as it was formerly, as warranting an assumption of identity of race in all the peoples who speak them.

It may be noted as curious that among the Javanese (a people so remote in blood from what we understand by Aryan), the word drya is commonly used as an honorary prefix to the names of men of rank; a survival of the ancient Hindu influence on the civilisation of the island.

The earliest use of Aryan in an ethnic sense is in the Inscription on the tomb of Darius, in which the king calls himself an Aryan, and of Aryan descent, whilst Ormuzd is in the Median version styled, ‘God of the Aryans’

B.C. c. 486.—“Adam Daryavush Khashaya-thiya vasarka Pāraa, Pār-sahiya putra, Ariya, Ariya chitra.” i.e. “I (am) Darius, the Great King, the King of Kings, the King of all inhabited countries, the King of this great Earth far and near, the son of Hystaspes, an Achaemenian, a Persian, an Arian, of Arian descent.”—In Rawlinson's Herodotus, 3rd ed., iv, 250.

“These Medes were called anciently by all people Ariana, but when Medæa, the Colchian, came to them from Athens, they changed their name.”—Herodot., vii. 62 (Rawlins).

1835.—“Those eastern and proper Indians, whose territory, however, Alexander never touched by a long way, call themselves in the most ancient period Arians (Arier) (Manu, ii. 22, x. 45), a name coinciding with that of the ancient Medes.”—Ritter, v. 458.

1838.—See also Ritter, viii. 17 seqq.; and Potto's art. in Erach & Grueber's Encyc., ii. 18, 46.

1850.—“The Aryan tribes in conquering India, urged by the Brahmans, made war against the Turanian demon-worship, but not always with complete success.”—Dr. J. Wilson, in Life, 450.

1851.—“We must request the patience of our readers whilst we give a short outline of the component members of the great Arian family. The first is the Sanskrit. . . . The second branch of the Arian family is the Persian. . . . There are other scions of the Arian stock which struck root in the soil of Asia, before the Arians reached the shores of Europe. . . .”—(Prof. Max Müller) Edinburgh Review, Oct. 1851, pp. 312-313.

1853.—“Sur les sept premières civilisations, qui sont celles de l'ancien monde, six appartiennent, en partie au moins, à la race ariane.”—Gobineau, De l'Inégalité des Races Humaines, i. 364.

1855.—“I believe that all who have lived in India will bear testimony that to natives of India, of whatever class or caste, Mussulman, Hindoo, or Parsee, ‘Aryan or Tamulian,’ unless they have had a special training, our European paintings, prints, drawings, and photographs, plain or coloured, if they are landscapes, are absolutely unintelligible.”—Fule, Mission to Ava, 59 (publ. 1858).

1858.—“The Aryan tribes—for that is the name they gave themselves, both in their old and new homes—brought with them institutions of a simplicity almost primitive.”—Whitney, Or. & Ling. Studies, ii. 5.

1861.—“Latin, again, with Greek, and the Celtic, the Teutonic, and Slavonic languages, together likewise with the ancient dialects of India and Persia, must have sprung from an earlier language, the mother of the whole Indo-European or Aryan family of speech.”—Prof. Max Müller, Lectures, 1st Ser. 32.

We also find the verb Aryanize :

1858.—“Thus all India was brought under the sway, physical or intellectual and moral, of the alien race; it was thoroughly Aryanized.”—Whitney, u. s. 7.

ASHRAFE, a. Arab. ashrafi, ‘noble,’ applied to various gold coins (in analogy with the old English ‘noble’), especially to the dīndr of Egypt, and to the Gold Mohur of India.—See XERAFINE.

c. 1550.—“There was also the sum of 500,000 Falory ashrafies equal in the currency of Persia to 50,000 royal Irak tomāns.”—Mem. of Humayun, 125. A note suggests that Falory, or Flori, indicates florin.

ASSAM, n.p. The name applied for the last three centuries or more to the great valley of the Brahmaputra River, from the emergence of its chief sources from the mountains till it enters the great plain of Bengal. The name Āxim and sometimes Āshdm is a form of Āhām or Āhom, a dynasty of Shan race, who entered the country in the middle ages, and long ruled it. Assam politically is now a province embracing much more than the name properly included.

c. 1590.—“The dominions of the Rajah of Asham join to Kamroop; he is a very powerful prince, lives in great state, and when he dies, his principal attendants, both male and female, are voluntarily buried alive with his corpse.”—(Gladwin's Ayern (ed. 1800) ii. 3; [Jarrett, trans. ii. 118].

1682.—“Ye Nabob was very busy dispatching and vesting divers principal officers sent with all possible diligence with recruits for their army, lately overthrown in Asham and Sillet, two large plentiful countries 8 days' journey distant from this city (Dacca).”—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 29th; [Hak. Soc. i. 43].

1770.—“In the beginning of the present century, some Bramins of Bengal carried their superstitions to Asham, where the people were so happy as to be guided solely by the dictates of natural religion.”—Raynal (tr. 1777) i. 420.

1788.—“M. Chevalier, the late Governor of Chandernagore, by permission of the King, went up as high as the capital of Assam, about the year 1762.”—Rennell's Mem., 3rd ed. p. 299.

ASSEGAY, s. An African throwing-spear. Dozy has shown that this is Berber zaghāya, with the Ar. article prefixed (p. 223). Those who use it often seem to take it for a S. African or Eastern word. So Godinho de Eredia seems to use it as if Malay (f. 21v). [Mr Skeat remarks that the nearest word in Malay is seligi, explained by Klinkert as 'a short wooden throwing-spear,' which is possibly that referred to by G. de Eredia.]

c. 1270.—"There was the King standing with three 'exortins' (or men of the guard) by his side armed with javelins [ab tur atzagayes"].—Chronicle of K. James of Aragon, tr. by Mr. Foster, 1883, i. 173.

c. 1444.—" . . . They have a quantity of asagais, which are a kind of light darts."—Cadamosto, Navegação primeira, 82.

1552.—"But in general they all came armed in their fashion, some with asagais and shields and others with bows and quivers of arrows."—Barros, I. iii. 1.

"Hum de escudo embracado, e de asagaia, Outro de arco encurvado, e setta ervada."
Camões, i. 86.

By Burton:

"this, targe on arm and assegai in hand, that, with his bended bow, and venom'd reed."

1586.—"I loro archibugi sono belli, e buoni, come i nostri, e le lance sono fatte con alcune canne piene, e forti, in capo delle quali mettono vn ferro, come uno di quelli delle nostri sagaglie."—Balbi, 111.

1600.—"These they use to make Instruments of wherewith to fish . . . as also to make weapons, as Bows, Arrowes, Aponers, and Assagayen."—Disc. of Guinea, from the Dutch, in Purchas, ii. 927.

1608.—"Donques voyant que nous ne pouvions passer, les deux hommes sont venu en nageant auprès de nous, et ayans en leurs mains trois Lancettes ou Asagayes."—Houtman, 5b.

[1648.—"The ordinary food of these Cafres is the flesh of this animal (the elephant), and four of them with their Assegais (in orig. ageagayes), which are a kind of short pike, are able to bring an elephant to the ground and kill it."—Tavernier (ed. Ball), ii. 161, cf. ii. 295.]

1666.—"Les autres armes offensives (in India) sont l'arc et la flèche, le javelot ou zagaye . . ."—Thevenot, v. 132 (ed. 1727).

1681.—" . . . encontraron diez y nueve hombres bazos armados con dardas, y asagayas, assi llaman los Arabes vnas lanças pequenas arrojadizas, y pelearon con ellos."—Martinez de la Puente, Compendio, 87.

"Alert to fight, athirst to slay,
They shake the dreaded assegai,
And rush with blind and frantic will
On all, when few, whose force is skill."
Isandlana, by Ld. Stratford de Redcliffe, Times, March 29.

ATAP, ADAP, s. Applied in the Malayo-Javanese regions to any palm-fronds used in thatching, commonly to those of the Nipa (Nipa fruticans, Thunb.). [Atap, according to Mr Skeat, is also applied to any roofing; thus tiles are called atap batu, 'stone ataps.'] The Nipa, "although a wild plant, for it is so abundant that its culture is not necessary, it is remarkable that its name should be the same in all the languages from Sumatra to the Philippines."—(Crawford, Dict. Ind. Arch. 301). Atop is Javanese for 'thatch.'

1672.—"Atap or leaves of Palm-trees . . ."—Baldaeus, Ceylon, 164.

1690.—"Adapol (quae folia sunt sicca et vetusta) . . ."—Rumphius, Herb. Amb. i. 14.

1817.—"In the maritime districts, atap or thatch is made . . . from the leaves of the nipa."—Raffles, Java, i. 166; [2nd ed. i. 186].

1878.—"The universal roofing of a Perak house is Attap stretched over bamboo rafters and ridge-poles. This attap is the dried leaf of the nipah palm, doubled over a small stick of bamboo, or nibong."—McNair, Perak, &c., 164.

ATLAS, s. An obsolete word for 'satin,' from the Ar. atlas, used in that sense, literally 'bare' or 'bald' (comp. the Ital. raso for 'satin'). The word is still used in German. [The Draper's Dict. (s.v.) says that "a silk stuff wrought with threads of gold and silver, and known by this name, was at one time imported from India." Yusuf Ali (Mon. on Silk Fabrics, p. 93) writes: "Atlas is the Indian satin, but the term satan (corrupted from the English) is also applied, and sometimes specialised to a thicker form of the fabric. This fabric is always substantial, i.e. never so thin or netted as to be semi-transparent; more of the weft showing on the upper surface than of the warp."]

1673.—"They go Rich in Apparel, their Turbats of Gold, Damask'd Gold Atlas Coats to their Heels, Silk, Alajah or Cuttanees breeches."—Fryer, 196.

1683.—"I saw ye Taffaties and Atlases in ye Warehouse, and gave directions concerning their several colours and stripes."—Hedges, Diary, May 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 85].

1689.—(Surat) "is renown'd for . . . rich Silks, such as Atlases . . . and for Zarbafts [Zerbaft]. . ."—Ovington, 218.

1712.—In the Spectator of this year are advertised “a purple and gold Atlas gown” and “a scarlet and gold Atlas petticoat edged with silver.”—Cited in Malcolm's Anecdotes (1806), 429.

1727.—“They are exquisite in the Weaver's Trade and Embroidery, which may be seen in the rich Atlases . . . made by them.”—A. Hamilton, i. 160.

c. 1750-60.—“The most considerable (manufacture) is that of their atlases or satin flowered with gold and silver.”—Orme, i. 117.

Note.—I saw not long ago in India a Polish Jew who was called Jacob Atlas, and he explained to me that when the Jews (about 1800) were forced to assume surnames, this was assigned to his grandfather, because he wore a black satin gaberdine!—(A. B. 1879.)

ATOLL, s. A group of coral islands forming a ring or chaplet, sometimes of many miles in diameter, inclosing a space of comparatively shallow water, each of the islands being on the same type as the atoll. We derive the expression from the Maldivé islands, which are the typical examples of this structure, and where the form of the word is atolu. [P. de Laval (Hak. Soc. i. 93) states that the provinces in the Maldives were known as Atollon.] It is probably connected with the Singhalese ātul, ‘inside’; [or etula, as Mr Gray (P. de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 94) writes the word. The Mad. Admin. Man. in the Glossary gives Malayāl. attalam, ‘a sinking reef’]. The term was made a scientific one by Darwin in his publication on Coral Reefs (see below), but our second quotation shows that it had been generalised at an earlier date.

c. 1610.—“Estant au milieu d'un Atollon, vous voyez autour de vous ce grand banc de pierre que jay dit, qui environne et qui defend les isles contre l'impetuosité de la mer.”—Pyrard de Laval, i. 71 (ed. 1679): [Hak. Soc. i. 94].

1732.—“Atollon, a name applied to such a place in the sea as exhibits a heap of little islands lying close together, and almost hanging on to each other.”—Zeidler's (German) Universal Lexicon, s.v.

1842.—“I have invariably used in this volume the term atoll, which is the name given to these circular groups of coral islets by their inhabitants in the Indian Ocean, and is synonymous with ‘lagoon-island.’”—Darwin, The Structure, &c., of Coral Reefs, 2.

AUMIL, s. Ar. and thence H. ‘amil (noun of agency from ‘amal, ‘he performed a task or office,’ therefore ‘an agent’). Under the native governments a collector of Revenue; also a farmer of the Revenue invested with chief authority in his District. Also AUMILDAR. Properly ‘amaldar, ‘one holding office’; (Ar. ‘amal, ‘work,’ with P. term of agency). A factor or manager. Among the Mahrattas the ‘Amaldar was a collector of revenue under varying conditions—(See details in Wilson). The term is now limited to Mysore and a few other parts of India, and does not belong to the standard system of any Presidency. The word in the following passage looks as if intended for ‘amaldar, though there is a term Maldar, ‘the holder of property.’

1680.—“The Mauldar or Didwan [Dewan] that came with the Rucrus [Roocha] from Golcondah sent forward to Lingappa at Conjiveram.”—Ft. St. Geo. Cons., 9th Novr. No. III., 38.

c. 1780.—“. . . having detected various frauds in the management of the Amuldar or renter . . . (M. Lally) paid him 40,000 rupees.”—Orme, iii. 496 (ed. 1803).

1793.—“The aumildars, or managers of the districts.”—Dirom, p. 56.

1799.—“I wish that you would desire one of your people to communicate with the Amildar of Soondah respecting this road.”—A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Munro's Life, i. 335.

1804.—“I know the character of the Peshwah, and his ministers, and of every Mahratta amildar sufficiently well” —Wellington, iii. 38.

1809.—“Of the aumil I saw nothing.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 412.

AURUNG, s. H. from P. aurang, ‘a place where goods are manufactured, a depôt for such goods.’ During the Company's trading days this term was applied to their factories for the purchase, on advances, of native piece-goods, &c.

1778.—“. . . . (Gentoo-factors in their own pay to provide the investments at the different Aurungs or cloth markets in the province.”—Orme, ii. 51.

1789.—“I doubt, however, very much whether he has had sufficient experience in the commercial line to enable him to manage so difficult and so important an aurung as Luckipore, which is almost the only one of any magnitude which supplies the species of coarse cloths which do not interfere with the British manufacture.”—Cornwallis, i. 435.

AVA, n.p. The name of the city which was for several centuries the capital of the Burmese Empire, and was applied often to that State itself. This name is borrowed, according to Crawford, from the form Awa or Awak used by the Malays. The proper Burmese form was Eng-wa, or 'the Lake-Mouth,' because the city was built near the opening of a lagoon into the Irawadi; but this was called, even by the Burmese, more popularly A-wa, 'The Mouth.' The city was founded A.D. 1364. The first European occurrence of the name, so far as we know, is (c. 1440) in the narrative of Nicolo Conti, and it appears again (no doubt from Conti's information) in the great World-Map of Fra Mauro at Venice (1459).

c. 1430.—"Having sailed up this river for the space of a month he arrived at a city more noble than all the others, called Ava, and the circumference of which is 15 miles."—Conti, in India in the XVth Cent. 11.

c. 1490.—"The country (Pegu) is distant 15 days' journey by land from another called Ava in which grow rubies and many other precious stones."—Hier. di Sto. Stefano, u. s. p. 6.

1516.—"Inland beyond this Kingdom of Pegu . . . there is another Kingdom of Gentiles which has a King who resides in a very great and opulent city called Ava, 8 days' journey from the sea; a place of rich merchants, in which there is a great trade of jewels, rubies, and spinel-rubies, which are gathered in this Kingdom."—Barbosa, 186.

c. 1610.—". . . The King of Ová having already sent much people, with cavalry, to relieve Porão (Prome), which marches with the Pozão (?) and city of Ová or Anvá, (which means 'surrounded on all sides with streams') . . ."—Antonio Bocarro, Decada, 150.

1726.—"The city Ava is surpassing great. . . One may not travel by land to Ava, both because this is permitted by the Emperor to none but envoys, on account of the Rubies on the way, and also because it is a very perilous journey on account of the tigers."—Valentijn, V. (Chorum.) 127.

AVADAVAT, s. Improperly for Amadavat. The name given to a certain pretty little cage-bird (Estrela amandava, L. or 'Red Wax-Bill') found throughout India, but originally brought to Europe from Ahmaddbād in Guzerat, of which the name is a corruption. We also find Ahmadābād represented by Madava: as in old maps Astarābād on the Caspian is represented by Strava (see quotation from Correa below). [One of the native names for the bird is lāl, 'ruby,' which appears in the quota-

1546.—"The greater the resistance they made, the more of their blood was spilt in their defeat, and when they took to flight, we gave them chase for the space of half a league. And it is my belief that as far as the will of the officers and lascarys went, we should not have halted on this side of Madavá; but as I saw that my people were much fatigued, and that the Moors were in great numbers, I withdrew them and brought them back to the city."—D. João de Castro's despatch to the City of Goa respecting the victory at Diu.—Correa, iv. 574.

1648.—"The capital (of Guzerat) lies in the interior of the country and is named Hamed-Ewat, i.e. the City of King Hamed who built it; nowadays they call it Amadarar or Amadabat."—Van Twist, 4.

1673.—"From Amidavad, small Birds, who, besides that they are spotted with white and Red no bigger than Measles, the principal Chorister beginning, the rest in Consort, Fifty in a Cage, make an admirable Chorus."—Fryer, 116.

[1777.—". . . a few presents now and then—china, shawls, congou tea, avadavats, and Indian crackers."—The School for Scandal, v. i.]

1813.—". . . amadavats, and other songsters are brought thither (Bombay) from Surat and different countries."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47. [The 2nd ed. (i. 32) reads amadavads.]

[1832.—"The lollah, known to many by the name of haver-dewatt, is a beautiful little creature, about one-third the size of a hedge-sparrow."—Mrs Meer Hassan Ali, Observat. ii. 54.]

AVATAR, s. Skt. Avatdra, an incarnation on earth of a divine Being. This word first appears in Baldaeus (1672) in the form Autaar (Afgoderye, p. 52), which in the German version generally quoted in this book takes the corrupter shape of Altar.

[c. 1590.—"In the city of Sambal is a temple called Hari Mandal (the temple of Vishnu) belonging to a Brahman, from among whose descendants the tenth avatar will appear at this spot."—Āin, tr. Jarrett, ii. 281.]

1672.—"Bey den Benjanen haben auch diese zehen Verwandlungen den Namen daas sie Altare heissen, und also hat Mats Altar als dieser erste, gewähret 2500 Jahr."—Baldaeus, 472.

1784.—"The ten Avatars or descents of the deity, in his capacity of Preserver."—Sir W. Jones, in Asiat. Res. (reprint) i. 234.

1812.—"The Avatars of Vishnu, by which are meant his descents upon earth, are usually counted ten. . . ."—Maria Graham, 49.

1845.—"In Vishnu-land what Avatar?"—Browning, Dramatic Romances, Works, ed. 1870, iv. pp. 209, 210.

1872.—" . . . all which cannot blind us to the fact that the Master is merely another avatar of Dr Holmes himself."—Sat. Review, Dec. 14, p. 768.

1873.—"He . . . builds up a curious History of Spiritualism, according to which all matter is mediately or immediately the avatar of some Intelligence, not necessarily the highest."—Academy, May 16th, 1873.

1875.—"Balzac's avatars were a hundred-fold as numerous as those of Vishnu."—Ibid., April 24th, p. 421.

AVERAGE, a. Skeat derives this in all its senses from L. Latin averia, used for cattle; for his deduction of meanings we must refer to his Dictionary. But it is worthy of consideration whether average, in its special marine use for a proportionate contribution towards losses of those whose goods are cast into the sea to save a ship, &c., is not directly connected with the Fr. avarie, which has quite that signification. And this last Dozy shows most plausibly to be from the Ar. 'awar, 'spoil merchandise.' [This is rejected by the N.E.D., which concludes that the Ar. 'awar is "merely a mod. Arabic translation and adaptation of the Western term in its latest sense."] Note that many European words of trade are from the Arabic, and that avaris is in Dutch avarij, avarij, or kavarij.—(See Dozy, Oosterlingen.)

AYAH, a. A native lady's-maid or nurse-maid. The word has been adopted into most of the Indian vernaculars in the forms aya or dya but it is really Portuguese (f. aia 'a nurse, or governess'; m. aio, 'the governor of a young noble'). [These again have been connected with L. Latin aidus, Fr. aide, 'a helper.']

1779.—"I was sitting in my own house in the compound, when the aya came down and told me that her mistress wanted a candle."—Kitchin's evidence, in the case of Grand v. Francis. Ext. in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 225.

1836.—"The lieutenant's visits were now as frequent as usual; one day, however, he came . . . and on leaving the house I observed him slip something, which I doubted not was money, into the hand of the Ayah, or serving woman, of Jane."—Pandurang Hari, 71; [ed. 1873, i. 99].

1842.—"Here (at Bimla) there is a great reponderence of Mahometans. I am told that the guns produced absolute consternation, visible in their countenances. One Ayah threw herself upon the ground in an agony of despair. . . . I fired 42 guns for Jhumi and Cabul; the 22nd (42nd?) gun, which announced that all was finished—was that overcame the Mahometans."—Lord Ellenborough, in Indian Administration 285. This stuff was written to the great Duke of Wellington!

1873.—"The white-robed ayah sits in and out of the tent, finding a home for our various possessions, and thither we soon retire."—Fraser's Mag., June, i. 99.

1879.—"He was exceedingly fond of his two children, and got for them servants; a man to cook their dinner, and an ayah to take care of them."—Miss Stowe, Indian Fairy Tales, 7.

BABA, a. This is the word usually applied in Anglo-Indian families, by both Europeans and natives, to the children—often in the plural form, baba log (log = 'folk'). The word is not used by the natives among themselves in the same way, at least not habitually; and it would seem as if our word baby had influenced the use. The word baba is properly Turki = 'father'; sometimes used to a child as a term of endearment (or forming part of such a term, as in the P. Baba-jin, 'Life of your Father'). Compare the Russian use of batushka. [Babaji is a common form of address to a Fakir, usually a member of one of the Musulman sects. And hence it is used generally as a title of respect.]

[1869.—“The wild pig seems to be of a species peculiar to the island (Celebes); but a much more curious animal of this family is the Babirusa or Pig-deer, so named by the Malays from its long and slender legs, and curved tusks resembling horns. This extraordinary creature resembles a pig in general appearance, but it does not dig with its snout, as it feeds on fallen fruits. . . . Here again we have a resemblance to the Wart-hogs of Africa, whose upper canines grow outwards and curve up so as to form a transition from the usual mode of growth to that of the Babirusa. In other respects there seems no affinity between these animals, and the Babirusa stands completely isolated, having no resemblance to the pigs of any other part of the world.”—Wallace, Malay Archip. (ed. 1890), p. 211, 297.

BABOO, s. Beng. and H. Babū [Skt. vapra, ‘a father’]. Properly a term of respect attached to a name, like Master or Mr., and formerly in some parts of Hindustan applied to certain persons of distinction. Its application as a term of respect is now almost or altogether confined to Lower Bengal (though C. P. Brown states that it is also used in S. India for ‘Sir, My lord, your Honour’). In Bengal and elsewhere, among Anglo-Indians, it is often used with a slight savour of disparagement, as characterizing a superficially cultivated, but too often effeminate, Bengali. And from the extensive employment of the class, to which the term was applied as a title, in the capacity of clerks in English offices, the word has come often to signify ‘a native clerk who writes English.’

1781.—“I said . . . From my youth to this day I am a servant to the English. I have never gone to any Rajahs or Baoboos nor will I go to them.”—Depn. of Dooud Sing, Commandant. In Narr. of Insurn. at Banaras in 1781. Calc. 1782. Reprinted at Roorkee, 1853. App., p. 165.

1873.—“The pliable, plastic, receptive Baboo of Bengal eagerly avails himself of this system (of English education) partly from a servile wish to please the Sahib logue, and partly from a desire to obtain a Government appointment.”—Fraser’s Mag., August, 209.

[1880.—“English officers who have become de-Europeanised from long residence among undomesticated natives. . . . Such officials are what Lord Lytton calls White Babooa.”—Aberigh-Mackay, Twenty-one Days, p. 104.]

N.B.—In Java and the further East babū means a nurse or female servant (Javanese word).

BABOOL, s. H. babūl, babūr (though often mispronounced bābul, as in two quotations below); also called kikar. A thorny mimosa common in most parts of India except the Malabar Coast; the Acacia arabica, Willd. The Bhils use the gum as food.

1666.—“L’eau de Vie de ce Pais . . . qu’on y boit ordinairement, est faite de jagre ou sucre noir, qu’on met dans l’eau avec de l’écorce de l’arbre Baboul, pour y donner quelque force, et ensuite on les distille ensemble.”—Theriot, v. 50.

1824.—“Rampoor is . . . chiefly remarkable for the sort of fortification which surrounds it. This is a high thick hedge . . . of bamboos . . . faced on the outside by a formidable underwood of cactus and bābool.”—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 290.

1849.—“Look at that great tract from Deesa to the Hāla mountains. It is all sand; sometimes it has a little ragged clothing of babul or milk-bush."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 1.

BABOON, a. This, no doubt, comes to us through the Ital. babuino; but it is probable that the latter word is a corruption of Pera. maimon ['the auspicious one'], and then applied by way of euphemism or irony to the baboon or monkey. It also occurs in Ital. under the more direct form of maimons in gatto-maimons, 'cat-monkey,' or rather 'monkey-cat.' [The N.E.D. leaves the origin of the word doubtful, and does not discuss this among other suggested derivations.]

BACANORE and BARCLORE, n.n.p. Two ports of Canara often coupled together in old narratives, but which have entirely disappeared from modern maps and books of navigation, inasmuch that it is not quite easy to indicate their precise position. But it would seem that Bacanore, Malayā. Vakkāṇar, is the place called in Canarese Bārkar, the Baroor-pattak of some maps, in lat. 13° 28'. This was the site of a very old and important city, "the capital of the Jain kings of Tulava . . . and subsequently a stronghold of the Vijayanagar Rajas."—Imp. Gaz. [Also see Stuart, Man. S. Canara, ii. 264.]

Also that Barcelore is a Port, corruption of Bārār [the Canarese Bārārīra, 'the town of the waved-leaf fig tree.' (Mad. Adm. Man. Gloss., s.v.).] It must have stood immediately below the 'Basilur Peak' of the Admiralty charts, and was apparently identical with, or near to, the place called Seror in Scott's Map of the Madras Presidency, in about lat. 13° 55'. [See Stuart, ibid. ii. 242. Seror is perhaps the Shirār of Mr Stuart (ibid. p. 243).]

c. 1343.—"The first town of Mulaibār that we visited was Abu-Bārār, which is small, situated on a great estuary, and abounding in coco-nut trees. . . . Two days after our departure from that town we arrived at Fākanūr, which is large and situated on an estuary. One noun there an abundance of sugar-cane, such as has no equal in that country."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 77-78.

c. 1420.—"Dona praeterea ad maritimas urbes, alteram Pachamuriam . . . nomine, 1501.—"Bacanur," for Bacanur, is named in Amerigo Vesputi's letter, giving an account of Da Gama's discoveries, first published by Baldelli Bondi, Il Mitino, pp. liii. app.

1516.—"Passing further forward . . . along the coast, there are two little rivers on which stand two places, the one called Bacanur, and the other Bracaler, belonging to the kingdom of Narayana and the province of Tolimata (Tulu-nada, Tuluva or S. Canara). And in them is much good rice grown round about these places, and this is loaded in many foreign ships and in many of Malabar. . . ."—Barboe, in Lisbon Coll. 294.

1548.—"The Port of the River of Barcalor pays 500 loads (of rice as tribute)."—Reischo, Tombo, 246.

1552.—"Having dispatched this vessel, he (V. da Gama) turned to follow his voyage, desiring to erect the padre (votive pillar) of which we have spoken; and not finding a place that pleased him better, he erected one on certain islets joined (as it were) to the land, giving it the name of Santa Maria, whence these islands are now called Saint Mary's Isles, standing between Bacanur and Batikalā, two notable places on that coast."—De Barros, i. iv. 11.

Hamilton*, i. 284-5. [Moltry is Malik, see Stuart, op. cit. ii. 259.]

1780.—"St Mary's Islands lie along the coast N. and S. as far as off the river off Bacanur, or Callianpoor, being about 6 leagues . . . In lat. 13° 50' N., 5 leagues from Bacanur, runs the river Bamcelor."—Dunn's N. Directory, 5th ed. 106.

1814.—"Barcelore, now frequently called Cundapoor."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109, also see 113; [2nd ed. II. 464].

BAEL, s. H. bel, Mahr. bail, from Skt. vilva, the Tree and Fruit of Aegle marmelos (Correa), or ‘Bengal Quince,’ as it is sometimes called, after the name (Marmelos de Benguala) given it by Garcia de Orta, who first described the virtues of this fruit in the treatment of dysentery, &c. These are noticed also by P. Vincenzo Maria and others, and have always been familiar in India. Yet they do not appear to have attracted serious attention in Europe till about the year 1850. It is a small tree, a native of various parts of India. The dried fruit is now imported into England.—(See Hanbury and Flückiger, 116); [Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 117 seqq.]. The shelly rind of the bel is in the Punjab made into carved snuff-boxes for sale to the Afghans.

1563.—“And as I knew that it was called belli in Baçaim, I enquired of those native physicians which was its proper name, cirifole or beli, and they told me that cirifole [triphalā] was the physician’s name for it.”—Garcia De O., ff. 221 v., 222.

1631.—Jac. Bontius describes the bel as malum cydonium (i.e. a quince), and speaks of its pulp as good for dysentery and the cholerae immanem orgasmum.—Lib. vi. cap. viii.

1672.—“The Bill plant grows to no greater height than that of a man [this is incorrect], all thorny . . . the fruit in size and hardness, and nature of rind, resembles a pomegranate, dotted over the surface with little dark spots equally distributed. . . . With the fruit they make a decoction, which is a most efficacious remedy for dysenteries or fluxes, proceeding from excessive heat. . . .”—P. Vincenzo, 353.

1879.—“ . . . On this plain you will see a large bél-tree, and on it one big bél-fruit.”—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 140.

BAFTA, s. A kind of calico, made especially at Baroch; from the Pers. bāfta, ‘woven.’ The old Baroch baftas seem to have been fine goods. Nothing is harder than to find intelligible explanations of the distinction between the numerous varieties of cotton stuffs formerly exported from India to Europe under a still greater variety of names; names and trade being generally alike obsolete. Baftas however survived in the Tariffs till recently. [Bafta is at present the name applied to a silk fabric. (See quotation from Yusuf Ali below.) In Bengal, Charpata and Noakhali in the Chittagong Division were also noted for their cotton baftas (Birdwood, Industr. Arts, 249).]

1598.—“There is made great store of Cotton Linnen of diuers sort . . . Boffetas.”—Lincolnen, p. 18. [Hak. Soc. i. 60.]

[1605-6.—“Patta Kassa of the finest Totya, Bafta.”—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 73. We have also “Black Baftata.”—Ibid. 74.]

1612.—“Baftas or white Callicoes, from twentie to fortie Royals the corge.”—Capt. Saris, in Purchas, i. 347.

1665.—“The Baftas, or Calicuts painted red, blue, and black, are carried white to Agra and Amadabad, in regard those cities are nearest the places where the Indigo is made that is us’d in colouring.”—Tavernier, (E. T.) p. 127; [ed. Ball, ii. 5].

1672.—“Broach Baftas, broad and narrow.”—Fryer, 86.

1727.—“The Baroach Baftas are famous throughout all India, the country producing the best Cotton in the World.”—A. Hamilton, i. 144.

1875.—In the Calcutta Tariff valuation of this year we find Piece Goods, Cotton:

It is curious to find this word now current on Lake Nyanza. The burial of King Mtesa’s mother is spoken of:

1883.—“The chiefs half filled the nicely-padded coffin with bufta (bleached calico) . . . after that the corpse and then the coffin was filled up with more bufta. . . .”—In Ch. Missy. Intelligencer, N.S., viii. p. 543.

BAHAR, s. Ar. bahār, Malayāl. bhāram, from Skt. bhāra, ‘a load.’ A weight used in large trading transactions; it varied much in different localities; and though the name is ~~in~~

Indian origin it was naturalised by the Arabs, and carried by them to the far East, being found in use, when the Portuguese arrived in those seas, at least as far as the Moluccas. In the Indian islands the bahār is generally reckoned as equal to 3 peculs (q.v.), or 400 avoirdupois. But there was a different bahār in use for different articles of merchandise; or, rather, each article had a special surplus allowance in weighing, which practically made a different bahār (see PICOTA). [Mr. Skeat says that it is now uniformly equal to 400 lbs. av. in the British dominions in the Malay Peninsula; but Klinkert gives it as the equivalent of 15 pikuls of Agar-agar; 6 of cinnamon; 3 of Tripang.]

BAHAUDUR, a. H. Bahadur, 'a hero, or champion.' It is a title affixed commonly to the names of European officers in Indian documents, or when spoken of ceremoniously by natives (e.g. "Jones Sahib Bahadur"), in which use it may be compared with "the gallant officer" of Parliamentary courtesy, or the Illustrissimo Signore of the Italians. It was conferred as a title of honour by the Great Mogul and by other native princes [while in Persia it was often applied to slaves (Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 114)]. Thus it was particularly affected to the end of his life by Hyder Ali, to whom it had been given by the Raja of Mysore (see quotation from John Lindsay below [and Wilks, Mysore, Madras reprint, i. 280]). Bahadur and Sirdar Bahadur are also the official titles of members of the 2nd and 1st classes respectively of the Order of British India, established for native officers of the army in 1837. [The title of Roh Bahadur is also conferred upon Hindu civil officers.]

As conferred by the Court of Delhi the usual gradation of titles was (ascending):—1. Bahadur; 2. Bahadur Jung; 3. Bahadur ud-Daulah; 4. Bahadur ul-mulk. At Hyderabad they had also Bahadur ul-Umra (Kirkpatrick, in Tippoo's Letters, 354). [Many such titles of Europeans will be found in North Indian N. & Q., i. 35, 143, 179; iv. 17.]

In Anglo-Indian colloquial parlance the word denotes a haughty or pompous personage, exercising his brief authority with a strong sense of his own importance; a don rather than a swaggerer. Thackeray, who derived from his Indian birth and connections a humorous felicity in the use of Anglo-Indian expressions, has not omitted this serviceable word. In that brilliant burlesque, the Memoirs of Major Gubagan, we have the Mahratta traitor Bolachee Bahauder. It is said also that Mr Canning's malicious wit bestowed on Sir John Malcolm, who was not less great as a talker than as a soldier and statesman, the title, not included in the 1801.—“Thomas, who was much in liquor, now turned round to his souras, and said—‘Could any one have stopped Sahib Bahaudoor at this gate but one month ago!’ ‘No, no,’ replied they; on which——”—Skinner, Mil. Mem. i. 236.

1872.—“... the word ‘Bahádur’... (at the Mogul’s Court) ... was only used as an epithet. Ahmed Shah used it as a title and ordered his name to be read in the Friday prayer as ‘Mujahid ud dín Muhammad Abú naṣr Ahmad Sháh Bahádur. Hence also ‘Kampani Bahadur,’ the name by which the E. I. Company is still known in India. The modern ‘Khan Bahádur’ is, in Bengal, by permission assumed by Muhammedan Deputy Magistrates, whilst Hindu Deputy Magistrates assume ‘Rái Bahádur’; it stands, of course, for ‘Khán-i-Bahádur,’ ‘the courageous Khán.’ The compound, however, is a modern abnormal one; for ‘Khán’ was conferred by the Dihli Emperors, and so also ‘Bahádur’ and ‘Bahádur Khán,’ but not ‘Khán Bahádur.’”—Prof. Blochmann, in Ind. Antiquary, i. 261.

1876.—“Reverencing at the same time bravery, dash, and boldness, and loving their freedom, they (the Kirghiz) were always ready to follow the standard of any batyr, or hero, ... who might appear on the stage.”—Schuyler’s Turkistan, i. 33.

1878.—“Peacock feathers for some of the subordinate officers, a yellow jacket for the successful general, and the bestowal of the Manchoo title of Baturu, or ‘Brave,’ on some of the most distinguished brigadiers, are probably all the honours which await the return of a triumphal army. The reward which fell to the share of ‘Chinese Gordon’ for the part he took in the suppression of the Taiping rebellion was a yellow jacket, and the title of Baturu has lately been bestowed on Mr Mesny for years of faithful service against the rebels in the province of Kweichow.”—Saturday Rev., Aug. 10, p. 182.

BAHIRWUTTEEA, s. Guj. bāhir-utū. A species of outlawry in Guzerat; bāhir-utū, the individual practising the offence. It consists “in the Rajpoots or Grassias making their ryots and dependants quit their native village, which is suffered to remain waste; the Grassia with his brethren then retires to some asylum, whence he may carry on his depredations with impunity. Being well acquainted with the country, and the redress of injuries being common cause with the members of every family, the Bahir-wutteea has little to fear from those who are not in the immediate interest of his enemy, and he is in consequence enabled to commit very extensive mischief.”—Col. Walker, quoted in Forbes, Rats Mala, 2nd ed., p. 254-5. Col. Walker derives the name from bāhir, ‘out,’ and utū, ‘a road.’ [Tod, in a note to the passage quoted below, says “this term is a compound of bīr (bāhir) and uttan (utū), literally ex patria.”]

[1829.—“This petty chieftain, who enjoyed the distinctive epithet of outlaw (bāhir-utū), was of the Sonigurra clan.” ... —Pers. Narr., in Annals of Raj. (Calcutta reprint), i. 724.]

The origin of most of the brigandage in Sicily is almost what is here described in Kattiwār.

BAIKREE, s. The Bombay name for the Barking-deer. It is Guzarātī bekri; and acc. to Jerdon and [Blandford, Mammalia, 533] Mahr. bekra or bekar, but this is not in Molesworth’s Dict. [Forsyth (Highlands of C. I., p. 470) gives the Gond and Korku names as Bherki, which may be the original].

1879.—“Any one who has shot baikri on the spurs of the Ghats can tell how it is possible unerringly to mark down these little beasts, taking up their position for the day in the early dawn.”—Overl. Times of India, Suppt. May 12, 76.

BAJRA, s. H. bājra and bājri (Penicillaria spicata, Willden.). One of the tall millets forming a dry crop in many parts of India. Forbes calls it bahjerce (Or. Mem. ii. 406; [2nd ed. i. 167], and bajree (i. 23)).

1844.—“The ground (at Maharajpore) was generally covered with bajree, full 5 or 6 feet high.”—Lord Ellenborough, in Ind. Admin. 414.

BĀKIR-KHĀNĪ, s. P.—H. bāqir-khānī; a kind of cake almost exactly resembling pie-crust, said to owe its name to its inventor, Bakir Khān.

BALCONY.

c. 1340-50.—

“Ma si com' uom talor che piange, a parte
Vede cosa che gli occhi, e 'l cor alletta, Così colei per ch'io son in prigione
Standosi ad un balcone,
Che fù sola a' suoi di cosa perfetta
Cominciai a mirar con tale desio
Che me stesso, e 'l mio mal pose in oblio:
I'era in terra, e 'l cor mio in Paradiso.”

Petrarca, Rime, Pte. ii. Canzone 4.

1645-52.—“When the King sits to do Justice, I observe that he comes into the Balcone that looks into the Piazza.”—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 64; [ed. Ball, i. 152].

1667.—“And be it further enacted, That in the Front of all Houses, hereafter to be erected in any such Streets as by Act of Common Council shall be declared to be High Streets, Balconies Four Foot broad with Rails and Bars of Iron . . . shall be placed. . . .”—Act 19 Car. II., cap. 3, sect. 13. (Act for Rebuilding the City of London.)

From the balcony spied
Her tender husband, wond'ring much
To see how he did ride.”

John Gilpin.

“For from the lofty balcony, Rung trumpet, shalm and psaltery.”

“Under tower and balcony,
By garden-wall and gallery,
A gleaming shape she floated by,
Dead pale between the houses high.”

Tennyson's Lady of Shalott.

1876.—“The houses (in Turkistan) are generally of but one story, though sometimes there is a small upper room called bala-khana (P. bala, upper, and khana, room) whence we get our balcony.”—Schuyler's Turkistan, i. 120.

1880.—“Bālā khānā means ‘upper house,’ or ‘upper place,’ and is applied to the room built over the archway by which the chāppā khānā is entered, and from it, by the way, we got our word ‘Balcony.’”—MS. Journal in Persia of Captain W. J. Gill, R.E.

BALOON, BALLOON, &c., s. A rowing vessel formerly used in various parts of the Indies, the basis of which was a large canoe, or ‘dug-out.’ There is a Mahr. word balyānw, a kind of barge, which is probably the original. [See Bombay Gazetteer, xiv. 26.]

1539.—“E embarcando-se . . . partio, eo forão acompanhando dez ou doze balões ate a Ilha de Upe. . . .”—Pinto, ch. xiv.

“Neste tempo da terra para a armada
Balões, e cal' luzes cruzar vimos. . . .”

Malaca Conquistada, iii. 44.

1673.—“The President commanded his own Baloon (a Barge of State, of Two and Twenty Oars) to attend me.”—Fryer, 70.

1755.—“The Burmas has now Eighty Ballongs, none of which as [sic] great Guns.”—Letter from Capt. R. Jackson, in Dalrymple Or. Repert. i. 195.

1811.—“This is the simplest of all boats, and consists merely of the trunk of a tree hollowed out, to the extremities of which pieces of wood are applied, to represent a stern and prow; the two sides are boards joined by rottins or small bambous without nails; no iron whatsoever enters into their construction. . . . The Balaums are used in the district of Chittagong.”—Solyns, iii.

BALSORA, BUSSORA, &c., n.p. These old forms used to be familiar from their use in the popular version of the Arabian Nights after Galland. The place is the sea-port city of Basra at the mouth of the Shat-al-'Arab, or United Euphrates and Tigris. [Burton (Ar. Nights, x. 1) writes Bassorah.]

c. 1580.—“Balsara, altrimenti detta Bassora, è una città posta nell' Arabia, la quale al presente è signoreggiata dal Turco . . . è città di gran negocio di spetiarie, di droghe, e altre merci che uengono di Ormus; è abondante di dattoli, risi, e grani.”—Balbi, f. 32f.

“From Atropatia and the neighbouring plains
Of Adiabene, Media, and the south Of Susiana to Balsara's Haven. . . .”

Paradise Regained, iii.

1747.—“He (the Prest. of Bombay) further advises us that they have wrote our Honble. Masters of the Loss of Madrass by way of Bussoro, the 7th of November.”—Fl. St. David Consn., 8th January 1746-7. MS. in India Office.

BALTY, s. H. baltī, ‘a bucket,’ [which Platts very improbably connects with Skt. vāri, ‘water’], is the Port. balde.

BÁLWAR, s. This is the native servant's form of ‘barber,’ shaped by the ‘striving after meaning’ as bālwār, for bālwāldā, i.e. ‘capillarius,’ ‘hair-man.’ It often takes the further form bāl-būr, another factitious hybrid, shaped by P. būridan, ‘to cut,’ quasi ‘hair-cutter.’ But though now obsolete, there was caciones*) not ope

t across and using the the ends, and so a go upon it . . . each at his own end of the mambu [in orig. mabu] (so they call it), being provided with two paddles, one in each hand and so upon a cane of this kind the folk pass across, and sitting with their legs clinging naked."—C. Acosta, Tractado, 296.

Again:

" . . . and many people on that river (of Cranganor) make use of these canes in place of boats, to be safe from the numerous Crocodiles or Caymoins (as they call them) which are in the river (which are in fact great and ferocious lizards)" [lagartos].—Ibid. 297.

These passages are curious as explaining, if they hardly justify, Ctesias, in what we have regarded as one of his greatest bounces, viz. his story of Indian canes big enough to be used as boats.

1586.—"All the houses are made of canes, which they call Bambos, and bee covered with Strawe."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 391.

1598.—" . . . a thicke reede as big as a man's legge, which is called Bambus."—Linachoten, 56; [Hak. Soc. i. 195].

1608.—"Iava multas producit arundines grossas, quas Manbu vocant."—Prima Pars Itac. Itin. Navalis in Indiam (Houtman's Voyage), p. 36.

c. 1610.—"Les Portugais et les Indiens ne se seruent point d'autres bastons pour porter leurs palanquins ou litieres. Ils l'appellent partout Bambou."—Pyrard, i. 237; [Hak. Soc. i. 329].

1615.—"These two kings (of Camboja and Siam) have neyther Horses, nor any fiery Instruments: but make use only of bowes, and a certaine kind of pike, made of a knottie wood like Canes, called Bambuc, which is exceeding strong, though pliant and supple for vse."—De Monfart, 33.

1621.—"These Forts will better appeare by the Draught thereof, herewith sent to your Worships, inclosed in a Bamboo."—Letter in Purchas, i. 699.

1623.—"Among the other trees there was an immense quantity of bambù, or very large Indian canes, and all clothed and covered with pretty green foliage that went creeping up them."—P. della Valle, ii. 640; [Hak. Soc. ii. 220].

c. 1666.—"Cette machine est suspendue à une longue barre que l'on appelle Pambou."—Theriot, v. 162. (This spelling recurs throughout a chapter describing palankins, though elsewhere the traveller writes bambou.)

1673.—"A Bambo, which is a long hollow cane."—Fryer, 34.

1727.—"The City (Ava) tho' great and populous, is only built of Bambou canes."—A. Hamilton, ii. 47.

1855.—"When I speak of bamboo huts, I mean to say that post and walls, wall-plates and rafters, floor and thatch and the withes that bind them, are all of bamboo. In fact it might almost be said that among the Indo-Chinese nations the staff of life is a Bamboo. Scaffolding and ladders, landing-jetties, fishing apparatus, irrigation-wheels and scoops, oars, masts and yards, spears and arrows, hats and helmets, bow, bow-string and quiver, oil-cans, water-stoups and cooking-pots, pipe-sticks, conduits, clothes-boxes, pan-boxes, dinner-trays, pickles, preserves, and melodious musical instruments, torches, footballs, cordage, bellows, mats, paper, these are but a few of the articles that are made from the bamboo."—Yule, Mission to Ava, p. 153. To these may be added, from a cursory inspection of a collection in one of the museums at Kew, combs, mugs, sun-blinds, cages, grotesque carvings, brushes, fans, shirts, sails, teapots, pipes and harps.

Bamboos are sometimes popularly distinguished (after a native idiom) as male and female; the latter embracing all the common species with hollow stems, the former title being applied to a certain kind (in fact, a sp. of a distinct genus, Dendrocalamus strictus), which has a solid or nearly solid core, and is much used for bludgeons (see LATTEE) and spear-shafts. It is remarkable that this popular distinction by sex was known to Ctesias (c. B.C. 400) who says that the Indian reeds were divided into male and female, the male having no ἐντεπώρη.

One of the present writers has seen (and partaken of) rice cooked in a joint of bamboo, among the Khyena, a hill-people of Arakan. And Mr Markham mentions the same practice as prevalent among the Chunchos and savage aborigines on the eastern slopes of the Andes (J. R. Geog. Soc. xxv. 155). An endeavour was made in Pegu in 1855 to procure the largest obtainable bamboo. It was a little over 10 inches in diameter. But Clusius states that he had seen two great specimens in the University at Leyden, 30 feet long and from 14 to 16 inches in diameter. And E. Haeckel, in his Visit to Ceylon (1882), speaks of bamboo-stems at Peridenia, "each from a foot to two feet thick." We can obtain no corroboration of anything approaching 2 feet.—[See Gray's note on Pyrard, Hak. Soc. i. 330.]

BAMÓ, n.p. Burm. Bha-maw, Shan Manmaw; in Chinese Sin-Kai, 'New-market.' A town on the upper Irawadi, where one of the chief routes from China abuts on that river; regarded as the early home of the Karens. [(McMahon, Karens of the Golden Cher., 103.)] The old Shan 1879.—“I shall never forget my first night here (on the Cocos Islands). As soon as the Sun had gone down, and the moon risen, thousands upon thousands of rats, in size equal to a bandicoot, appeared.”—Pollok, Sport in B. Burmah, &c., ii. 14.

1880.—“They (wild dogs in Queensland) hunted Kangaroo when in numbers . . . but usually preferred smaller and more easily obtained prey, as rats, bandicoots, and ‘possums.’”—Blackwood's Mag., Jan., p. 65.

BANDICOY, s. The colloquial name in S. India of the fruit of Hibiscus esculentus; Tamil vendai-khūti, i.e. unripe fruit of the vendai, called in H. bhendī. See BENDY.

BANDO! H. imperative bāndho, ‘tie or make fast.’ “This and probably other Indian words have been naturalised in the docks on the Thames frequented by Lascar crews. I have heard a London lighter-man, in the Victoria Docks, throw a rope ashore to another Londoner, calling out, Bando!”—(M.-Gen. Keatinge.)

BANDY, s. A carriage, bullock-carriage, buggy, or cart. This word is usual in both the S. and W. Presidencies, but is unknown in Bengal, and in the N.W.P. It is the Tamil vandi, Telug. bandi, ‘a cart or vehicle.’ The word, as bendi, is also used in Java. [Mr Skeat writes—“Klinkert has Mal. bendi, ‘a chaise or caleche,’ but I have not heard the word in standard Malay, though Clifford and Swett. have bendu, ‘a kind of sedan-chair carried by men,’ and the commoner word tandu ‘a sedan-chair or litter,’ which I have heard in Selangor. Wilkinson says that kereta (i.e. kreta bendi) is used to signify any two-wheeled vehicle in Johor.”]

1800.—“No wheel-carriages can be used in Canara, not even a buffalo-bandy.”—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 243.

1810.—“None but open carriages are used in Ceylon; we therefore went in bandies, or, in plain English, gigs.”—Maria Graham, 88.

1826.—“Those persons who have not European coachmen have the horses of their . . . ‘bandies’ or gigs, led by these men.

. . . Gigs and hackeries all go here (in Ceylon) by the name of bandy.”—Heber (ed. 1844), ii. 152.

1860.—“Bullock bandies, covered with cajans met us.”—Tennant's Ceylon, ii. 146.

1862.—“At Coimbatore I bought a bandy or country cart of the simplest construction.”—Markham's Peru and India, 393.

BANG, BHANG, s. H. bhang, the dried leaves and small stalks of hemp (i.e. Cannabis indica), used to cause intoxication, either by smoking, or when eaten mixed up into a sweetmeat (see MAJOON). Hashish of the Arabs is substantially the same; Birdwood says it “consists of the tender tops of the plants after flowering.” [Bhang is usually derived from Skt. bhanga, ‘breaking,’ but Burton derives both it and the Ar. banj from the old Coptic Nibanj, “meaning a preparation of hemp; and here it is easy to recognise the Homeric Nepenthe.”

“On the other hand, not a few apply the word to the henbane (hyoscyamus niger) so much used in mediæval Europe. The Kámūs evidently means henbane, distinguishing it from Hashish al harāfsh, ‘rascal's grass,’ i.e. the herb Pantagruelion. . . The use of Bhang doubtless dates from the dawn of civilisation, whose earliest social pleasures would be inebriants. Herodotus (iv. c. 75) shows the Scythians burning the seeds (leaves and capsules) in worship and becoming drunk upon the fumes, as do the S. African Bushmen of the present day.”—(Arab. Nights, i. 65.)]

1563.—“The great Sultan Badur told Martim Affonzo de Souza, for whom he had a great liking, and to whom he told all his secrets, that when in the night he had a desire to visit Portugal, and the Brazil, and Turkey, and Arabia, and Persia, all he had to do was to eat a little bangue. . .”—Garcia, f. 26.

1578.—“Bangue is a plant resembling hemp, or the Cannabis of the Latins. . . the Arabs call this Bangue ‘Axis’” (i.e. Hashish).—C. Acosta, 360-61.

1598.—“They have . . . also many kinds of Drogues, as Amfion, or Opium, Camfora, Bangue and Sandall Wood.”—Linschoten, 19; [Hak. Soc. i. 61; also see ii. 115].

1606.—“O mais de tēpo estava cheo de bangue.”—Gouvea, 93.

1638.—“Il se fit apporter vn petit cabinet d'or . . . dont il tira deux layettes, et prit dans l'vne de l'offion, ou opium, et dans l'autre du bengi, qui est vne certaine drogue ou poudre, dont ils se seruent pour s'exciter à la luxure.”—Mandelslo, Paris, 1659, 160.

1685.—“I have two sorts of the Bangue, which were sent from two several places of the East Indies; they both differ much from our Hemp, although they seem to differ most as to their magnitude.”—Dr. Hans Sloane to Mr. Ray, in Ray's Correspondence, 1848, p. 160.

1711.—“Bang has likewise its Vertues attributed to it; for being used as Tea, it inebriates, or exhilarates them according to the Quantity they take.”—Larkyer, 61.

1727.—“Before they engage in a Fight, they drink Bang, which is made of a Seed like Hemp-seed, that has an intoxicating Quality.”—A. Hamilton, i. 131.

1763.—“Most of the troops, as is customary during the agitations of this festival, had eaten plentifully of bang. . . .”—Orme, i. 194.

1784.—“. . . it does not appear that the use of bank, an intoxicating weed which resembles the hemp of Europe, . . . is considered even by the most rigid (Hindoo) a breach of the law.”—J. Forster, Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 291.

1789.—“A shop of Bang may be kept with a capital of no more than two shillings, or one rupee. It is only some mats stretched under some tree, where the Bangeras of the town, that is, the vilest of mankind, assemble to drink Bang.”—Note on Seir Mutaqherin, iii. 308.

“The Hemp—with which we used to hang
Our prison pets, yon felon gang,—
In Eastern climes produces Bang, Esteemed a drug divine.
As Hashish dressed, its magic powers
(Can lap us in Elysian bowers;
But sweeter far our social hours,
O'er a flask of rosy wine.”

Lord Neaves.

BANGED—is also used as a participle, for ‘stimulated by bang,’ e.g. “banged up to the eyes.”

BANGLE, s. H. bangrī or bangrī. The original word properly means a ring of coloured glass worn on the wrist by women; [the chūrī of N. India;] but bangle is applied to any native ring-bracelet, and also to an anklet or ring of any kind worn on the ankle or leg. Indian silver bangles on the wrist have recently come into common use among English girls.

1803.—“To the cutwuhl he gave a heavy pair of gold bangles, of which he considerably enhanced the value by putting them on his wrists with his own hands.”—Journal of Sir J. Nicholls, in note to Wellington Despatches, ed. 1837, ii. 373.

1809.—“Bangles, or bracelets.”—Maria Graham, 13.

1810.—“Some wear . . . a stout silver ornament of the ring kind, called a bangle, or kurrah [kura] on either wrist.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 305.

1826.—“I am paid with the silver bangles of my enemy, and his cash to boot.”—Pandurang Hari, 27; [ed. 1873, i. 36].

1873.—“Year after year he found some excuse for coming up to Sirmoori—now a proposal for a tax on bangles, now a scheme for a new mode of Hindustani pronunciation.”—The True Reformer, i. 24.

BANGUN, s.—See BRINJAUL.

BANGUR, s. Hind. bāngar. In Upper India this name is given to the higher parts of the plain country on which the towns stand—the older alluvium—in contradistinction to the khādar [Khādir] or lower alluvium immediately bordering the great rivers, and forming the limit of their inundation and modern divagations; the khādar having been cut out from the bāngar by the river. Medlicott spells bhāngar (Man. of Geol. of India, i. 404).

BANGY, BANGHY, &c. s. H. ba-hangī, Mahr. bangī; Skt. vihaṅgamā, and vihaṅgikā.

a. A shoulder-yoke for carrying loads, the yoke or bangy resting on the shoulder, while the load is apportioned at either end in two equal weights, and generally hung by cords. The milkmaid's yoke is the nearest approach to a survival of the bangy-staff in England. Also such a yoke with its pair of baskets or boxes.—(See PITARRAH).

b. Hence a parcel post, carried originally in this way, was called bangy or dawk-bangy, even when the primitive mode of transport had long become obsolete. “A bangy parcel” is a parcel received or sent by such post.

With elephants, camels, with hackeries and doolies.”

Letters of Simpinkin the Second, p. 57.

1803.—“We take with us indeed, in six banghys, sufficient changes of linen.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 67.

1810.—“The bangy-wollah, that is the bearer who carries the bangy, supports the bamboo on his shoulder, so as to equipoise the baskets suspended at each end.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 323.

[1843.—“I engaged eight bearers to carry my palankeen. Besides these I had four banghy-burdars, men who are each obliged to carry forty pound weight, in small wooden or tin boxes, called petarrahs.”—Traveller's account, Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 91.]

c. 1844.—“I will forward with this by bhangy dak a copy of Capt. Moresby's Survey of the Red Sea.”—Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Admin. of Lord Ellenborough, p. 221.

1873.—“The officers of his regiment . . . subscribed to buy the young people a set of crockery, and a plated tea and coffee service (got up by dawk banghee . . . at not much more than 200 per cent. in advance of the English price.”—The True Reformer, i. 57.

BANJO, s. Though this is a West- and not East-Indian term, it may be worth while to introduce the following older form of the word :

“Permit thy slaves to lead the choral dance
To the wild banshaw's melancholy sound.”—Gruinger, iv.

See also Davies, for example of banjore, [and N.E.D for banjer].

BANKSHALL, s. a. A warehouse. b. The office of a Harbour Master or other Port Authority. In the former sense the word is still used in S. India; in Bengal the latter is the only sense recognised, at least among Anglo-Indians; in Northern India the word is not in use. As the Calcutta office stands on the banks of the Hoogly, the name is, we believe, often accepted as having some indefinite reference to this position. And in a late work we find a positive and plausible, but entirely unfounded, explanation of this kind, which we quote below. In Java the word has a specific application to the open hall of audience, supported by wooden pillars without walls, which forms part of every princely residence. The word is used in Sea Hindustani, in the forms bansār, and bangsāl for a ‘store-room’ (Roebuck).

Bankshall is in fact one of the oldest of the words taken up by foreign traders in India. And its use not only by Correa (c. 1561) but by King John (1524), with the regularly-formed Portuguese plural of words in -al, shows how early it was adopted by the Portuguese. Indeed, Correa does not even explain it, as is his usual practice with Indian terms.

More than one serious etymology has been suggested:—(1). Crawford takes it to be the Malay word bangsal, defined by him in his Malay Dict. thus: “(J.) A shed; a storehouse; a workshop; a porch; a covered passage” (see J. Ind. Archip. iv. 182). [Mr Skeat adds that it also means in Malay ‘half-husked paddy,’ and ‘fallen timber, of which the outer layer has rotted and only the core remains.’] But it is probable that the Malay word, though marked by Crawford (“J.”) as Javanese in origin, is a corruption of one of the two following:

(2) Beng. bankāśāla, from Skt. banik or vanik, ‘trade,’ and śāla, ‘a hall.’ This is Wilson’s etymology.

(3). Skt. bhāṇḍasāla, Canar. bhaṇ-dasāle, Malayāl. pāṇḍisāla, Tam. pāṇḍaśalai or pāṇḍakāśalai, ‘a storehouse or magazine.’

It is difficult to decide which of the two last is the original word; the prevalence of the second in S. India is an argument in its favour; and the substitution of g for ḍ would be in accordance with a phonetic practice of not uncommon occurrence.

c. 1345.—“For the bandar there is in every island (of the Maldives) a wooden building, which they call bajansār [evidently for banjasār, i.e. Arabic spelling for bangasār] where the Governor . . . collects all the goods, and there sells or barter them.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 120.

1524.—A grant from K. John to the City of Goa, says: “that henceforward even if no market rent in the city is collected from the bacacés, viz. those at which are sold honey, oil, butter, betre (i.e. betel), spices, and cloths, for permission to sell such things in the said bacacés, it is our pleasure that they shall sell them freely.” A note says: “Apparently the word should be bacacues, or bancacacues, or bangacacues, which then signified any place to sell things, but now particularly a wooden house.”—Archiv. Portug. Or., Fasc. ii. 43.

1561.—“. . . in the bengacacues, in which stand the goods ready for shipment.”—Correa, Lendas, i. 2, 260.

1610.—The form and use of the word have led P. Teixeira into a curious confusion (as it would seem) when, speaking of foreigners at Ormus, he says: “hay muchos gentiles, Baneanes [see BANYAN], Bangasalya, y Cambayatys”—where the word in italica probably represents Bangalya, i.e. Bengālis (Rel. de Harmuz, 18).

c. 1610.—“Le facteur du Roy chrestien des Maldives tenoit sa banquesalle ou plustost cellier, sur le bord de la mer en l'isle de Malé.”—Pyrard de Laval, ed. 1679, i. 65; [Hak. Soc. i. 85; also see i. 267].

1613.—“The other settlement of Yler . . . with houses of wood thatched extends . . . to the fields of Tanjonpacer, where there is a bangasal or sentry's house without other defense.”—(Indiako de Eredia, 6).

1623.—“Bangsai, a shed (or barn), or often also a roof without walls to sit under, sheltered from the rain or sun.”—Gaspard Willens, Vocabularium, &c., ins' Gravenhaage; repr. Batavia, 1706.

1734-5.—“Paid the Bankahall Merchants for the house poles, country reapers, &c., necessary for housebuilding.”—In Wheeler, iii. 148.

1748.—“A little below the town of Wampo . . . These people (compradores) build a house for each ship. . . . They are called by us banksalls. In these we deposit the rigging and yards of the vessel, chests, water-casks, and every thing that incommodes us aboard.”—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748 (1762), p. 294. It appears from this book (p. 118) that the place in Canton River was known as Banksall Island.

1750-52.—“One of the first things on arriving here (Canton River) is to procure a bancshall, that is, a great house, constructed of bamboo and mats . . . in which the stores of the ship are laid up.”—A Voyage, &c., by Olof Toren . . . in a series of letters to Dr Linnæus, Transl. by J. R. Forster (with Osbeck's Voyage), 1771.

1783.—“These people (Chulias, &c., from India, at Achin) . . . on their arrival immediately build, by contract with the natives, houses of bamboo, like what in China at Wampo is called bankshall, very regular, on a convenient spot close to the river.”—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 41.

1788.—“Banksauls—Storehouses for depositing ships' stores in, while the ships are unloading and refitting.”—Indian Vocab. (Stockdale).

1813.—“The East India Company for seventy years had a large banksaul, or warehouse, at Mirzee, for the reception of the pepper and sandalwood purchased in the dominions of the Mysore Rajah.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109.

1817.—“The bāngsal or mendāpo is a large open hall, supported by a double row of pillars, and covered with shingles, the interior being richly decorated with paint and gilding.”—Raffles, Java (2nd ed.), i. 93. The Javanese use, as in this passage, corresponds to the meaning given in Jansz, Javanese Dict.: “Bangsai, Vorstelijke Zitplaats” (Prince's Sitting-place).

1623.—“And on the Place by the sea there was the Custom-house, which the Persians in their language call Benksal, a building of no great size, with some open outer porticoes.”—P. della Valle, ii. 465.

1673.—“. . . Their Bank Solls, or Custom House Keys, where they land, are Two; but mean, and shut only with ordinary Gates at Night.”—Fryer, 27.

1683.—“I came ashore in Capt. Goyer's Pinnace to ye Bankshall, about 7 miles from Ballasore.”—Hedges, Diary, Feb. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 65].

1687.—“The Mayor and Aldermen, etc., do humbly request the Honourable President and Council would please to grant and assign over to the Corporation the petty dues of Banksall Tolls.”—In Wheeler, i. 207.

1727.—“Above it is the Dutch Bankshall, a Place where their Ships ride when they cannot get further up for the too swift Currents.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 6.

1789.—“And that no one may plead ignorance of this order, it is hereby directed that it be placed constantly in view at the Bankshall in the English and country languages.”—Procl. against Slave-Trading in Seton-Karr, ii. 5.

1878.—“The term 'Banksoll' has always been a puzzle to the English in India. It is borrowed from the Dutch. The 'Soll' is the Dutch or Danish 'Zoll,' the English 'Toll.' The Banksoll was then the place on the 'bank' where all tolls or duties were levied on landing goods.”—Talboys Wheeler, Early Records of B. India, 196. (Quite erroneous, as already said; and Zoll is not Dutch.)

BANTAM, n.p. The province which forms the western extremity of Java, properly Bāntan. [Mr Skeat gives Bantan, Crawford, Bantān.] It formed an independent kingdom at the beginning of the 17th century, and then produced much pepper (no longer grown), which caused it to be greatly frequented by European traders. An English factory was established here in 1603, and continued till 1682, when the Dutch succeeded in expelling us as interlopers.

1727.—“The only Product of Bantam is Pepper, wherein it abounds so much, that they can export 10,000 Tuns per annum.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 127.

BANTAM FOWLS, s. According to Crawford, the dwarf poultry which we call by this name were imported from Japan, and received the name “not from the place that produced them, but from that where our 1781.—"The Ensign (as it proved, for his first appearance, being undressed and in his banyon coat, I did not know him) came off from his cot, and in a very haughty manner cried out, 'None of your disturbance, Gentlemen.'"—In Wheeler, iii. 109.

1781.—"I am an Old Stager in this Country, having arrived in Calcutta in the Year 1786. . . . Those were the days, when Gentlemen studied Kur instead of Fashion; when even the Hon. Members of the Council met in Banyan Shirts, Long Drawers (q.v.), and Conjee (Congee) caps; with a Case Bottle of good old Arrack, and a Gouglet of Water placed on the Table, which the Secretary (a Skilful Hand) frequently converted into Punch . . ."—Letter from An Old Country Captain, in India Gazette, Feb. 24th.

[1773.—In a letter from Horace Walpole to the Countess of Upper Ossory, dated April 30th, 1773 (Cunningham's ed., v. 459) he describes a ball at Lord Stanley's, at which two of the dancers, Mr. Storer and Miss Wrottesley, were dressed "in banians with furs, for winter, cock and hen." It would be interesting to have further details of these garments, which were, it may be hoped, different from the modern Banyan.]

1810.—". . . an undershirt, commonly called a banian."—Williamson, V.M. i. 19.

(3) BANYAN, s. See BANYAN-TREE.

BANYAN-DAY, s. This is sea-slang for a jour maigre, or a day on which no ration of meat was allowed; when (as one of our quotations above expresses it) the crew had "to observe the Law of Pythagoras."

1690.—"Of this (Kitchery or Kedgeroe, q.v.) the European Sailors feed in these parts once or twice a Week, and are forc'd at those times to a Pagan Abstinence from Flesh, which creates in them a perfect Dislike and utter Detestation to those Bannian Days, as they commonly call them."—Drington, 310, 311.

BANYAN-FIGHT, s. Thus:

1690.—"This Tongue Tempest is termed there a Bannian-Fight, for it never rises to blows or bloodshed."—Ovington, 275. Sir G. Birdwood tells us that this is a phrase still current in Bombay.

BANYAN-TREE, also elliptically Banyan, s. The Indian Fig-Tree (Ficus Indica, or Ficus bengalensis, L.), called in H. bar [or bargat, the latter the "Bourgade" of Bernier (ed. Constable, p. 309).] The name appears to have been first bestowed popularly on a famous tree of this species growing near Gombroon (q.v.), under which the Banyans or Hindu traders settled at that port, had built a little pagoda. So says Tavernier below. This original Banyan-tree is described by P. della Valle (ii. 453), and by Valentijn (v. 202). P. della Valle's account (1622) is extremely interesting, but too long for quotation. He calls it by the Persian name, lul. The tree still stood, within half a mile of the English factory, in 1758, when it was visited by Ives, who quotes Tickell's verses given below. [Also see CUBEER BURE.]

c. A.D. 70.—"First and foremost, there is a Fig-tree there (in India) which beareth very small and slender figges. The propertie of this Tree, is to plant and set it selfe without mans helpe. For it spreadeth out with mightie armes, and the lowest water-boughes underneath, do bend so downward to the very earth, that they touch it againe, and lie upon it: whereby, within one years space they will take fast root in the ground, and put foorth a new Spring round about the Mother-tree: so as these braunches, thus growing, seeme like a traile or border of arbours most curiously and artificially made," &c.—Plinius Nat. Historie, by Philemon Holland, i. 360.

" . . . The goodly bole being got To certain cubits' height, from every side
The boughs decline, which, taking root afresh,
Spring up new boles, and these spring
new, and newer,
Till the whole tree become a porticus,
Or arched arbour, able to receive A numerous troop."

Ben Jonson, Neptune's Triumph.

c. 1650.—"Cet Arbre estoit de même espece que celui qui est a une lieue du Bander, et qui passe pour une merveille; mais dans les Indes il y en a quantité. Les Persans l'appellent Lul, les Portugais Arber de Reys, et les Francais l'Arbre des Bani-anes; parce que les Banianes ont fait bâtir dessous une Pagode avec un carvanseira accompagné de plusieurs petits étangs pour se laver."—Tavernier, V. de Pers., liv. v. ch. 23. [Also see ed. Ball, ii. 198.]

c. 1650.—"Near to the City of Ormus was a Bannians tree, being the only tree that grew in the Island."—Tavernier, Eng. Tr. i. 255.

c. 1666.—"Nous vîmes à cent ou cent cinquante pas de ce jardin, l'arbre War dans toute son étendue. On l'appelle aussi Ber, et arbre des Banians, et arbre des racines. . . ."—Theriot, v. 76.

The fig-tree, not that kind for fruit renowned;
But such as at this day, to Indians known,
In Malabar or Decan spreads her arms
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
About the mother-tree, a pillar'd shade
High over-arch'd, and echoing walks between." Paradise Lost, ix. 1101.

[Warton points out that Milton must have had in view a description of the Banyan-tree in Gerard's Herbal under the heading "of the arched Indian fig-tree."]

1672.—"Eastward of Surat two Courses, i.e. a League, we pitched our Tent under a Tree that besides its Leafs, the Branches bear its own Roots, therefore called by the Portugals, Arbor de Raiz; For the Adoration the Banyans pay it, the Banyan-Tree."—Fryer, 105.

1691.—"About a (Dutch) mile from Gamron . . . stands a tree, heretofore described by Mandelalo and others. . . . Beside this tree is an idol temple where the Banyans do their worship."—Valentijn, v. 267-8.

"The fair descendants of thy sacred bed Wide-branching o'er the Western World shall spread,
Like the fam'd Baniam Tree, whose pliant shoot
To earthward bending of itself takes root,
Till like their mother plant ten thousand stand
In verdant arches on the fertile land;
Beneath her shade the tawny Indians rove,
Or hunt at large through the wide-echoing grove."

Tickell, Epistle from a Lady in England to a Lady in Avignon.

1726.—"On the north side of the city (Surat) is there an uncommonly great Pichar or *Waringin tree. . . . The Portuguese call this tree Albero de laiz, i.e. Root-tree. . . . Under it is a small chapel built by a Benyan. . . . Day and night lamps are alight there, and Benyans constantly come in pilgrimage, to offer their prayers, to this saint."—Valentijn, iv. 145.

1771.—". . . being employed to construct a military work at the fort of Trip-lasore (afterwards called Marsden's Bastion) it was necessary to cut down a banyan-tree which so incensed the brahmans of that place, that they found means to poison him" (i.e. Thomas Marsden of the Madras Engineers).—Mem. of W. Marsden, 7-8.

1809.—"Their greatest enemy (i.e. of the buildings) is the Banyan-Tree."—Ld. Valentia, i. 396.

* Waringin is the Javanese name of a sp. kindred

"In the midst an aged Baniam grew.
It was a goodly sight to see
That venerable tree,
For o'er the lawn, irregularly spread,
Fifty straight columns propt its lofty head;
And many a long depending shoot,
Seeking to strike its root,
Straight like a plummet grew towards the ground,
Some on the lower boughs which crost their way,
Fixing their bearded fibres, round and round,
With many a ring and wild contortion wound;
Some to the passing wind at times, with sway
Of gentle motion swung;
Others of younger growth, unmoved, were hung
Like stone-drops from the cavern's fretted height."

Southey, Curse of Kehama, xiii. 51.

"Des banians touffus, par les brames adorés, Depuis longtemps la langueur nous implore,
Courbés par le midi, dont l'ardeur les dévore,
Ils étendent vers nous leurs rameaux altérés."

Casimir Delavigne, Le Paria, iii. 6.

A note of the publishers on the preceding passage, in the edition of 1855, is diverting:

"Un journaliste allemand a accusé M. Casimir Delavigne d'avoir pris pour un arbre une secte religieuse de l'Inde. . . ." The German journalist was wrong here, but he might have found plenty of matter for ridicule in the play. Thus the Brahmins (men) are Akebar (!), Idamore (!!), and Empeael (!!!); their women Néala (?), Zuide (!), and Mirza (!!).

1825.—"Near this village was the finest banyan-tree which I had ever seen, literally a grove rising from a single primary stem, whose massive secondary trunks, with their straightness, orderly arrangement, and evident connexion with the parent stock, gave the general effect of a vast vegetable organ. The first impression which I felt on coming under its shade was, 'What noble place of worship!'"—Heber, ii. 9 (ed. 1844).

1834.—"Cast forth thy word into everliving, everworking universe; it seed-grain that cannot die; unnoticed day, it will be found flourishing as a bany grove—(perhaps alas! as a hemlock for after a thousand years."—Sartor Resart

" . . . its pendant branches, rooting air,
Yearn to the parent earth and grow fast,

Grow up huge stems again, which shooting forth
In massy branches, these again despatch
Their drooping heralds, till a labyrinth
Of root and stem and branch commingling, forms
A great cathedral, aisled and choired in wood."

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

BĀRASINHĀ, s. The H. name of the widely-spread Cervus Wallichii, Cuvier. This H. name ('12-horn') is no doubt taken from the number of tines being approximately twelve.
The name is also applied by sportsmen in Bengal to the Rucervus Duvaucellii, or Swamp-Deer. [See Blanford, Mamm.
538 seqq.].

[1875.—"I know of no flesh equal to that of the ibex; and the naro, a species of gigantic antelope of Chinese Tibet, with the barra-singh, a red deer of Kashmir, are nearly equally good."—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 91.]

[BARBER'S BRIDGE, n.p. This is a curious native corruption of an English name. The bridge in Madras, known as Barber's Bridge, was built by an engineer named Hamilton. This was turned by the natives into Ambuton, and in course of time the name Ambuton was identified with the Tamil ambattan, 'barber,' and so it came to be called Barber's Bridge.—See Le Fanu, Man. of the Salem Dist. ii. 169, note.]

BARBICAN, s. This term of mediæval fortification is derived by Littré, and by Marcel Devic, from Ar. barbakh, which means a sewer-pipe or water-pipe. And one of the meanings given by Littré is, "une ouverture longue et étroite pour l'écoulement des eaux." Apart from the possible, but untraced, history which this alleged meaning may involve, it seems probable, considering the usual meaning of the word as 'an outwork before a gate,' that it is from Ar. P. bāb-khāna, 'gate-house.' This etymology was suggested in print about 50 years ago by one of the present writers,* and confirmed to his mind some years later, when in going through the native town of Cawnpore, not long before the Mutiny, he saw a brand-new double-towered gateway, or gate-house, on the face of which was the inscription in Persian characters: "Bāb-Khāna-i-Mahommed Bakhsh," or whatever was his name, i.e. "The Barbican of Mahommed Bakhsh." [The N.E.D. suggests P. barbur-khānah, 'house on the wall,' it being difficult to derive the Romanic forms in bar- from bāb-khāna.]

The editor of the Chron. of K. James of Aragon (1833, p. 423) says that barbacana in Spain means a second, outermost and lower wall; i.e. a fausse- braye. And this agrees with facts in that work, and with the definition in Cobarruvias; but not at all with Joinville's use, nor with V.-le-Duc's explanation.

c. 1250.—"Tuit le baron . . s'accorderent qui fust bien garnie de gent, si qui se li Tur fesoient saillies . . cell tore fust einsi come barbacane (orig. 'quasi antemurale') de

c. 1270.—". . . on condition of his at once

Saracens construct a barbacana round the ment, fist le roys faire une barbaquane de-vant le pont qui estoit entre nos dous os, en tel maniere que l'on pooit entrer de dous pars

p. 162.

1552.—"Lourenço de Brito ordered an intrenchment of great strength to be dug, in the fashion of a barbican (barbacã) outside the wall of the fort . . on account of a well, a stone-cast distant. . ."—Barros, II. i. 5.

c. 1870.—"Barbacane. Défense extérieure resse, 361.

BARBIERS, s. This is a term which was formerly very current in the East, as the name of a kind of paralysis, often occasioned by exposure to chills. It began with numbness and imperfect command of the power of movement, sometimes also affecting the muscles of the neck and power of articulation, and often followed by loss of appetite, emaciation, and death. It has often been identified with Beri-beri, and medical opinion seems to have come back to the view that the two are forms of one disorder, though this was not admitted by some older authors of the last century. The allegation of Lind and others, that the most frequent subjects of barbers were Europeans of the lower class who, when in drink, went to sleep in the open air, must be contrasted with the general experience that beriberi rarely attacks Europeans. The name now seems obsolete.

1673.—"Whence follows Fluxes, Dropsy, Scurvy, Barbers (which is an enervating sic) the whole Body, being neither able to use hands or Feet), Gout, Stone, Malignant and Putrid Fevers."—Fryer, 68.

1690.—"Another Distemper with which the Europeans are sometimes afflicted, is the Barbers, or a deprivation of the Use and Activity of their Limbs, whereby they are rendered unable to move either Hand or Foot."—Owington, 350.

1765.—[If the land wind blow on a person sleeping] "the consequence of this is always dangerous, as it seldom fails to bring on a fit of the Barbers (as it is called in this country), that is, a total deprivation of the use of the limbs."—Ives, 77.

[c. 1757.—"There was a disease common to the lower class of Europeans, called the Barbers, a species of palsy, owing to exposure to the land winds after a fit of intoxication."—In Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 266.]

1768.—"The barbers, a species of palsy, is a disease most frequent in India. It distresses chiefly the lower class of Europeans, who when intoxicated with liquors frequently sleep in the open air, exposed to the land winds."—Lind on Diseases of Hot Climates, 260. (See BERIBERI.)

BARGANY, BRAGANY, H. bāru-kāni. The name of a small silver coin current in W. India at the time of the Portuguese occupation of Goa, and afterwards valued at 40 reis (then about $5\frac{1}{2}$ d.). The name of the coin was apparently a survival of a very old system of coinage-nomenclature. Kani is an old Indian word, perhaps Dravidian in origin, indicating $\frac{1}{2}$ of $\frac{1}{2}$ of $\frac{1}{2}$, or 1-64th part. It was applied to the jital (see JETUL) or 64th part of the mediæval Delhi silver tanka—this latter coin being the prototype in weight and position of the Rupee, as the kāni therefore was of the modern Anglo-Indian pice (= 1-64th of a Rupee). There were in the currency of Mohammed Tughlak (1324-1351) of Delhi, aliquot parts of the tanka, Dokāni, Shah-kāni, Haški-kāni, Dvitz-da-kāni, and Shānada-kāni, representing, as the Persian numerals indicate, pieces of 2, 6, 8, 12, and 16 kāni or jital. (See E. Thomas, Pathan Kings of Delhi, pp. 218-219.) Other fractional pieces were added by Fīroz Shāh, Mohammed's son and successor (see Id. 278 seq. and quotation under c. 1360, below). Some of these terms long survived, e.g. do-kāni in localities of Western and Southern India, and in Western India in the present case the bārakāni or 12 kāni, a vernacular form of the shānada-kāni of Mohammed Tughlak.

1330.—"Thousands of men from various quarters, who possessed thousands of these copper coins . . . now brought them to the treasury, and received in exchange gold tankas and silver tankas (Tanga), shah-gāni and do-gāni, which they carried to their homes."—Tārīkh-i-Fīroz-Shāh, in Elliot, iii. 240-241.

c. 1350.—"Sultan Fīroz issued several varieties of coins. There was the gold tankā and the silver tankā. There were also distinct coins of the respective value of 48, 25, 24, 12, 10, 8 and 6, and one jital, known ' chihāl-o-haški-gāni, bist-o-parangāni, bis chahār-gāni, dwādash-gāni, dah-gāni, ha-gāni, shah-gāni, and yak jital."—357-358.

name Kuthein (i.e. Kusein), which was a native corruption of the old name Kusima (see COSMIN). We cannot explain the old European corruption Persaim. [It has been supposed that the name represents the Besynga of Ptolemy (Geog. ii. 4; see M'Crindle in Ind. Ant. xiii. 372); but (ibid. xxii. 20) Col. Temple denies this on the ground that the name Bassein does not date earlier than about 1780. According to the same authority (ibid. xxii. 19), the modern Burmese name is Patheng, by ordinary phonetics used for Putheng, and spelt Pusin or Pusim. He disputes the statement that the change of name was made by Alaungp'aya or Alompra. The Talaing pronunciation of the name is Pasem or Pasim, according to dialect.]

[1801.—“An ineffectual attempt was made to repossess and defend Bassien by the late Chekey or Lieutenant.”—Symes, Mission, 16.]

The form Persaim occurs in Dalrymple, (1759) (Or. Repert., i. 127 and passim).

(3) Basim, or properly Wdsim; an old town in Berar, the chief place of the district so-called. [See Berar Gazett. 176.]

BATĀRA, s. This is a term applied to divinities in old Javanese inscriptions, &c., the use of which was spread over the Archipelago. It was regarded by W. von Humboldt as taken from the Skt. avatara (see AVATAR); but this derivation is now rejected. The word is used among R. C. Christians in the Philippines now as synonymous with ‘God’; and is applied to the infant Jesus (Blumentritt, Vocabular). [Mr. Skeat (Malay Magic, 86 seqq.) discusses the origin of the word, and prefers the derivation given by Favre and Wilkin, Skt. bhattāra, ‘lord.’ A full account of the “Petara, or Sea Dyak gods,” by Archdeacon J. Perham, will be found in Roth, Natives of Sarawak, I. 168 seqq.]

BATAVIA, n.p. The famous capital of the Dutch possessions in the Indies; occupying the site of the old city of Jakatra, the seat of a Javanese kingdom which combined the present Dutch Provinces of Bantam, Buitenzorg, Krawang, and the Preanger Regencies.

1619.—“On the day of the capture of Jakatra, 30th May 1619, it was certainly time and place to speak of the Governor-General's dissatisfaction that the name of Batavia had been given to the Castle.”—Valentijn, iv. 489.

The Governor-General, Jan Pietersen Coen, who had taken Jakatra, desired to have called the new fortress New Hoorn, from his own birth-place, Hoorn, on the Zuider Zee.

c. 1649.—“While I stay'd at Batavia, my Brother dy'd; and it was pretty to consider what the Dutch made me pay for his Funeral.”—Tavernier (E.T.), i. 203.

BATCUL, BATCOLE, BATECALA, &c., n.p. Bhatkal. A place often named in the older narratives. It is on the coast of Canara, just S. of Pigeon Island and Hog Island, in lat. 13° 59', and is not to be confounded (as it has been) with BEITCUL.

1328.—“... there is also the King of Batigala, but he is of the Saracens.”—Friar Jordanus, p. 41.

1510.—The “Bathecala, a very noble city of India,” of Varthema (119), though misplaced, must we think be this place and not Beitcul.

1548.—“Trelado (i.e. ‘Copy’) do Contrato que o Governador Gracia de Saa fez com a Raynha de Batecalaa por não aver Reey e ela reger o Reeyno.”—In S. Botelho, Tombu, 242.

1599.—“... part is subject to the Queene of Baticola, who selleth great store of pepper to the Portugals, at a towne called Onor. . .” —Sir Fulke Breville to Sir Fr. Walsingham, in Bruce's Annals, i. 125.

1618.—“The fift of March we anchored at Batachala, shooting three Peeces to give notice of our arriual. . .” —Wm. Hore, in Purchas, i. 657. See also Sainsbury, ii. p. 374.

1727.—“The next Sea-port, to the Southward of Onour, is Batacola, which has the restigia of a very large city. . .” —A. Hamilton, i. 282.

[1785.—“Byte Koal.” See quotation under DHOW.]

BATEL, BATELO, BOTELLA, s. A sort of boat used in Western India, Sind, and Bengal. Port. batel, which occurs in the Batavia Gama, 91 [cf. PATTELL]

[1686.—“About four or five hundred houses burnt down with a great number of their Bettilos, Boras and boats.”—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 55.]

1838.—“The Botella may be described as a Dow in miniature. . . It has invariably a square flat stern, and a long grab-like head.”—Vaupell, in Trans. Bo. Geog. Soc. vii. 98.

1857.—“A Sindhi battéla, called Rah-math, under the Tindal Kasim, laden with dry fish, was about to proceed to Bombay.”—Lutfullah, 347. See also Burton, Sind Revisited (1877), 32, 33.

[1900.—“The Sheikh has some fine war-vessels, called batils.”—Bent, Southern Arabia, 8.]

BATTÀ, s. Two different words are thus expressed in Anglo-Indian colloquial, and in a manner confounded.

a. H. bhata or bhattā: an extra allowance made to officers, soldiers, or other public servants, when in the field, or on other special grounds; also subsistence money to witnesses, prisoners, and the like. Military Batta, originally an occasional allowance, as defined, grew to be a constant addition to the pay of officers in India, and constituted the chief part of the excess of Indian over English military emoluments. The question of the right to batta on several occasions created great agitation among the officers of the Indian army, and the measure of economy carried out by Lord William Bentinck when Governor-General (G. O. of the Gov.-Gen. in Council, 29th November 1828) in the reduction of full batta to half batta, in the allowances received by all regimental officers serving at stations within a certain distance of the Presidency in Bengal (viz. Barrackpore, Dumdum, Berhampore, and Dinapore) caused an enduring bitterness against that upright ruler.

It is difficult to arrive at the origin of this word. There are, however, several Hindi words in rural use, such as bhāt, bhantā, ‘advances made to ploughmen without interest,’ and bhatta, bhantā, ‘ploughmen’s wages in kind,’ with which it is possibly connected. It has also been suggested, without much probability, that it may be allied to bahut, ‘much, excess,’ an idea entering into the meaning of both a and b. It is just possible that the familiar military use of the term in India may have been influenced by the existence of the European military term bât or bât-money. The latter is from bât, ‘a pack-saddle,’ [Late Lat. bastum], and implies an allowance for carrying baggage in the field. It will be seen that one writer below seems to confound the two words.

b. H. battā and battā: agio, or difference in exchange, discount on coins not current, or of short weight. We may notice that Sir H. Elliot does not recognize an absolute separation between the two senses of Batta. His definition runs thus: “Difference of exchange; anything extra; an extra allowance; discount on uncurrent, or short-weight coins; usually called Batta. The word has been supposed to be a corruption of Bharta, increase, but it is a pure Hindi vocable, and is more usually applied to discount than to premium.”—(Supp. Gloss. ii. 41.) [Platts, on the other hand, distinguishes the two words—Battā, Skt. vritta, ‘turned,’ or varta, ‘livelihood’—“Exchange, discount, difference of exchange, deduction, &c.,” and Bhattā, Skt. bhakta ‘allotted,’—“advances to ploughmen without interest; ploughman’s wages in kind.”] It will be seen that we have early Portuguese instances of the word apparently in both senses.

The most probable explanation is that the word (and I may add, the thing) originated in the Portuguese practice, and in the use of the Canarese word bhatta, Mahr, bhāt, ‘rice’ in ‘the husk,’ called by the Portuguese bata and bata, for a maintenance allowance.

The word batty, for what is more generally called paddy, is or was commonly used by the English also in S. and W. India (see Linschoten, Lucena and Fryer quoted s.v. Paddy, and Wilson’s Glossary, s.v. Bhatta).

The practice of giving a special allowance for mantimento began from a very early date in the Indian history of the Portuguese, and it evidently became a recognised augmentation of pay, corresponding closely to our batta, whilst the quotation from Botelho below shows also that bata and mantimento were used, more or less interchangeably, for this allowance. The correspondence with our Anglo-Indian batta went very far, and a case singularly parallel to the discontent raised in the Indian army by the reduction BAYADÈRE, s. A Hindu dancing-girl. The word is especially used by French writers, from whom it has been sometimes borrowed as if it were a genuine Indian word, particularly characteristic of the persons in question. The word is in fact only a Gallicized form of the Portuguese bailadeira, from bailar, to dance. Some 50 to 60 years ago there was a famous ballet called Le dieu et la bayadère, and under this title Punch made one of the most famous hits of his early days by presenting a cartoon of Lord Ellenborough as the Bayadère dancing before the idol of Somnāth; [also see DANCING-GIRL].

1513.—“There also came to the ground many dancing women (molheres bailadeiras) with their instruments of music, who make their living by that business, and these danced and sang all the time of the banquet . . .”—Correa, ii. 364.

1526.—“XLVII. The dancers and danceresses (bayladores e bayladeiras) who come to perform at a village shall first go and perform at the house of the principal man of the village” (Gancar, see GAUM).—Foral de vns costumes dos Gancars e Lamladores de da Ilha de Goa, in Arch. Port. Or., fascic. 5, 132.

1598.—“The heathenish whore called Balliadera, who is a dancer.”—Linachoten, 74; [Hak. Soc. i. 264].

1599.—“In hac icone primum proponitur Ida Balliadera, id est saltatrix, quae in publicis ludis aliisque solennitatibus saltando spectaculum exhibet.”—De Bry, Text to pl. 32, in vol. ii. (also see p. 90, and vol. vii. 26, etc.).

1676.—“All the Baladines of Gomān were present to dance in their own manner according to custom.”—Tavernier, ch. Ball, ii. 335.]

1782.—“Surate est renommé par ses Bayadères, dont le véritable nom est Décadans: celui de Bayadères que nous leur donnons, vient du mot Balladeiras, qui signifie en Portugais Dansseuses.”—Sonnerat, i. 7.

1794.—“The name of Balliadera, we never heard applied to the dancing girls; or saw but in Raynal, and ‘War in Asia,’ by an Officer of Colonel Baillie’s Detachment: it is a corrupt Portuguese word.”—Mon’s Narrative of Little’s Detachment, 356.

1825.—“This was the first specimen I had seen of the southern Bayadère, who differ considerably from the nāch girls of northern India, being all in the service of different temples, for which they are purchased young.”—Heber, ii. 180.

c. 1836.—“On one occasion a rumour reached London that a great success had been achieved in Paris by the performance of a set of Hindoo dancers, called Les Bayadères, who were supposed to be priestesses of a certain sect, and the London theatrical managers were at once on the qui vive to secure the new attraction . . . My father had concluded the arrangement with the Bayadères before his brother managers arrived in Paris. Shortly afterwards, the Hindoo priestesses appeared at the Adelphi. They were utterly uninteresting, wholly unattractive. My father lost £2000 by the speculation; and in the family they were known as the ‘Buy-em-dears’ ever after.”—Edmund Yates, Recollections, i. 29, 30 (1884).

BAYPARREE, BEOPARRY, s. H. bepdri, and byopdri (from Skt. vydpārin); a trader, and especially a petty trader or dealer.

A friend long engaged in business in Calcutta (Mr J. F. Ogilvy, of Gillanders & Co.) communicates a letter from an intelligent Bengalee gentleman, illustrating the course of trade in country produce before it reaches the hands of the European shipper:

1878.—“ . . . the enhanced rates . . . do not practically benefit the producer in a marked, or even in a corresponding degree; for the lion’s share goes into the pockets of certain intermediate classes, who are the growth of the above system of business.

“Following the course of trade as it flows into Calcutta, we find that between the cultivators and the exporter these are: 1st. The Bepparree, or petty trader; 2nd. The Aurut-dar;* and 3rd. The Mahajun, interested in the Calcutta trade. As soon as the crops are cut, Bepparree appears upon the scene; he visits village after village, and goes from homestead to homestead, buying there, or at the village marts, from the ryots; he then takes his purchases to the Aurut-dar, who is stationed at a centre of trade, and to whom he is perhaps under advances, and from the Aurut-dar the Calcutta Mahajun obtains his supplies . . . for eventual despatch to the capital. There is also a fourth class of dealers called Phoreas, who buy from the Mahajun and sell to the European exporter. Thus, between the cultivator and the shipper there are so many middlemen, whose participation in the trade involves a multiplication of profits, which goes a great way towards enhancing the price of commodities before they reach the shipper’s hands.”—Letter from Baboo Nobokissin Ghose. [Similar details for Northern India will be found in Hoey, Mon. Trade and Manufactures of Lucknow, 59 seqq.]

BAZAAR, s. H. &c. From P. bāzār, a permanent market or street of shops. The word has spread westward into

* Aurut-dar is ārhat-dār, from H. ārhat, ‘agency’; phorea=H. phariyā, ‘a retailer.’

Arabic, Turkish, and, in special senses, into European languages, and eastward into India, where it has generally been adopted into the vernaculars. The popular pronunciation is bāzār. In S. India and Ceylon the word is used for a single shop or stall kept by a native. The word seems to have come to S. Europe very early. F. Balducci Pegolotti, in his Mercantile Handbook (c. 1340) gives Bazarra as a Genoese word for 'market-place' (Cathay, &c. ii. 286). The word is adopted into Malay as pāḍār, [or in the poems pasara].

N. S.* vii. p. 617 (Vienna, by M. D. Conway).

BDELLIUM, s. This aromatic gum-resin has been identified with that of the Balsamodendron Mukul, Hooker, inhabiting the dry regions of Arabia and Western India; gugal of Western India, and mokl in Arabic, called in P. bo-i-jahūdān (Jews' scent). What the Hebrew bdolah of the R. Phison was, which was rendered bdellium since the time of Josephus, remains very doubtful. Lassen has suggested musk as possible. But the argument is only this: that Dioscorides says some called bdellium μάδελλον; that μάδελλον perhaps represents Madalaka, and though there is no such Skt. word as madālaka, there might be madāraka, because there is madāra, which means some perfume, no one knows what! (Ind. Alterth. i. 292.) Dr. Royle says the Persian authors describe the Bdellium as being the product of the Doom palm (see Hindu Medicine, p. 90). But this we imagine is due to some ambiguity in the sense of mokl. [See the authorities quoted in Encycl. Bibl. s.v. Bdellium which still leave the question in some doubt.]

BEADALA, n.p. Formerly a port of some note for native craft on the Rāmnād coast (Madura district) of the Gulf of Manar, Vadaulay in the Atlas of India. The proper name seems to be Vēḍalai, by which it is mentioned in Bishop Caldwell's Hist. of Tinnevely (p. 235), [and which is derived from Tam. vedu, 'hunting,' and al, 'a banyan-tree' (*Mad. 1814.—

"What are the luxuries they boast them here?

The lolling couch, the joys of bottled beer."

From 'The Cadet, a Poem in 6 parts, &c. by a late resident in the East.' This is a most lugubrious production, the author finding nothing to his taste in India. In this respect it reads something like a caricature of "Oakfield," without the noble character and sentiment of that book. As the Rev. Hobart Caunter, the author seems to have come to a less doleful view of things Indian, and for some years he wrote the letter-press of the "Oriental Annual."

BEER, COUNTRY. At present, at least in Upper India, this expression simply indicates ale made in India (see COUNTRY) as at Masūri, Kasauli, and Ootacamund Breweries. But it formerly was (and in Madras perhaps still is) applied to ginger-beer, or to a beverage described in some of the quotations below, which must have become obsolete early in the last century. A drink of this nature called Sugar-beer was the ordinary drink at Batavia in the 17th century, and to its use some travellers ascribed the prevalent unhealthiness. This is probably what is described by Jacob Bontius in the first quotation:

1631.—There is a recipe given for a beer of this kind, "not at all less good than Dutch beer. . . . Take a hooped cask of 30 amphorae (?), fill with pure river water; add 2lb. black Java sugar, 4oz. tamarinds, 3 lemons cut up, cork well and put in a cool place. After 14 hours it will boil as if on a fire," &c.—Hist. Nat. et Med. Indiae Orient., p. 8. We doubt the result anticipated.

1789.—"They use a pleasant kind of drink, called Country-beer, with their victuals; which is composed of toddy . . . porter, and brown-sugar; is of a brisk nature, but when cooled with saltpetre and water, becomes a very refreshing draught."—Munro, Narrative, 42.

1810.—"A temporary beverage, suited to the very hot weather, and called Country-beer, is in rather general use, though water artificially cooled is commonly drunk during the repasts."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 122.

BEER-DRINKING. Up to about 1850, and a little later, an ordinary exchange of courtesies at an Anglo-Indian dinner-table in the provinces, especially a mess-table, was to ask a guest, perhaps many yards distant, to "drink beer" with you; in imitation of the English custom of drinking wine together, which became obsolete somewhat earlier. In Western India, when such an invitation was given at a mess-table, two tumblers, holding half a bottle each, were brought to the inviter, who carefully divided the bottle between the two, and then sent one to the guest whom he invited to drink with him.

1848.—"'He aint got distangy manners, dammy,' Bragg observed to his first mate; 'he wouldn't do at Government House, Roper, where his Lordship and Lady William was as kind to me . . . and asking me at dinner to take beer with him before the Commander-in-Chief himself . . .'"—Vanity Fair, II. ch. xxii.

1853.—"First one officer, and then another, asked him to drink beer at mess, as a kind of tacit suspension of hostilities."—Oakfield, ii. 52.

BEETLEFAKEE, n.p. "In some old Voyages coins used at Mocha are so called. The word is Bait-ul-fākihā, the 'Fruit-market,' the name of a bazar there." So C. P. Brown. The place is in fact the Coffee-mart of which Hodeida is the port, from which it is about 30 m. distant inland, and 4 marches north of Mocha. And the name is really Bait-al-Fakih, 'The House of the Divine,' from the tomb of the Saint Aḥmad Ibn Mūsā, which was the nucleus of the place.—(See Ritter, xii. 872; see also BEETLE-FAKIE, Milburn, i. 96.)

1690.—"Coffee . . . grows in abundance at Beetle-fuckee . . . and other parts."—Ovington, 465.

1710.—"They daily bring down coffee from the mountains to Betelfaquy, which is not above 3 leagues off, where there is a market for it every day of the week."—(French) Voyage to Arabia the Happy, E. T., London, 1726, p. 99.

1770.—"The tree that produces the Coffee grows in the territory of Betel-faqi, a town belonging to Yemen."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 352.

BEGAR, BIGARRY, s. H. begārī, from P. begār, 'forced labour' [be 'with-out,' gār (for kār), 'one who works']; a person pressed to carry a load, or do other work really or professedly for public service. In some provinces begār is the forced labour, and bigārī the pressed man; whilst in Karnāta, begārī is the performance of the lowest village offices without money payment, but with remuneration in grain or land (Wilson). C. P. Brown says the word is Canarese; but the P. origin is hardly doubtful.

[1535.—“Telling him that they fought like heroes and worked (at building the fort) like bygairya.”—Correa, iii. 625.]

1554.—“And to 4 begguaryna, who serve as water carriers to the Portuguese and others in the said intrenchment, 15 leals a day to each. . . .”—S. Botelho, Tombo, 78.

1673.—“Gueurn, whither I took a Pilgrimage, with one other of the Factors, Four Peons, and Two Biggereens, or Porters only.”—Fryer, 158.

1500.—“The bygarry system is not bearable: it must be abolished entirely.”—Wellington, i. 244.

1815.—Aitchison's Indian Treaties, &c., contains under this year numerous sunnuds issued, in Nepāl War, to Hill Chiefs, stipulating for attendance when required with “begarees and sepoya.”—ii. 339 seqq.

1552.—“The Malauna people were some time back ordered to make a practicable road but they flatly refused to do anything of the kind, saying they had never done any begār labour, and did not intend to do any.”—ref. counting.

BEHAR, n.p. H. Bihār. That province of the Mogul Empire which lay on the Ganges immediately above Bengal, was so called, and still retains the name and character of a province, under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and embracing the ten modern districts of Patna, Sāran, Gāya, Shāhād, Tirhut, Champāran, the Santāl Parganas, Bhāgalpūr, Monghyr, and Purnāh. The name was taken from the old city of Bihār, and that derived its title from being the site of a famous Vihāra in Buddhist times. In the later days of Mahommedan rule the three provinces of Bengal, Behar and Orissa were under one Subadar, viz. the Nawāb, who resided latterly at Marshidābād.

[1676.—“Translate of a letter from Shaus-teth Caukne (Shaista Khan) . . . in answer to one from Wares Cawne, Great Chancellor of the Province of Bearra about the English.”—In Birdwood, Rep. 80].

The following is the first example we have noted of the occurrence of the three famous names in combination:

1679.—“On perusal of several letters relating to the procuring of the Great Mogul's Phyrmaund for trade, custome free, in the Bay of Bengall, the Chief in Council at Hugly is ordered to procure the same, for the English to be Customs free in Bengal, Orixā and Bearra. . . .”—Ft. St. Geo. Cons., 20th Feb. in Notes and Exts., Pt. ii. p. 7.

BEHUT, n.p. H. Behat. One of the names, and in fact the proper name, of the Punjab river which we now call Jelum (i.e. Jhīlam) from a town on its banks: the Hydaspes or Bidaspes of the ancients. Both Behat and the Greek name are corruptions, in different ways, of the Skt. name Vitastā. Sidi 'Alī (p. 200) calls it the river of Bahra. Bahra or Bhera was a district on the river, and the town and tahsīl still remain, in Shahpur Dist. [It “is called by the natives of Kāśmīr, where it rises, the Bedasta, which is but a slightly-altered form of its Skt. name, the Vitastā, which means ‘wide-spread.’”—McCrindle, Invasion of India, 93 seqq.]

BEIRAMEE, BYRAMEE, also BYRAMPAUT, s. P. bairam, bairamī. The name of a kind of cotton stuff which appears frequently during the flourishing period of the export of these from India; but the exact character of which we have been unable to ascertain. In earlier times, as appears from the first quotation, it was a very fine stuff. [From the quotation dated 1609 below, they appear to have resembled the fine linen known as “Holland” (for which see Draper's Dict. s.v.).]

c. 1343.—Ibn Batuta mentions, among presents sent by Sultan Mahommed Tughlak of Delhi to the great Kaan, “100 suits of raiment called bairamīyah, i.e. of a cotton stuff, which were of unequalled beauty, and were each worth 100 dīnārs [rupees].”—iv. 2.

1510.—“Fifty ships are laden every year in this place (Bengala) with cotton and silk stuffs . . . that is to say bairam."—Varthema, 212.

1554.—"From this country come the muslins called Candaharians, and those of Daulatābād, Berūpātri, and Bairami."—Sidi 'Alī, in J.A.S.B., v. 460.

"And for 6 beirames for 6 surplices, which are given annually . . . which may be worth 7 pardaos."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 129.

[1609.—"A sort of cloth called Byramy resembling Holland cloths."—Danvers, Letters, i. 29.]

[1610.—"Bearams white will vent better than the black."—Ibid. i. 75].

[c. 1700.—"50 blew byrampants" (read byrampants, H. pat., 'a length of cloth').—In Notes and Queries, 7th Ser. ix. 29.]

1727.—"Some Surat Baftaes dyed blue, and some Berams dyed red, which are both coarse cotton cloth."—A. Hamilton, ii. 125.

1813.—"Byrams of sorts," among Surat piece-goods, in Milburn, i. 124.

BEITCUL, n.p. We do not know how this name should be properly written. The place occupies the isthmus connecting Carwar Head in Canara with the land, and lies close to the Harbour of Carwar, the inner part of which is Beitcul Cove.

1711.—"Ships may ride secure from the South West Monsoon at Batte Cove (qu. BATTECOLE?), and the River is navigable for the largest, after they have once got in."—Lockyer, 272.

1727.—"The Portuguese have an Island called Anjediva [see ANCHEDIVA] . . . about two miles from Batcoal."—A. Hamilton, i. 277.

BELGAUM, n.p. A town and district of the Bombay Presidency, in the S. Mahratta country. The proper name is said to be Canarese Vennu-grāma, 'Bamboo-Town.' [The name of a place of the same designation in the Vizagapatam district in Madras is said to be derived from Skt. bila-grāma, 'cave-village.'—Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. s.v.] The name occurs in De Barros under the form "Cidade de Bilgan" (Dec. IV., liv. vii. cap 5).

BENAMEE, adj. P.—H. be-nāmī, 'anonymous'; a term specially applied to documents of transfer or other contract in which the name entered as that of one of the chief parties (e.g. of a purchaser) is not that of the person really interested. Such transactions are for various reasons very common in India, especially in Bengal, and are not by any means necessarily fraudulent, though they have often been so. ["There probably is no country in the world except India, where it would be necessary to write a chapter 'On the practice of putting property into a false name.'—(Mayne, Hindu Law, 373).] In the Indian Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860), sections 421-423, "on fraudulent deeds and dispositions of Property," appear to be especially directed against the dishonest use of this benamee system.

It is alleged by C. P. Brown on the authority of a statement in the Friend of India (without specific reference) that the proper term is bandmī, adopted from such a phrase as bandmī chitthī, 'a transferable note of hand,' such notes commencing, 'ba-nām-i-fukīna,' 'to the name or address of' (Abraham Newlands). This is conceivable, and probably true, but we have not the evidence, and it is opposed to all the authorities: and in any case the present form and interpretation of the term ndmī has become established.

1854.—"It is very much the habit in India to make purchases in the name of others, and from whatever causes the practice may have arisen, it has existed for a series of years: and these transactions known as 'Benamee transactions': are noticed at least as early as the year 1778, in Mr. Justice Hyde's Notes on Justice Knight Bruce, in Moore's Reports, Cases on Appeal before the P. C. p. 72.

"The presumption of the law in a joint undivided family, in which the whole property of the family is . . . where a purchase of land is made by a Hindoo in the name of his sons, the presumption of the law is in favour of its being a benam purchase, and the burthen of proof lies on the person in whose name it was purchased, that he was solely entitled to it."—Editor of above Vol., p. 53.

1861.—"The decree Sale of the chief cause of that nuisance is the benam system. . . . It is a peculiar mode of getting the benefits and avoiding its charges, which consists in one man holding the property for himself, but really for another, and by ringing the bell for the two . . . relief."

1686.—“Il est bon d'observer, vue le commun Peuple appelle le Bend-Emir en cet endroit ab pulneu, c'est à dire le Fleuve du Pont Neuf; qu'on ne l'appelle par son nom de Bend-Emir que proche de la Digue, qui lui a fait donner ce nom.”—Chardin (ed. 1711), ix. 45.

1809.—“We proceeded three miles further, and crossing the River Bend-emir, entered the real plain of Merdasht.”—Morier (First Journey), 124. See also (1811) 2nd Journey, pp. 73-74, where there is a view of the Band-Amir.

“There's a bower of roses by Bendameer's stream,
And the nightingale sings round it all the day long.”—Lalla Rookh.

1850.—“The water (of Lake Neyriz) . . . is almost entirely derived from the Kur (known to us as the Bund Amir River) . . .” —Abbott, in J.R.G.S., xxv. 73.

1878.—We do not know whether the Band-i-Amir is identical with the quasi-synonymous Pul-i-Khan by which Col. Macgregor crossed the Kur on his way from Shiraz to Yezd. See his Khorassan, i. 45.

BENDÁRA, s. A term used in the Malay countries as a title of one of the higher ministers of state—Malay bandahara, Jav. bendara, ‘Lord.’ The word enters into the numerous series of purely honorary Javanese titles, and the etiquette in regard to it is very complicated. (See Tijdschr. v. Nederl. Indie, year viii. No. 12, 253 seqq.). It would seem that the title is properly bāndārā, ‘a treasurer,’ and taken from the Skt. bhāndārin, ‘a steward or treasurer.’ Haex in his Malay-Latin Dict. gives Bandari, ‘Oeconomus, quaestor, expenditor.’ [Mr. Skeat writes that Clifford derives it from Benda-hara-an, ‘a treasury,’ which he again derives from Malay benda, ‘a thing,’ without explaining hara, while Wilkinson with more probability classes it as Skt.]

1509.—“Whilst Sequeira was consulting with his people over this matter, the King sent his Bendhara or Treasure-Master on board.”—Valentijn, v. 322.

1539.—“There the Bandara (Bendara) of Malaca, (who is as it were Chief Justicer among the Mahometans), (o supremo no mando, na honra e ne justica dos mouros) was present in person by the express commandment of Pedro de Faria for to entertain him.”—Pinto (orig. cap. xiv.), in Cojan, p. 17.

1552.—“And as the Bendara was by nature a traitor and a tyrant, the counsel they gave him seemed good to him.”—Castanheda, ii. 359, also iii. 433.

1561.—“Então manson . . . que dizer que matára o seu bandara polo mao conselho que lhe devo.”—Correa, Lendas, ii. 225.

[1610.—An official at the Maldives is called Rana-bandery Tacourou, which Mr. Gray interprets—Singh. ran, ‘gold,’ bandhara, ‘treasury,’ thakkura, Skt., ‘an idol.’—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 58.]

1631.—“There were in Malaca five principal officers of dignity . . . the second is Bendará, he is the superintendent of the executive (reador da fazenda) and governs the Kingdom: sometimes the Bendará holds both offices, that of Puduca raja and of Bendará.”—D’Albuquerque, Commentaries (orig.), 358-359.

“O principal sogeito no governo
De Mahomet, e privanca, era o Bendára, Magistrado supremo.”

1726.—“Bandares or Adassing are those who are at the Court as Dukes, Counts, even Princes of the Royal House.”—Valtijn (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 8.

1810.—“After the Raja had amused self with their speaking, and was tired . . . the bintara with the green eye it is the custom that the eldest bū should have green shades before his that he may not be dazzled by the gre of the Raja, and forget his duty) t the books and packets, and deliver to the bintara with the black bū whose hands the Raja received t by one, in order to present the youths.”—A Malay's account of Govt. House, Calcutta, transl. by in Maria Graham, p. 202.

1883.—“In most of the State prince has regular officers un among whom . . . the Band surer, who is the first minis Bird, The Golden Chersonese, :

BENDY, BINDY, s. :
COY (q. v.), the form in bhindī, [bhendī], Dakh. bhendā; also in H. fruit of the plant Abel also Hibiscus esc. It : bāmiyah (Lane, Moc i. 199 : [5th ed. i.

Nights, xi. 57]), whence the modern Greek μπάμα. In Italy the vegetable is called corni de' Greci. The Latin name Abelmoschus is from the Ar. ḥabb-ul-mushk, 'grain of musk' (Dony).

1810.—"The bendy, called in the West Indies okree, is a pretty plant resembling a hollyhock; the fruit is about the length and thickness of one's finger . . . when boiled it is soft and mucilaginous."—Maria Graham, 24.

1813.—"The banda (Hibiscus esculentus) is a nutritious oriental vegetable."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 32; [2nd ed. i. 22].

1880.—"I recollect the West Indian Ookroo . . . being some years ago recommended for introduction in India. The seed was largely advertised, and sold at about 8s. the ounce to eager horticulturists, who . . . found that it came up nothing other than the familiar bendy, the seed of which sells at Bombay for 1d. the ounce. Yet . . . ookroo seed continued to be advertised and sold at 8s. the ounce. . . ."—Note by Sir G. Birdwood.

BENDY-TREE, s. This, according to Sir G. Birdwood, is the Thespesia populnea, Lam. [Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 45 seqq.], and gives a name to the 'Bendy Bazar' in Bombay. (See PORTIA.)

BENGAL, n.p. The region of the Ganges Delta and the districts immediately above it; but often in English use with a wide application to the whole territory garrisoned by the Bengal army. This name does not appear, so far as we have been able to learn, in any Mahomedan or Western writing before the latter part of the 13th century. In the earlier part of that century the Mahomedan writers generally call the province Lakhnaotī, after the chief city, but we have also the old form Bang, from the indigenous Vanga. Already, however, in the 11th century we have it as Vangdlam on the Inscription of the great Tanjore Pagoda. This is the oldest occurrence that we can cite.

The alleged City of Bengala of the Portuguese which has greatly perplexed geographers, probably originated with the Arab custom of giving an important foreign city or seaport the name of the country in which it lay (compare the city of Solmandala, under COROMANDEL). It long kept a place in maps. The last occurrence that we know of is in a chart of 1743, in Dalrymple's Collection, which identifies it with Chittagong, and it may be considered certain that Chittagong was the place intended by the older writers (see Varthema and Ovington). The former, as regards his visiting Banghella, deals in fiction—a thing clear from internal evidence, and expressly alleged, by the judicious Garcia de Orta: "As to what you say of Ludovico Vartomano, I have spoken, both here and in Portugal, with men who knew him here in India, and they told me that he went about here in the garb of a Moor, and then reverted to us, doing penance for his sins; and that the man never went further than Calicut and Cochin."—Colloquios, f. 30.

c. 1250.—"Muhammad Bakhtiyār . . . returned to Behār. Great fear of him prevailed in the minds of the infidels of the territories of Lakhnauti, Behar, Bang, and Kāmṛūp."—Tabakāt-i-Nāsiri, in Elliot, ii. 307.

c. 1300.—". . . then to Bijalār (but better reading Bangālā), which from of old is subject to Delhi"—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 72.

c. 1345.—". . . we were at sea 43 days and then arrived in the country of Banjāla, which is a vast region abounding in rice. I have seen no country in the world where provisions are cheaper than in this; but it is muggy, and those who come from Khorāsān call it 'a hell full of good things.'"—Ibn Batuta, iv. 211. (But the Emperor Aurungzebe is alleged to have "emphatically styled it the Paradise of Nations."—Note in Starorinus, i. 291.)

c. 1350.—

"Shukr shikan shawund hama tūḥid-i-Hind Zin kand-i-Pārsi kih ba Bangāla mi rawad." Hāfiz.

i.e.,

"Sugar nibbling are all the parrots of Ind
From this Persian candy that travels to Bengal" (viz. his own poems).

1506.—"A Banzelo, el suo Re è Moro, e li se fa el forzo de' panni de gotton. . ."—Leonardo da Ca' Masser, 28.

1510.—"We took the route towards the city of Banghella . . . one of the ~~cities~~ that I had hitherto seen."—Varthema

it is necessary to remark that the use of the term Barbiers is by no means confined to French writers, as a glance at the quotations under that word will show). The disease prevails endemically in Ceylon, and in Peninsular India in the coast-tracts, and up to 40 or 60 m. inland; also in Burma and the Malay region, including all the islands, at least so far as New Guinea, and also Japan, where it is known as kakké: [see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 238 seqq.]. It is very prevalent in certain Madras Jails. The name has become somewhat old-fashioned, but it has recurred of late years, especially in hospital reports from Madras and Burma. It is frequently epidemic, and some of the Dutch physicians regard it as infectious. See a pamphlet, Beri-Beri door J. A. Lodewijks, ond-officier van Gezondheit bij het Ned. Indische Leger, Harderwijk, 1882. In this pamphlet it is stated that in 1879 the total number of beri-beri patients in the military hospitals of Netherlands-India, amounted to 9873, and the deaths among these to 1682. In the great military hospitals at Achin there died of beri-beri between 1st November 1879, and 1st April 1880, 574 persons, of whom the great majority were dwangarbeiders, i.e. 'forced labourers.' These statistics show the extraordinary prevalence and fatality of the disease in the Archipelago. Dutch literature on the subject is considerable.

Sir George Birdwood tells us that during the Persian Expedition of 1857 he witnessed beri-beri of extraordinary virulence, especially among the East African stokers on board the steamers. The sufferers became dropsically distended to a vast extent, and died in a few hours.

In the second quotation scurvy is evidently meant. This seems much allied by causes to beriberi though different in character.

[1568.—"Our people sickened of a disease called berbere, the belly and legs swell, and in a few days they die, as there died many, ten or twelve a day."—Couto, viii. ch. 25.]

c. 1610.—"Ce ne fut pas tout, car i'eus encor ceste fascheuse maladie de louende que les Portugais appellent autrement berber et les Hollandais scurbut."—Mocquet, 221.

1613.—"And under the orders of the said General André Furtado de Mendça, the discoverer departed to the court of Goa, being ill with the malady of the ber in order to get himself treated."—(de Eredia, f. 58.

1631.—". . . Constat frequenti usu, praesertim liquoris saguier dic solum diarrhaeas . . . sed et pa Beriberi dictam hinc natam esse. Bontii, Dial. iv. See also Lib. ii. c. and Lib. iii. p. 40.

1659.—"There is also another s which prevails in Banda and Ceylon is called Barberi; it does not v natives so much as foreigners."—Sa

1682.—"The Indian and Port women draw from the green flower cloves, by means of firing with a water or spirit of marvellous sweet . . . especially is it good against a kind of paralysis called Berebery."—N Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 33.

1685.—"The Portuguese in the suffer from another sickness which natives call béri-béri."—Ribeiro, f. 55

1809.—"A complaint, as far as I learnt, peculiar to the island (Ceylon) berri-berri; it is in fact a dropsy frequently destroys in a few days." Valentia, i. 318.

1835.—(On the Maldives) ". . . crew of the vessels during the survey suffered mostly from two diseases. Beri-beri which attacked the Indians and generally proved fatal."—Youn Christopher, in Tr. Ro. Geog. Soc., vol.

1837.—"Empyreumatic oil called nigrum, from the seeds of Celastrus (Malkungnee) described in Mr. Malcolm's prize Essay on the Hist. and Treat of Beriberi . . . the most effic remedy in that intractable complaint."—Royle on Hindu Medicine, 46.

1880.—"A malady much dreaded Japanese, called Kakké. . . . It is the most singular dread. It is considered the same disease as that which, under the name of Beriberi, makes such havoc times on crowded jails and barracks." Bird's Japan, i. 288.

1882.—"Berba, a disease which is in great swelling of the abdomen."—mentritt, Vocabular, s. v.

1885.—"Dr. Wallace Taylor, of Japan, reports important discoveries respecting the origin of the disease as beri-beri. He has traced it to a microscopic spore largely developed in rice. He finally detected the same organism in the earth of certain alluvial and damp localities."—St. James's Gazette, Aug. 9th.

BETTEELA, BEATELLE, &c., s. The name of a kind of muslin constantly mentioned in old trading-lists and narratives. This seems to be a Sp. and Port. word beatilla or beatilha, for 'a veil,' derived, according to Cobarruvias, from "certain beatas, who invented or used the like." Beata is a religieuse. ["The Betilla is a certain kind of white E. I. chintz made at Masulipatam, and known under the name of Organdi."]—Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. p. 233.]

"Vestida huma camisa preciosa
Trazida de delgada beatilha,
Que o corpo crystallino deixa ver-se;
Que tanto bem não he para esconder-se."

Camões, vi. 21.

1598.—"... this linnen is of divers sorts, and is called Serampuras, Cassas, Comsas, Beattillias, Satopassas, and a thousand such names."—Linachoten, 28; [Hak. Soc. i. 95; and cf. i. 56].

1727.—"Before Aurungzeb conquered Visiupore, this country (Sundah) produced the finest Betteelas or Muslins in India."—A. Hamilton, i. 264.

[1788.—"There are various kinds of muslins brought from the East Indies, chiefly from Bengal: Betelles, &c."—Chambers' Cycl., quoted in 3 ser. Notes & Q. iv. 88.]

BEWAURIS, adj. P.—H. be-wāris, 'without heir.' Unclaimed, without heir or owner.

BEYPOOR, n.p. Properly Veppūr, or Bēppūr, [derived from Malayāl. veppu, 'deposit,' ur, 'village,' a place formed by the receding of the sea, which has been turned into the Skt. form Vāyupura, 'the town of the Wind-god']. The terminal town of the Madras Railway on the Malabar coast. It stands north of the river; whilst the railway station is on the S. of the river—(see CHALLA). Tippoo Sahib tried to make a great port of Beypoor, and to call it Sultanpatnam. [It is one of the many places which have been suggested as the site of Ophir (Logan, Malabar, i. 246), and is probably the Belliporto of Tavernier, "where there was a fort which the Dutch had made with palms" (ed. Ball, i. 235).]

"Chamará o Samorim mais gente nova;
Virão Reis de Bipur, e de Tanor. . ."

Camões, x. 14.

1727.—"About two Leagues to the Southward of Calcut, is a fine River called Bay-pore, capable to receive ships of 3 or 400 Tuns."—A. Hamilton, i. 322.

BEZOAR, s. This word belongs, not to the A.-Indian colloquial, but to the language of old oriental trade and materia medica. The word is a corruption of the P. name of the thing, pādzahr, 'pellens venenum,' or pāzahr. The first form is given by Meninski as the etymology of the word, and this is accepted by Littré [and the N.E.D.]. The quotations of Littré from Ambrose Paré show that the word was used generically for 'an antidote,' and in this sense it is used habitually by Avicenna. No doubt the term came to us, with so many others, from Arab medical writers, so much studied in the Middle Ages, and this accounts for the b, as Arabic has no p, and writes bāzahr. But its usual application was, and is, limited to certain hard concretions found in the bodies of animals, to which antidotal virtues were ascribed, and especially to one obtained from the stomach of a wild goat in the Persian province of Lar. Of this animal and the bezoar an account is given in Kaempfer's Amoenitates Exoticae, pp. 398 seqq. The Bezoar was sometimes called Snake-Stone, and erroneously supposed to be found in the head of a snake. It may have been called so really because, as Ibn Baithar states, such a stone was laid upon the bite of a venomous creature (and was believed) to extract the poison. Moodeen Sheriff, in his Suppt. to the Indian Pharmacopœia, says there are various bezours in use (in native mat. med.), distinguished according to the animal producing them, as a goat-, camel-, fish-, and snake-bezoar; the last quite distinct from Snake-Stone (q.v.).

[A false Bezoar stone gave occasion for the establishment of one of the great distinctions in our Common Law, viz. between actions founded upon contract, and those founded upon wrongs: Chandelor v. Lopus was decided in 1604 (reported in 2. Croke, and in Smith's Leading Cases). The head-note runs—

"The defendant sold to the plaintiff a stone, which he affirmed to be a Bezoar stone, but which proved not to be so. No action lies against him, unless he either knew that it was not a Bezoar stone, or warranted it to be a Bezoar stone" (quoted by Gray, Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 484.)

1516.—Barbosa writes pajar.

[1528.—"Near this city (Lara) in a small mountain are bred some animals of the size of a buck, in whose stomach grows a stone they call basar."—Teixeira, ch. iii. p. 14.]

[1554.—Castanbeda (I. ch. 46) calls the animal whence bezoar comes ingoldaf, which he considers an Indian word.]

c. 1580.—". . . adeo ut ex solis Bezahar nonnulla vasa conflata viderim, maxime apud eos qui a venenis sibi cavere student."—Troper Alpinus, Pt. i. p. 56.

1599.—"Body o' me, a shrewd mischance. Why, had you no unicorn's horn, nor bezoar's stone about you, ha?"—B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, Act v. sc. 4.

1605.—The King of Bantam sends K. James I. "two beasar stones."—Nainsbury, i. 143.

1610.—"The Persian calls it, par excellence, Parahar, which is as much as to say 'antidote' or more strictly 'remedy of poison or venom,' from Zuhar, which is the general name of any poison, and pa, 'remedy'; and as the Arabic lacks the letter p, they replace it by b, or f, and so they say, instead of Pāzahar, Bāzahar, and we with a little additional corruption Bezar."—P. Teixeira, Relações, &c., p. 157.

1613.—". . . elks, and great snakes, and apes of basar stone, and every kind of game birds."—Godinho de Eredia, 10r.

1617.—". . . late at night I drunke a little bezaz stone, which gave me much pain most parte of night, as though 100 Wormes had byn knawing at my hart; yet it gave me ease afterward."—Cocks's Diary, i. 301; [in i. 154 he speaks of "beza stone"]

1634.—Bontius claims the etymology just quoted from Teixeira, erroneously, as his err.—Lib. iv. p. 47.

1673.—"The Persians then call this stone Parahar, being a compound of Pa and Zu, the first of which is against, and the other is Pain."—Fryer, 238.

. . . The Monkey Bezoars which are long, are the best. . . —Ibid. 212.

1711.—"In this animal (Hog-deer of Sumatra, apparently a sort of chevrotain or Tragulus) is found the bitter Bezoar, called Pala di Poreo Siacca, valued at ten times its Weight in Gold."—Lockyer, 49.

1828.—"What is spikenard? what is basar? what is pahzer? compared even to a twinkle of a royal eye-lash?"—Hajji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 148.

BHAT, s. H. &c. bhat (Skt. bhāṭa, a title of respect, probably connected with bhātrī, 'a supporter or master'), a man of a tribe of mixed descent, whose members are professed genealogists and poets; a bard. These men in Rājputāna and Guzerat had also extraordinary privileges as the guarantors of travellers, whom they accompanied, against attack and robbery. See an account of them in Forbes's Rd. Malā, I. ix. &c., reprint 558 seqq.; [for Bengal, Risley, Tribes & Castes, i. 101 seqq.; for the N.W.P., Crooke, Tribes & Castes, ii. 20 seqq.]

c. 1555.—"Among the infidel Bānyāns in this country (Guzerat) there is a class of literati known as Bāta. These undertake to be guides to traders and other travellers . . . when the caravans are waylaid on the road by Rāshbūts, i.e. Indian horsemen, coming to pillage them, the Bāt takes out his dagger, points it at his own breast, and says: 'I have become surety! If aught befalls the caravan I must kill myself!' On these words the Rāshbūts let the caravan pass unharmed."—Sidi 'Alī, 95.

[1623.—"Those who perform the office of Priests, whom they call Boti."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 80.]

1775.—"The Hindoo rājās and Mahratta chieftains have generally a Bhaut in the family, who attends them on public occasions . . . sounds their praise, and proclaims their titles in hyperbolic and figurative language . . . many of them have another mode of living; they offer themselves as security to the different governments for payment of their revenue, and the good behaviour of the Zemindars, patels, and public farmers; they also become guarantees for treaties between native princes, and the performance of bonds by individuals."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 89; [2nd ed. i. 377; also see ii. 258]. See TRAGA.

1810.—"India, like the nations of Europe, had its minstrels and poets, concerning whom there is the following tradition: At the marriage of Siva and Parvatty, the immortals having exhausted all the amusements then known, wished for something new, when Siva, wiping the drops of sweat from his brow, shook them to earth, upon which the Bawts, or Bards, immediately sprang up."—Maria Graham, 169.

1828.—"A 'Bhat' or Bard came to ask a gratuity."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 53.

BHEEL, n.p. Skt. Bhilla; H. Bhil. The name of a race inhabiting the hills and forests of the Vindhya, Malwa, and of the N.-Western Deccan, and believed to have been the aborigines of Rājputāna; some have supposed them to be the Φυλλῖται of Ptolemy. They are closely allied to the Coolies (q. v.) of Guzerat, and are believed to belong to the Kolarian division of Indian aborigines. But no distinct Bhīl language survives.

1785.—“A most infernal yell suddenly issued from the deep ravines. Our guides informed us that this was the noise always made by the Bheels previous to an attack.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 480.

1825.—“All the Bheels whom we saw to-day were small, slender men, less broad-shouldered . . . and with faces less Celtic than the Puharees of the Rajmahal. . . . Two of them had rude swords and shields, the remainder had all bows and arrows.”—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 75.

BHEEL, s. A word used in Bengal—bhīl: a marsh or lagoon; same as Jeel (q. v.)

[1860.—“The natives distinguish a lake so formed by a change in a river’s course from one of usual origin or shape by calling the former a bowr—whilst the latter is termed a Bheel.”—Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 35.]

1879.—“Below Shouy-doung there used to be a big bheel, wherein I have shot a few duck, teal, and snipe.”—Pollok, Sport in B. Burmah, i. 26.

BHEESTY, s. The universal word in the Anglo-Indian households of N. India for the domestic (corresponding to the sakkā of Egypt) who supplies the family with water, carrying it in a mussuck, (q. v.), or goatskin, slung on his back. The word is P. bihishtī, a person of bihisht or paradise, though the application appears to be peculiar to Hindustan. We have not been able to trace the history of this term, which does not apparently occur in the Āin, even in the curious account of the way in which water was cooled and supplied in the Court of Akbar (Blochmann, tr. i. 55 seqq.), or in the old travellers, and is not given in Meninski’s lexicon. Vullers gives it only as from Shakespear’s Hindustani Dict. [The trade must be of ancient origin in India, as the leather bag is mentioned in the Veda and Manu (Wilson, Rig Veda, ii. 28; Institutes, ii. 79.) Hence Col. Temple (Ind. Ant., xi. 117) suggests that the word is Indian, and connects it with the Skt. vish, ‘to sprinkle.’] It is one of the fine titles which Indian servants rejoice to bestow on one another, like Mehtar, Khalifa, &c. The title in this case has some justification. No class of men (as all Anglo-Indians will agree) is so diligent, so faithful, so unobtrusive, and uncomplaining as that of the bihishtīs. And often in battle they have shown their courage and fidelity in supplying water to the wounded in face of much personal danger.

1773.—“Bheestee, Waterman” (etc.)—Fergusson, Dict. of the Hindostan Language, &c.

1781.—“I have the happiness to inform you of the fall of Bijah Gurh on the 9th inst. with the loss of only 1 sepoy, 1 beasty, and a cossy (? Cossid) killed . . .”—Letter in India Gazette of Nov. 24th.

BILAYUT, BILLAÏT.

name Manuk-dovata, 'the Bird of the Gods,' which our popular term renders with sufficient accuracy. [The Siamese word for 'bird,' according to Mr. Skeat, is nok, perhaps from manok.]

c. 1430.—“In majori Java avis præcipua reperitur sine pedibus, instar palumbi, pluma levi, cauda oblonga, semper in arboribus quiescens: caro non editur, pellis et cauda habentur pretiosiores, quibus pro ornamento capitis utuntur.”—N. Conti, in Poggius de Varietate Fortunae, lib. iv.

1552.—“The Kings of the said (Moluccas) began only a few years ago to believe in the immortality of souls, taught by no other argument than this, that they had seen a most beautiful little bird, which never alighted on the ground or on any other terrestrial object, but which they had sometimes seen to come from the sky, that is to say, when it was dead and fell to the ground. And the Machometan traders who traffic in those islands assured them that this little bird was a native of Paradise, and that Paradise was the place where the souls of the dead are; and on this account the princes attached themselves to the sect of the Machometans, because it promised them many marvellous things regarding this place of souls. This little bird they called by the name of Manucodiata. . . .”—Letter of Marimilian of Transylvania, Sec. to the Emp. Charles V., in Ramusio, i. f. 351v; see also f. 352.

c. 1524.—“He also (the K. of Bachian) gave us for the King of Spain two most beautiful dead birds. These birds are as large as thrushes; they have small heads, long beaks, legs slender like a writing pen, and a span in length; they have no wings, but instead of them long feathers of different colours, like plumes; their tail is like that of the thrush. All the feathers, except those of the wings (?), are of a dark colour; they never fly except when the wind blows. They told us that these birds come from the terrestrial Paradise, and they call them ‘bolon dinata,’ [burung-dewata, same as Javanese Manuk-dewata, supra] that is, divine birds.” —Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 143.

1598.—“ . . . in these Ilands (Moluccas) onlie is found the bird, which the Portingales call Passaros de Sol, that is Foule of the Sunne, the Italians call it Manu codiatis, and the Latinists Paradiseas, by us called Paradisee birdes, for ye beauty of their feathers which passe al other birds: these birds are never seene alive, but being dead they are found vpon the Iland; they flie, as it is said, alwaies into the Sunne, and keepe themselues continually in the ayre . . . for they haue neither feet nor wings, but onely head and bodie, and the most part tayle. . . .”—Linschoten, 35; [Hak. Soc. i. 118].

1591.—“As for the story of the Manucodiata or Bird of Paradise, which in the former Age was generally received and accepted for true, even by the Learned, it is now discovered to be a fable, and rejected and exploded by all men” (i.e. that it has no feet).—Ray, Wisdom of God Manifested in the Works of the Creation, ed. 1692, Pt. ii. 147.

1705.—“The Birds of Paradise are about the bigness of a Pidgeon. They are of varying Colours, and are never found or seen alive ; neither is it known from whence they come”—Funnel, in Dampier's Voyages, iii. 266-7.

1868.—“When seen in this attitude, the Bird of Paradise really deserves its name, and must be ranked as one of the most beautiful and wonderful of living things.”—Wallace, Malay Archip., 7th ed., 464.

BIRDS' NESTS. The famous edible nests, formed with mucus, by certain swiftlets, Collocalia nidifica, and C. linchi. Both have long been known on the eastern coasts of the B. of Bengal in the Malay Islands [and, according to Mr. Skeat in the islands of the Indian Sea (Tale Sap) at Singora]. The former is also now known to visit Darjeeling, the Assam Hills, the Western Ghats, &c., and to breed on the islets off Malabar and the Concan.

BISCOBRA, s. H. biskhopra or biskhapra. The name popularly applied to a large lizard alleged, and commonly believed, to be mortally venomous. It is very doubtful whether there is any real lizard to which this name applies and it may be taken as certain that there is none in India with the qualities attributed. It is probable that the name does carry to many the terrific character which the ingenious author of Tribes on My Frontier alleges. But the name has nothing to do bis in the sense of 'twice,' or cobra in that of 'snake.' The first element is no doubt bish, (q.v.) 'poison,' and the second is probably khoprd, 'a shell or skull.' [See J. L. Kipling, Beast and Man in India (p. 317), who gives the scientific name as varanus dracaena and says that the name bicobra is sometimes applied to the lizard generally known as the ghorpad, for which see GUANA.]

1883.—"But of all the things on earth that bite or sting, the palm belongs to the bicobra, a creature whose very name seems to indicate that it is twice as bad as the cobra. Though known by the terror of its name to natives and Europeans alike, it has never been described in the Proceedings of any learned Society, nor has it yet received a scientific name. . . . The awful deadliness of its bite admits of no question, being supported by countless authentic instances. . . . The points on which evidence is required are—first, whether there is any such animal; second, whether, if it does exist, it is a snake with legs, or a lizard without them."—Trails on my Frontier, p. 205.

BISH, BIKH, &c., n. H. from Skt. viska, 'poison.' The word has several specific applications, as (a) to the poison of various species of aconite, particularly Aconitum ferox, otherwise more specifically called in Skt. valsa-nābha, 'calf's navel,' corrupted into bachnābha or bachnāg, &c. But it is also applied (b) in the Himalaya to the effect of the rarefied atmosphere at great heights on the body, an effect which there and over Central Asia is attributed to poisonous emanations from the soil, or from plants; a doctrine somewhat naively accepted by Huc in his famous narrative. The Central Asiatic (Turki) expression for this is Esh, 'smell.'

Dorrville and Græber, in Kircher, China Illustrata*, 65. It is curious to see these intelligent Jesuits recognise the true cause, but accept the fancy of their guides as an additional one!

1812.—"Here begins the Esh—this is a Turkish word signifying Smell . . . it implies something the odour of which induces indisposition; far from hence the breathing of horse and man, and especially of the former, becomes affected."—Mir Isat Ullah, in J. R. As. Soc. i. 283.

1815.—"Many of the coolies, and several of the Mewattees and Ghoorkha sepoys and chuprassees now lagged, and every one complained of the bis or poisoned wind. I now suspected that the supposed poison was nothing more than the effect of the rarefaction of the atmosphere from our great elevation."—Fraser, Journal of a Tour, &c., 1820, p. 442.

1819.—"The difficulty of breathing which at an earlier date Andrade, and more recently Moorcroft had experienced in this region, was confirmed by Webb; the Butas themselves felt it, and call it bis ki hawa, i.e. poisonous air; even horses and yaks . . . suffer from it."—Webb's Narrative, quoted in Ritter, Asien, ii. 532, 649.

BISNAGAR, BISNAGA, BEEJANUGGER, n.p. These and other forms stand for the name of the ancient city which was the capital of the most important Hindu kingdom that existed in the peninsula of India, during the later Middle Ages, ruled by the Rāya dynasty. The place is now known as Humpty (Hampi), and is entirely in ruins. [The modern name is corrupted from Pumpa, that of the river near which it stood. (Rice, Mysore, ii. 487.)] It stands on the S. of the Tungabhadra R., 36 m. to the N.W. of Bellary. The name is a corruption of Vijayanagara (City of Victory), or Vidyanagara (City of learning), [the latter and earlier name being changed into the former (Rice, Ibid. i. 342, note).] Others believe that the latter name was applied only since the place, in the 13th century, became the seat of a great revival of Hinduism, under the famous Sayana Mādhava, who wrote commentaries on the Vedas, and much besides. Both the city and the kingdom were commonly called by the early Portuguese Narsinga (q.v.), from Narasimha (c. 1490-1508), who was king at the time of their first arrival. [Rice gives his dates as 1488-1508.]

1881.—“Once an unfortunate native superintendent or mistari [Maistry] was pounded to death by a savage and solitary bison.”—Saty. Review, Sept. 10, p. 335.

BLACAN-MATEE, n.p. This is the name of an island adjoining Singapore, which forms the beautiful ‘New Harbour’ of that port; Malay bēlūkang, or blakang-māti, lit. ‘Dead-Back island,’ [of which, writes Mr. Skeat, no satisfactory explanation has been given. According to Dennys (Discr. Dict., 51), “one explanation is that the Southern, or as regards Singapore, hinder, face was so unhealthy that the Malays gave it a designation signifying by onomatopoea that death was to be found behind its ridge”]. The island (Blacan-mati) appears in one of the charts of Godinho de Eredia (1613) published in his Malaca, &c. (Brussels, 1882), and though, from the excessive looseness of such old charts, the island seems too far from Singapore, we are satisfied after careful comparison with the modern charts that the island now so-called is intended.

BLACK, s. Adj. and substantive denoting natives of India. Old-fashioned, and heard, if still heard, only from the lower class of Europeans; even in the last generation its habitual use was chiefly confined to these, and to old officers of the Queen’s Army.

1676.—“We do not approve of your sending any persons to St. Helena against their wills. One of them you sent there makes a great complaint, and we have ordered his liberty to return again if he desires it; for we know not what effect it may have if complaints should be made to the King that we send away the natives; besides that it is against our inclination to buy any blacks, and to transport them from their wives and children without their own consent."—Court's Letter to Ft. St. Geo., in Notes and Exts. No. i. p. 12.

1747.—"Vencatachlam, the Commanding Officer of the Black Military, having behaved very commendably on several occasions against the French; In consideration thereof Agreed that a Present be made him of Six hundred Rupees to buy a Horse, that it may encourage him to act in like manner."—Ft. St. David Cons., Feb. 6. (MS. Record, in India Office).

1750.—"Having received information that some Blacks residing in this town were dealing with the French for goods proper for the Europe market, we told them if we found any proof against any residing under your Honors' protection, that such should suffer our utmost displeasure."—Ft. Wm. Cons., Feb. 4, in Long, 24.

1753.—"John Wood, a free merchant, applies for a pass which, if refused him, he says 'it will reduce a free merchant to the condition of a foreigner, or indeed of the meanest black fellow.'"—Ft. Wm. Cons., in Long, p. 41.

1761.—"You will also receive several private letters from Hastings and Sykes, which must convince me as Circumstances did me at the time, that the Dutch forces were not sent with a View only of defending their own Settlements, but absolutely with a Design of disputing our Influence and Possessions; certain Ruin must have been the Consequence to the East India Company. They were raising black Forces at Patna, Cossimbazar, Chinsura, &c., and were working Night and day to compleat a Field Artillery . . . all these preparations previous to the commencement of Hostilities plainly prove the Dutch meant to act offensively not defensively."—Holograph Letter from Clive (unpublished) in the India Office Records. Dated Berkeley Square, and indorsed "27th Decr. 1761."

1762.—"The Black inhabitants send in a petition setting forth the great hardship they labour under in being required to sit as arbitrators in the Court of Cutcherry."—Ft. Wm. Cons., in Long, 277.

1782.—See quotation under Sepoy, from Price.

" . . . the 35th Regiment, commanded by Major Popham, which had lately behaved in a mutinous manner . . . was broke with infamy. . . . The black officers with halters about their necks, and the sepoys stript of their coats and turbands were drummed out of the Cantonments."—India Gazette, March 30.

1787.—"As to yesterday's particular charge, the thing that has made me most inveterate and unrelenting in it is only that it related to cruelty or oppression inflicted on two black ladies. . . ."—Lord Minto, in Life, &c., i. 128.

1789.—"I have just learned from a Friend at the India House, y^t the object of Treves' ambition at present is to be appointed to the Adalet of Benares, wh^h is now held by a Black named Alii Caun. Understanding that most of the Adaulets are now held by Europeans, and as I am informed y^t it is the intention y^t the Europeans are to be so placed in future, I sh^d be vastly happy if without committing any injustice you c^d place young Treves in y^t situation."—George P. of Wales, to Lord Cornwallis, in C.'s Corresp. ii. 29.

1832-3.—"And be it further enacted that . . . in all captures which shall be made by H. M.'s Army, Royal Artillery, provincial, black, or other troops. . . ."—Act 2 & 3 Will. IV., ch. 53, sec. 2.

The phrase is in use among natives, we know not whether originating with them, or adopted from the usage of the foreigner. But Kālā ādmī 'black man,' is often used by them in speaking to Europeans of other natives. A case in point is perhaps worth recording. A statue of Lord William Bentinck, on foot, and in bronze, stands in front of the Calcutta Town Hall. Many years ago a native officer, returning from duty at Calcutta to Barrackpore, where his regiment was, reported himself to his adjutant (from whom we had the story in later days). 'Anything new, Sūbadār, Sāhib?' said the Adjutant. 'Yes,' said the Sūbadār, 'there is a figure of the former Lord Sahib arrived.' 'And what do you think of it?' 'Sāhib,' said the Sūbadār, 'abhi hai kālā ādmī kū sū, jab potā ho jaegā jab achchhā hogā!' ('It is now just like a native—a black man'); when the whitewash is applied it will be excellent.'

In some few phrases the term has become crystallised and semi-official. Thus the native dressers in a hospital were, and possibly still are, called Black Doctors.

1787.—"The Surgeon's assistant and Black Doctor take their station 100 paces in the rear, or in any place of security to which the Doolies may readily carry the wounded."—Regulations for the H. C.'s Troops on the Coast of Coromandel.

In the following the meaning is special:

1788.—"For Sale. That small upper-roomed Garden House, with about 5 big-gahs (see BEEGAH) of ground, on the road leading from Cheringhee to the Burying Ground, which formerly belonged to the Moravians; it is very private, from the number of trees on the ground, and having lately received considerable additions and repairs, is well adapted for a Black Family. Apply to Mr. Camac."—In Seton-Kerr, i. 282.

BLACK ACT. This was the name given in odium by the non-official Europeans in India to Act XI., 1836, of the Indian Legislature, which laid down that no person should by reason of his place of birth or of his descent be, in any civil proceeding, excepted from the jurisdiction of the Courts named, viz.: Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, Zillah and City Judge's Courts, Principal Sudder Ameens, Sudder Ameens, and Moonsiff's Court, or, in other words, it placed European subjects on a level with natives as to their subjection in civil causes to all the Company's Courts, including those under Native Judges. This Act was drafted by T. B. Macaulay, then Legislative Member of the Governor-General's Council, and brought great abuse on his head. Recent agitation caused by the "Ilbert Bill," proposing to make Europeans subject to native magistrates in regard to police and criminal charges, has been, by advocates of the latter measure, put on all fours with the agitation of 1836. But there is much that discriminates the two cases.

1878.—"The motive of the scurrility with which Macaulay was assailed by a handful of sorry scribblers was his advocacy of the Act, familiarly known as the Black Act, which withdrew from British subjects resident in the provinces their so called privilege of bringing civil appeals before the Supreme Court at Calcutta."—Frederick's Life of Macaulay, 2nd ed., i. 398.

[BLACK BEER, s.] A beverage mentioned by early travellers in Japan. It was probably not a malt liquor. Dr. Aston suggests that it was kuro-ai, a dark-coloured sake used in the service of the Shinto gods.

BLACK-BUCK, s. The ordinary name of the male antelope (Antelope bezoartica, Jerdon) [A. cervicapra, Blanford], from the dark hue of its back, by no means however literally black.

1690.—"The Indians remark, 'tis September's Sun which caused the black line on the Antelope's Backs."—Ovington, 138.

BLACK COTTON SOIL.—(See REGUR.)

[BLACK JEWS, a term applied to the Jews of S. India; see 2 ser. N. & Q., iv. 4. 429; viii. 232, 418, 621; Logan, Malabar, i. 246 seqq.]

BLACK LANGUAGE. An old-fashioned expression, for Hindustani and other vernaculars, which used to be common among officers and men of the Royal Army, but was almost confined to them.

BLACK PARTRIDGE, s. The popular Indian name of the common francolin of S.E. Europe and Western Asia (Francolinus vulgaris, Stephens), notable for its harsh quasi-articulate call, interpreted in various parts of the world into very different syllables. The rhythm of the call is fairly represented by two of the imitations which come nearest one another, viz. that given by Sultan Baber (Persian): 'Shir dāram, shukrak' ('I've got milk and sugar') and (Hind.) one given by Jerdon: 'Lahain piyās adrak' ('Garlic, onion, and ginger'). A more pious one is: 'Khudā teri kudrat, 'God is thy strength!' Another mentioned by Capt. Baldwin is very like the truth: 'Be quick, pay your debts!' But perhaps the Greek interpretation recorded by Athenæus (ix. 39) is best of all: τρίς τῶν κακοῦργων σάξ 'Three-fold ill to the ill-doers!' see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. xviii. and note 1; [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 234, iv. 17].

BLACK TOWN, n.p. Still the popular name of the native city of Madras, as distinguished from the Fort and southern suburbs occupied by the English residents, and the bazars which supply their wants. The term is also used at Bombay.

1673.—Fryer calls the native town of Madras "the Heathen Town," and "the Indian Town."

1727.—"The Black Town (of Madras) is inhabited by Gentiles, Mahometans, and Indian Christians. . . . It was walled in towards the Land, when Governor Pu ruled it."—A. Hamilton, i. 367.

1780.—"Adjoining the glacis of Fort St. George, to the northward, is a large town commonly called the Black Town, and which is but a surprise to legion, p. 6.

1780.—“. . . Cadets upon their arrival in the country, many of whom . . . are obliged to take up their residence in dirty punch-houses in the Black Town . . .”—Munro's Narrative, 22.

1782.—“When Mr. Hastings came to the government he added some new regulations . . . divided the black and white town (Calcutta) into 35 wards, and purchased the consent of the natives to go a little further off.”—Price, Some Observations, &c., p. 60. In Tracts, vol. i.

[1813.—“The large bazar, or the street in the Black Town, (Bombay) . . . contained many good Asiatic houses.”—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., i. 96. Also see quotation (1809) under BOMBAY.]

1827.—“Hartley hastened from the Black Town, more satisfied than before that some deceit was about to be practised towards Menie Gray.”—Walter Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xi.

BLACK WOOD. The popular name for what is in England termed ‘rose-wood’; produced chiefly by several species of Dalbergia, and from which the celebrated carved furniture of Bombay is made. [The same name is applied to the Chinese ebony used in carving (Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed., 107).] (See SISSOO.)

1879.—(In Babylonia). “In a mound to the south of the mass of city ruins called Jum-juma, Mr. Rassam discovered the remains of a rich hall or palace . . . the cornices were of painted brick, and the roof of rich Indian blackwood.”—Athenaeum, July 5, 22.

BLANKS, s. The word is used for ‘whites’ or ‘Europeans’ (Port. branco) in the following, but we know not if anywhere else in English :

1718.—“The Heathens . . . too shy to venture into the Churches of the Blanks (so they call the Christians), since these were generally adorned with fine cloaths and all manner of proud apparel.”—(Ziegenbalg and Plutschö), Propagation of the Gospel, &c. Pt. I., 3rd ed., p. 70.

[BLATTY, adj. A corr. of wilāyatī, ‘foreign’ (see BILAYUT). A name applied to two plants in S. India, the Sonneratia acida, and Hydrolea zeylanica (see Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. s. v.). In the old records it is applied to a kind of cloth. Owen (Narrative, i. 349) uses Blat as a name for the land-in Arabia, of which the origin is

BLIMBEE, s. Malayāl. vilimbi; H. belambū [or bilumbū;] Malay. bālimbing or belimbing. The fruit of Averrhoa bilimbi, L. The genus was so called by Linnæus in honour of Averrhoes, the Arab commentator on Aristotle and Avicenna. It embraces two species cultivated in India for their fruits; neither known in a wild state. See for the other CARAMBOLA.

BLOOD-SUCKER, s. A harmless lizard (Lacerta cristata) is so called, because when excited it changes in colour (especially about the neck) from a dirty yellow or grey, to a dark red.

1810.—“On the morn, however, I discovered it to be a large lizard, termed a blood-sucker.”—Morton's Life of Leyden, 110.

[1813.—“The large seroor, or lacerta, commonly called the bloodsucker.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 110 (2nd ed.).]

BOBACHEE, s. A cook (male). This is an Anglo-Indian vulgarisation of bāwarchī, a term originally brought according to Hammer, by the hordes of Chingiz Khan into Western Asia. At the Mongol Court the Bāwa was a high dignitary, ‘Lord Ser’ or the like (see Hammer's G. Horde, 235, 461). The late Prof Schiefner, however, stated to us he could not trace a Mongol for the word, which appears to be Turki. [Platts derives it from bāwar, ‘confidence.’]

c. 1333.—“Chaque émir a un bā lorsque la table a été dressée, s'assied devant son maître . . . coupe la viande en petits morceaux-là possèdent une grande dépecer la viande.”—Ibn Batu

c. 1590.—Bāwarchī is the cook in the original of the Āi Eng. Tr. i. 58).

1810.—“. . . the dripping to the meat by a bunch of fern to the end of a short stick. cleanly, and cheap dripping admirably; it being in babachy to baste any passion.”—Williamson, V.

BOGUE, n.p. This name is applied by seamen to the narrows at the mouth of the Canton River, and is a corruption of Boca. (See BOCCA TIGRIS.)

BOLIAH, BAULEAH, s. Beng. bāūlia. A kind of light accommodation boat with a cabin, in use on the Bengal rivers. We do not find the word in any of the dictionaries. Ives, in the middle of the 18th century, describes it as a boat very long, but so narrow that only one man could sit in the breadth, though it carried a multitude of rowers. This is not the character of the boat so called now. [Buchanan Hamilton, writing about 1820, says: "The bhauilya is intended for the same purpose, [conveyance of passengers], and is about the same size as the Pansi (see PAUNCHWAY). It is sharp at both ends, rises at the ends less than the Pansi, and its tilt is placed in the middle, the rowers standing both before and behind the place of accommodation of passengers. On the Kosi, the Bhauilya is a large fishing-boat, carrying six or seven men." (Eastern India, iii. 345.) Grant (Rural Life, p. 5) gives a drawing and description of the modern boat.]

1824.—"We found two Bholiahs, or large row-boats, with convenient cabins. . . ."—Heber, i. 26.

1834.—"Rivers's attention had been attracted by seeing a large beauliah in the act of swinging to the tide."—The Baboo, i. 14.

BOLTA, s. A turn of a rope; sea H. from Port. volta (Roebuck).

BOMBASA, n.p. The Island of Mombasa, off the E. African Coast, is so called in some old works. Bombasi is used in Persia for a negro slave; see quotation.

1516.—". . . another island, in which there is a city of the Moors called Bombaza, very large and beautiful."—Barbosa, 11. See also Colonial Papers under 1609, i. 188.

1883.—". . . the Bombassi, or coal-black negro of the interior, being of much less price, and usually only used as a cook."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.

BOMBAY, n.p. It has been alleged, often and positively (as in the quotations below from Fryer and Grose), that this name is an English corruption from the Portuguese Bombahia, 'good bay.' The grammar of the alleged etymon is bad, and the history is no better; for the name can be traced long before the Portuguese occupation, long before the arrival of the Portuguese in India. C. 1430, we find the islands of Mahim and Mumba-Devi, which united form the existing island of Bombay, held, along with Salsette, by a Hindu Rājā, who was tributary to the Mohammedan King of Guzerat. (See Rās Mālā, i. 350); [ed. 1878, p. 270]. The same form reappears (1516) in Barbosa Tana-Mayambu (p. 68), in the Estado da India under 1525, and (1563) Garcia de Orta, who writes both Mc baim and Bombaim. The latter author mentioning the excellence of the produce produced there, speaks of his having had a grant of the same from the King of Portugal (see below). It is customarily called baim on the earliest English coinage. (See under RUPY shrine of the goddess Mr from whom the name is supposed to have been taken, stood on planade till the middle of 17th century, when it was removed to its present site in the middle of 18th century. It is now the most frequented place of the native town.

BOMBAY BOX-WORK. This well-known manufacture, consisting in the decoration of boxes, desks, &c., with veneers of geometrical mosaic, somewhat after the fashion of Tunbridge ware, is said to have been introduced from Shiraz to Surat more than a century ago, and some 30 years later from Surat to Bombay. The veneers are formed by cementing together fine triangular prisms of ebony, ivory, green-stained ivory, stag's horn, and tin, so that the sections when sawn across form the required pattern, and such thin sections are then attached to the panels of the box with strong glue.

BOMBAY MARINE. This was the title borne for many years by the meritorious but somewhat depressed service which in 1830 acquired the style of the "Indian Navy," and on 30th April, 1863, ceased to exist. The detachments of this force which took part in the China War (1841-42) were known to their brethren of the Royal Navy, under the temptation of alliteration, as the "Bombay Buccaneers." In their earliest employment against the pirates of Western India and the Persian Gulf, they had been known as "the Grab Service." But, no matter for these names, the history of this Navy is full of brilliant actions and services. We will quote two noble examples of public virtue:

(1) In July 1811, a squadron under Commodore John Hayes took two large junks issuing from Batavia, then under blockade. These were lawful prize, laden with Dutch property, valued at £800,000. But Hayes knew that such a capture would create great difficulties and embarrassments in the English trade at Canton, and he directed the release of this splendid prize.

(2) 30th June 1815, Lieut. Boyce in the brig 'Nautilus' (180 tons, carrying ten 18-pr. carronades, and four 9-pr.) encountered the U. S. sloop-of-war 'Peacock' (539 tons, carrying twenty 32-pr. carronades, and two long 18-pr.). After he had informed the American of the ratification of peace, Boyce was peremptorily ordered to haul down his colours, which he answered by a flat refusal. The 'Peacock' opened fire, and a short but brisk action followed, in which Boyce and his first lieutenant were shot down. The gallant Boyce had a special pension from the Company (£435 in all) and lived to his 93rd year to enjoy it.

We take the facts from the History of this Navy by one of its officers, Lieut. C. R. Low (i. 294), but he erroneously states the pension to have been granted by the U. S. Govt.

1780.—"The Hon. Company's schooner, Carinjar, with Lieut. Merry Commander, of the Bombay Marine, is going to Archin (sic, see ACHEEN) to meet the Ceres and the other Europe ships from Madras, to put on board of them the St. Helena stores."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 8th.

BONITO, s. A fish (Thynnus pelamys, Day) of the same family (Scombridae) as mackerel and tunny, very common in the Indian seas. The name is Port., and apparently is the ad bonito, 'fine.'

2) BORA, s. H. and Guz. bohṛā bohord, which H. H. Wilson re-to the Skt. vyavahāri, 'a trader, man of affairs,' from which are ued the ordinary H. words byohard, ariyā (and a Guzerati form which es very near bohord). This is conied by the quotation from Nurullah w, but it is not quite certain. Dr.
n Wilson (see below) gives an bic derivation which we have been ble to verify. [There can be no nable doubt that this is incorrect.]
here are two classes of Bohrās be-ging to different Mohammedan s, and different in habit of life.

The Shi'a Bohrās, who are es-ially townspeople, and especially regate in Surat, Burhanpur, Ujjain,

They are those best known far wide by the name, and are usually ted to trading and money-lending.

Their original seat was in Guzerat, and they are most numerous there, and in the Bombay territory generally, but are also to be found in various parts of Central India and the N.-W. Provinces, [where they are all Hindus]. The word in Bombay is often used as synonymous with pedlar or boxwallah. They are generally well-to-do people, keeping very cleanly and comfortable houses. [See an account of them in Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 470 seqq. 2nd ed.] These Bohras appear to form one of the numerous Shī'a sects, akin in character to, and apparently of the same origin as, the Ismāīliyah (or Assassins of the Middle Ages), and claim as their original head and doctor in India one Ya'kūb, who emigrated from Egypt, and landed in Cambay A.D. 1137. But the chief seat of the doctrine is alleged to have been in Yemen, till that country was conquered by the Turks in 1538. A large exodus of the sect to India then took place. Like the Ismāīlis they attach a divine character to their Mullah or chief Pontiff, who now resides at Surat. They are guided by him in all things, and they pay him a percentage on their profits. But there are several sectarian subdivisions: Dāūdi Bohrās, Sulaimāni Bohrās, &c. [See Forbes, Rās Mālā, ed. 1878, p. 264 seqq.]

2. The Sunni Bohrās. These are very numerous in the Northern Concan and Guzerat. They are essentially peasants, sturdy, thrifty, and excellent cultivators, retaining much of Hindu habit; and are, though they have dropped caste distinctions, very exclusive and "denominational" (as the Bombay Gazetteer expresses it). Exceptionally, at Pattan, in Baroda State, there is a rich and thriving community of trading Bohrās of the Sunni section; they have no intercourse with their Shī'a namesakes.

The history of the Bohrās is still very obscure; nor does it seem ascertained whether the two sections were originally one. Some things indicate that the Shī'a Bohrās may be, in accordance with their tradition, in some considerable part of foreign descent, and that the Sunni Bohrās, who are unquestionably of Hindu descent, may have been native converts of the foreign immigrants, afterwards forcibly brought over to Sunnism by the Guzerat Sultans. But all this must be said with much reserve. The history is worthy of investigation.

The quotation from Ibn Batuta, which refers to Gandari on the Baroda river, south of Cambay, alludes most probably to the Bohrās, and may perhaps, though not necessarily, indicate an origin for the name different from either of those suggested.

c. 1343.—"When we arrived at Kandahār . . . we received a visit from the principal Musulmans dwelling at his (the pagan King's) Capital, such as the Children of Khojah Bohrah, among whom was the Nākhoda Ibrahim, who had 6 vessels belonging to him."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 58.

c. 1620.—Nurullah of Shuster, quoted by Colebrooke, speaks of this class as having been converted to Islam 300 years before. He says also: "Most of them subsist by commerce and mechanical trades; as is indicated by the name Bohrah, which signifies 'merchant' in the dialect of Gujerat."—In As. Res., vii. 338.

1673.—". . . The rest (of the Mohammedans) are adopted under the name of the Province or Kingdom they are born in, as Mogul . . . or Schisms they have made, as Bilhim, Jemottee, and the lowest of all is Borrah."—Fryer, 93.

c. 1780.—"Among the rest was the whole of the property of a certain Muhammad Mokrim, a man of the Bohra tribe, the Chief of all the merchants, and the owner of three or four merchant ships."—H. of Hydur Naik, 383.

1810.—"The Borahs are an inferior set of travelling merchants. The inside of a Borah's box is like that of an English country shop, spelling-books, prayer-books, lavender water, eau de luce, soap, tapes, scissors, knives, needles, and thread make but a small part of the variety."—Maria Graham, 33.

1825.—"The Boras (at Broach) in general are unpopular, and held in the same estimation for parsimony that the Jews are in England."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 119; also see 72.

1853.—"I had the pleasure of baptizing Ismail Ibraim, the first Bohorā who, as far as we know, has yet embraced Christianity in India. . . . He appears thoroughly divorced from Muhammad, and from 't' the son-in-law of Muhammad, whom t Bohorās or Initiated, according to the meaning of the Arabic word, from which the name is derived, esteem as an improvement on his father-in-law, having a higher degree of inspiration, which has in good measure as they imagine, manifested itself among successors, recognised by the Bohoras by the Ansariyah, Ismaeliyah, Drus, Metawileh of Syria. . . ."—Letter of Dr. Wilson, in Life, p. 456.

BO TREE, s. The name given in Ceylon to the Pipal tree (see PEEPUL) as revered by the Buddhists; Singh. bo-gās. See in Emerson Tennent (Ceylon, ii. 632 seqq.), a chronological series of notices of the Bo-tree from B.C. 288 to A.D. 1739.

1675.—“Of their (the Veddas') worship there is little to tell, except that like the Cingaleze, they set round the high trees Bogas, which our people call Pagod-trees, with a stone base and put lamps upon it.”—Ryklof Van Goens, in Valentijn (Ceylon), 209.

1681.—“I shall mention but one Tree more as famous and highly set by as any of the rest, if not more so, tho' it bear no fruit, the benefit consisting chiefly in the Holiness of it. This tree they call Bogahah; we the God-tree.”—Knor, 18.

BOTTLE-TREE, s. Qu. Adansonia digitata, or 'baobab'? Its aspect is somewhat suggestive of the name, but we have not been able to ascertain. [It has also been suggested that it refers to the Babool, on which the Baya, often builds its nest. “These are formed in a very ingenious manner, by long grass woven together in the shape of a bottle.” (Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., i. 33.)

1880.—“Look at this prisoner slumbering peacefully under the suggestive bottle-tree.”—Ali Baba, 153.

1792.—“A Bound Hedge, formed of a wide belt of thorny plants (at Seringapatam).”—Wilks, Historical Sketches, iii. 217.]

BOUTIQUE, s. A common word in Ceylon and the Madras Presidency (to which it is now peculiar) for a small native shop or booth: Port. butica or boteca. From Bluteau (Suppt.) it would seem that the use of butica was peculiar to Portuguese India.

[1548.—Buticas. See quotation under SIND.]

BOWLA, s. A portmanteau. H. bāolā, from Port. baul, and bahu, ‘a trunk.’

BOWLY, BOWRY, s. H. bāolī and bāorī, Mahr. bāvadi. C. P. Brown (Zillah Dict. s.v.) says it is the Telegu bāvidi; bāvi and bāvidi, = ‘well.’ This is doubtless the same word, but all its forms it is probably connect with Skt. vavra, ‘a hole, a well,’ with vāpi, ‘an oblong reservoir, a pond or lake.’ There is also in Singhal vava, ‘a lake or pond,’ and in inscriptions variya. There is again Maldi wau, 'a well,' which comes near the Guzerati forms mentioned below. A great and deep rectangular well (or tank dug down to the springs), furnished with a descent to the water by means of long flights of steps, and generally with landings and loggie where travellers may rest in the shade. This kind of structure, almost peculiar to Western and Central India, though occasionally met with in Northern India also, is a favourite object of private native munificence, and though chiefly beneath the level of the ground, is often made the subject of most effective architecture. Some of the finest specimens are in Guzerat, where other forms of the word appear to be wādo and wāin. One of the most splendid of these structures is that at Asārwa in the suburbs of Ahmedabad, known as the Well of Dhāi (or 'the Nurse') Harīr, built in 1485 by a lady of the household of Sultan Mohammed Bigara (that famous 'Prince of Cambay' celebrated by Butler—see under CAMBAY), at a cost of 3 lakhs of rupees. There is an elaborate model of a great Guzerati bāolī in the Indian Museum at S. Kensington.

We have seen in the suburbs of Palermo a regular bāolī, excavated in the tufaceous rock that covers the plain. It was said to have been made at the expense of an ancestor of the present proprietor (Count Ranchibile) to employ people in a time of scarcity.

c. 1343.—"There was also a bāin, a name by which the Indians designate a very spacious kind of well, revetted with stone, and provided with steps for descent to the water's brink. Some of these wells have in the middle and on each side pavilions of stone, with seats and benches. The Kings and chief men of the country rival each other in the construction of such reservoirs on roads that are not supplied with water."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 13.

1526.—"There was an empty space within the fort (of Agra) between Ibrahim's palace and the ramparts. I directed a large wāin to be constructed on it, ten gez by ten. In the language of Hindostān they denominate a large well having a staircase down it wāin."—Baber, Mem., 342.

1775.—"Near a village called Sevasee Contra I left the line of march to sketch a remarkable building . . . on a near approach I discerned it to be a well of very superior workmanship, of that kind which the natives call Bhouree or Bhoulie."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 102; [2nd ed. i. 387].

1808.—"Who-so digs a well deserves the love of creatures and the grace of God,' but a Vavidee is said to value 10 Kooas (or wells) because the water is available to bipeds without the aid of a rope."—R. Drummond, Illustrations of Guzerattee, &c.

1825.—"These boolees are singular contrivances, and some of them extremely handsome and striking. . . ."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 37.

1856.—"The wāv (Sansk. vāpekā) is a large edifice of a picturesque and stately as well as peculiar character. Above the level of the ground a row of four or five open pavilions at regular distances from each other . . . is alone visible. . . . The entrance to the wāv is by one of the end pavilions."—Forbes, Ras Malā, i. 257; [reprint 1878, p. 197].

1876.—"To persons not familiar with the East such an architectural object as a bowlee may seem a strange perversion of ingenuity, but the grateful coolness of all subterranean apartments, especially when accompanied by water, and the quiet gloom of these recesses, fully compensate in the eyes of the Hindu for the more attractive magnificence of the ghāts. Consequently the descending flights of which we are now speaking, have often been more elaborate and expensive pieces of architecture than any of the buildings above-ground found in their vicinity."—Fergusson, Indian and Eastern Architecture, 486.

BOXWALLAH, s. Hybrid H. Bakas-(i.e. box) wāld. A native itinerant pedlar, or packman, as he would be called in Scotland by an analogous term. The Boxwāld sells cutlery, cheap nick-nacks, and small wares of all kinds, chiefly European. In former days he was a welcome visitor to small stations and solitary bungalows. The Borā of Bombay is often a boxwāld, and the boxwālā in that region is commonly called Borā. (See BORĀ.)

a. A servant. In Southern India and in China a native personal servant is so termed, and is habitually summoned with the vocative 'Boy!' The same was formerly common in Jamaica and other W. I. Islands. Similar uses are familiar of puer (e.g. in the Vulgate Dixit Giezi puer Viri Dei. II Kings v. 20), Ar. walad, παῖς, garçon, knave (Germ. Knabe); and this same word is used for a camp-servant in Shakespeare, where Fluelen says: "Kill the Poys and the luggage! 'tis expressly against the laws of arms."—See also Grose's Mil. Antiquities, i. 182, and Latin quotation from Xavier v. . . . The and, however, came to be especially used for 'Slave-boy,' and applied to slaves of any age. The Portuguese used moço in the same way. In 'Pigeon English' also 'servant' is boy, whilst 'boy' in our ordinary sense is discriminated as 'smallo-boy!'

b. A Palankin-bearer. From the name of the caste, Telug. and Malayāl. bōyi, Tam. bōvi, &c. Wilson gives bhoi as H. and Mahr. also. The word is in use northward at least to the Nerbudda R. In the Konkan, people of this class are called Kahār bhūi (see Ind. Ant. ii. 154, iii. 77). P. Paolino is therefore in error, as he often is, when he says that the word boy as applied by the English and other Europeans to the coolies or facchini who carry the dooly, "has nothing to do with any Indian language." In the first and third quotations (under b), the use is more like a, but any connection with English at the dates seems impossible.

BRAB, s. The Palmyra Tree (see PALMYRA) or Borassus flubelliformis. The Portuguese called this Palmeira brava ('wild' palm), whence the English corruption. The term is unknown in Bengal, where the tree is called 'fan-palm,' 'palmyra,' or by the H. name tāl or tār.

1623.—"The book is made after the fashion of this country, i.e. not of paper which is seldom or never used, but of palm leaves, viz. of the leaves of that which the Portuguese call palum brama (sic), or wild palm."—P. della Valle, ii. 681; [Hak. Soc. ii. 291].

c. 1666.—"Tous les Malabares écrivent comme nous de gauche à droit sur les feuilles des Palmeras Bravas."—Thevenot, v. 268.

1673.—"Another Tree called Brabb, bodied like the Cocoe, but the leaves grow round like a Peacock's Tail set upright."—Fryer, 76.

1759.—"Brabb, so called at Bombay: Palmira on the coast; and Tāl at Bengal."—Ives, 458.

c. 1760.—"There are also here and there interspersed a few brab-trees, or rather wild palm-trees (the word brab being derived from Brabo, which in Portuguese signifies wild) . . . the chief profit from that is the toddy."—Grose, i. 48.

1809.—"The Palmyra . . . here called the brab, furnishes the best leaves for thatching, and the dead ones serve for fuel."—Maria Graham, 5.

BRAHMIN, BRAHMAN, BRA-MIN, s. In some parts of India called Bahman; Skt. Brāhmaṇa. This word now means a member of the priestly caste, but the original meaning and use were different. Haug. (Brahma und die Brahmanen, pp. 8-11) traces the word to the root brīh, 'to increase,' and shows how it has come to have its present signification. The older English form is Brachman, which comes to us through the Greek and Latin authors.

c. B.C. 330.—". . . τῶν ἐν Ταξίλοις σοφιστῶν ἰδεῖν δύο φησὶ, Βραχμᾶνας ἀμφοτέρους, τὸν μὲν πρεσβύτερον ἐξυρμημένον, τὸν δὲ νεώτερον κομήτην, αὐφοτέροις δ' ἀκολουθεῖν μαθητάς . . ."—Aristobulus, quoted in Strabo, xv. c. 61.

c. B.C. 300.—"Ἀλλῃ δὲ διαίρεσιν ποιῆται περὶ τῶν φιλοσόφων δύο γένη φάσκων, ὧν τοὺς μὲν Βραχμᾶνας καλεῖ, τοὺς δὲ Γαρμᾶνας [Σαρμᾶνας!]"—From Megasthenes, in Strabo, xv. c. 59.

c. A.D. 150.—"But the evil stars have not forced the Brahmins to do evil and abominable things; nor have the good stars persuaded the rest of the (Indians) to abstain from evil things."—Bardesanes, in Curdson's Spicilegium, 18.

c. A.D. 500.—"Βραχμᾶνες; Ἰνδικὸν ἔθνος σοφώτατον οὐδὲ καὶ βράχμας καλοῦσιν."—Stephanus Byzantinus.

1444.—Poggio taking down the reminiscences of Nicolo Conti writes Brammones.

1555.—"Among these is ther a people called Brachmanes, whiche (as Didimus their Kinge wrote unto Alexandre . . .) live a pure and simple life, led with no likerous lustes of other mennes vanities."—W. Watremun, Fardle of Faciouns.

"Brahmenes são os seus religiosos, Nome antigo, o de grande preeminencia: Observam os preceitos tão famosos D'hum, que primeiro poz nomo á sciencia."—Cumdes, vii. 40.

1578.—Acosta has Bragmen.

1582.—"Castañeda, tr. by N. L.," has Bramane.

1630.—"The Bramanes . . . Origen, cap. 13 & 15, affirmeth to bee descended from Abraham by Cheturah, who seated them. selves in India, and that so they were called Abrahmanes."—Lord, Desc. of the Banian Rel., 71.

"Comes he to upbraid us with his innocence?"

Seize him, and take this preaching Brachman hence."

Dryden, Aurungzebe, iii. 3.

1688.—"The public worship of the pagods was tolerated at Goa, and the sect of the Brachmans daily increased in power, because these Pagan priests had bribed the Portuguese officers."—Dryden, Life of Xavier.

1714.—"The Dervis at first made some scruple of violating his promise to the dying brachman."—The Spectator, No. 578.

BRAHMINY BULL, s. A bull devoted to Siva and let loose; generally found frequenting Hindu bazars, and fattened by the run of the Bunyas' shops. The term is sometimes used more generally (Brahminy bull, -ox, or -cow) to denote the humped Indian ox as a species.

1872.—"He could stop a huge Bramini bull, when running in fury, by catching hold of its horns."—Gorinda Samanta, i. 85.

BRAHMINY BUTTER, s. This seems to have been an old name for Ghee (q.v.). In MS. "Acct. Charges, Dieting, &c., at Fort St. David for Nov.—Jany., 1746-47," in India Office, we find:

Brahminy do.	"	1	34	0."

BRAHMINY DUCK, s. The common Anglo-Indian name of the handsome bird Casarca rutila (Pallas), or 'Ruddy Sheldrake'; constantly seen on the sandy shores of the Gangetic rivers in single pairs, the pair almost always at some distance apart. The Hindi name is chakwa, and the chakwā-chakwā (male and female of the species) afford a commonplace comparison in Hindi literature for faithful lovers and spouses. "The Hindus have a legend that two lovers for their indiscretion were transformed into Brahminy Ducks, that they are condemned to pass the night apart from each other, on opposite banks of the river, and that all night long each, in its turn, asks its mate if it shall come across, but the question is always met by a negative—"Chakwa, shall I come?" "No, Chakwi." "Chakwi, shall I come?" "No, Chakwa."—(Jerdon.) The same author says the bird is occasionally killed in England.

BRAHMINY KITE, s. The Milvus Pondicerianus of Jerdon, Haliastur Indus, Boddaert. The name is given because the bird is regarded with some reverence by the Hindus as sacred to Vishnu. It is found throughout India.

c. 1328.—"There is also in this India a certain bird, big, like a Kite, having a white head and belly, but all red above, which boldly snatches fish out of the hands of fishermen and other people, and indeed [these birds] go on just like dogs."—Friar Jordanus, 36.

1673.—" . . . 'tis Sacrilege with them to kill a Cow or Calf; but highly piacular to shoot a Kite, dedicated to the Brachmins, for which Money will hardly pacify."—Fryer, 33.

[1813.—"We had a still bolder and more ravenous enemy in the hawks and brahminee kites."—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., ii. 162.]

BRAHMO-SOMAJ, s. The Bengali pronunciation of Skt. Brahma Samāja, 'assembly of Brahmists'; Brahma being the Supreme Being according to the Indian philosophic systems. The reform of Hinduism so called was begun by Ram Mohun Roy (Rāma Mohana Rāi) in 1830. Professor A. Weber has shown that it does not constitute an independent Indian movement, but is derived from European Theism. [Also see Monier-Williams, Brahmanism, 486.]

1876.—"The Brahmo Somaj, or Theistic Church of India, is an experiment hitherto unique in religious history."—Collet, Brahmo Year-book, 5.

BRANDUL, s. 'Backstay,' in Sea H. Port. brandal (Roebuck).

BRANDY COORTEE, -COATEE, s. Or sometimes simply Brandy. A corruption of bārānī, 'a cloak,' literally pluviale, from P. bārān, 'rain.' Bārānī-kurtī seems to be a kind of hybrid shaped by the English word coat though kurtā and kurtī are true words for various forms of jacket tunic.

[1754.—"Their women also being not than 6000, were dressed with great (these are called baranni) of crimson c after the manner of the men, and not t distinguished at a distance; so that the whole made a very formidable appearance."—H. of Nadir Shah, in Hanway, 367.]

1788.—"Barrannee—a cloak to cover one from the rain."—Ind. Vocab. (Stockdale).

[The word Bārāni is now commonly used to describe those crops which are dependent on the annual rains, not on artificial irrigation.

BRANDYPAWNEE, s. Brandy and water; a specimen of genuine Urdū, i.e. Camp jargon, which hardly needs interpretation. H. panī, 'water.' Williamson (1810) has brandy-shraub-pauny (V. M. ii. 123).

[1854.—"I'm sorry to see you gentlemen drinking brandy-pawnee," says he; "it plays the deuce with our young men in India."—Thackeray, Newcomes, ch. i.]

1866.—"The brandy pawnee of the East, and the 'sangaree' of the West Indies, are happily now almost things of the past, or exist in a very modified form."—Waring, Tropical Resident, 177.

BRASS, s. A brace. Sea dialect. —(Roebuck.)

[BRASS-KNOCKER, s. A term applied to a réchauffé or serving up again of yesterday's dinner or supper. It is said to be found in a novel by Winwood Reade called Liberty Hall, as a piece of Anglo-Indian slang; and it is supposed to be a corruption of bāsī khāna, H. 'stale food'; see 5 ser. N. & Q., 34, 77.]

BRATTY, s. A word, used only in the South, for cakes of dry cow-dung, used as fuel more or less all over India. It is Tam. varatti, [or viratti], 'dried dung.' Various terms are current elsewhere, but in Upper India the most common is uplā.—(Vide OOPLA).

BRAVA, n.p. A sea-port on the east coast of Africa, lat. 1° 7' N., long. 44° 3', properly Barāwa.

1516.—". . . a town of the Moors, well walled, and built of good stone and white-wash, which is called Brava. . . . It is a place of trade, which has already been destroyed by the Portuguese, with great slaughter of the inhabitants. . . ."—Barbosa, 15.

BRAZIL-WOOD, s. This name is now applied in trade to the dye-wood imported from Pernambuco, which is derived from certain species of Caesalpinia indigenous there. But it originally applied to a dye-wood of the same genus which was imported from India, and which is now known in trade as Sappan (q.v.). [It is the andam or bakkam of the Arabs (Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 49).] The history of the word is very curious. For when the name was applied to the newly discovered region in S. America, probably, as Barros alleges, because it produced a dye-wood similar in character to the brazil of the East, the trade-name gradually became appropriated to the S. American product, and was taken away from that of the E. Indies. See some further remarks in Marco Polo, 2nd ed., ii. 368-370 [and Encycl. Bibl. i. 120].

This is alluded to also by Camões (x. 140):

"But here where Earth spreads wider, ye shall claim realms by the ruddy Dye-wood made renown'd;
these of the 'Sacred Cross' shall win the name:
by your first Navy shall that world be found."
Burton.

The medieval forms of brazil were many; in Italian it is generally verzi, verzino, or the like.

1330.—"And here they burn the brazil-wood (verzino) for fuel . . ."—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., p. 77.

1552.—". . . when it came to the 3d of May, and Pedralvares was about to set sail, in order to give a name to the land thus newly discovered, he ordered a very great Cross to be hoisted at the top of a tree, after mass had been said at the foot of the tree, and it had been set up with the solemn benediction of the priests, and then he gave the country the name of Sancta Cruz. . . . But as it was through the symbol of the Cross that the Devil lost his dominion over us . . . as soon as the red wood called Brazil began to arrive from that country, he wrought that that name should abide in the mouth of the people, and that the name of Holy Cross should be lost, as if the name of a wood for colouring cloth were of more moment than that wood which imbues all the sacraments with the tincture of salvation, which is the Blood of Jesus Christ."—Barros, l. v. 2.

1554.—"The baar (Bahar) of Brazil contains 20 faraçolas (see FRAZALA), weighing it in a coir rope, and there is no picotaa (see PICOTA)"—A. Nunes, 18.

1641.—"We went to see the Rasp-house where the lusty knaves are compelled to labour, and the rasping of Brasill and Log-wood is very hard labour."—Kerlyn's Over-land August [19].

BREECH-CANDY, n.p. A locality on the shore of Bombay Island to the north of Malabar Hill. The true name, as Dr. Murray Mitchell tells me, is believed to be Burj-khaddī, 'the Tower of the Creek.'

BRIDGEMAN, s. Anglo-Sepoy H. brijmān, denoting a military prisoner, of which word it is a quaint corruption.

BRINJARRY, s. Also BINJAR-REE, BUNJARREE, and so on. But the first form has become classical from its constant occurrence in the Indian Despatches of Sir A. Wellesley. The word is properly H. banjārā, and Wilson derives it from Skt. banij, 'trade,' kāra, 'doer.' It is possible that the form brinjārā may have been suggested by a supposed connection with the Pers. birinj, 'rice.' (It is alleged in the Dict. of Words used in the E. Indies, 2nd ed., 1805, to be derived from brinj, 'rice,' and ara, 'bring'!) The Brinjarries of the Deccan are dealers in grain and salt, who move about, in numerous parties with cattle, carrying their goods to different markets, and who in the days of the Deccan wars were the great resource of the commissariat, as they followed the armies with supplies for sale. They talk a kind of Mahratta or Hindipatois. Most classes of Banjārās in the west appear to have a tradition of having first come to the Deccan with Moghul camps as commissariat carriers. In a pamphlet called Some Account of the Bunjarrah Class, by N. R. Cumberlande, District Sup. of Police, Basein, Berar (Bombay, 1882; [North Indian N. & Q. iv. 163 seqq.]), the author attempts to distinguish between brinjarees as 'grain-carriers,' and bunjarrahs, from bunjār, 'waste land' (meaning banjar or bānjar). But this seems fanciful. In the N.-W. Provinces the name is also in use, and is applied to a numerous tribe spread along the skirt of the Himālaya from Hardwār to Gorakhpur, some of whom are settled, whilst the rest move about with their cattle, sometimes transporting goods for hire, and sometimes carrying grain, salt, lime, forest produce, or other merchandise for sale. [See Crooke, Tribes and Castes, i. 149 seqq.] Vanjārās, as they are called about Bombay, used to come down from Rajputāna and Central India, with large droves of cattle, laden with grain, &c., taking back with them salt for the most part. These were not mere carriers, but the actual dealers, paying ready money, and they were orderly in conduct.

c. 1505.—"As scarcity was felt in his camp (Sultan Sikandar Lodi's) in consequence of the non-arrival of the Banjāras, he despatched 'Azam Humāyun for the purpose of bringing in supplies.'—Nāmā Ullah, in Elliot, v. 100 (written c. 1612).

1516.—"The Moors and Gentiles of the cities and towns throughout the country come to set up their shops and cloths at Cheul . . . they bring these in great caravans of domestic oxen, with packs, like donkeys, and on the top of these long white sacks placed crosswise, in which they bring their goods; and one man drives 30 or 40 beasts before him."—Barbosa, 71.

1563.—". . . This King of Dely took the Balagat from certain very powerful gentoos, whose tribe are those whom we now call Venezaras, and from others dwelling in the country, who are called Colles; and all these, Colles, and Venezaras, and Reishutos, live by theft and robbery to this day."—Garcia De O., f. 34.

c. 1632.—"The very first step which Mohabut Khan [Khān Khānān] took in the Deccan, was to present the Bunjaras of Hindostan with elephants, horses, and cloths; and he collected (by these conciliatory measures) so many of them that he had one chief Bunjara at Agrah, another in Goojrat, and another above the Ghats, and established the advanced price of 10 seers per rupee (in his camp) to enable him to buy it cheaper."—MS. Life of Mohabut Khan (Khan Khanan), in Briggs's paper quoted below, 183.

1638.—"Il y a dans le Royaume de Cun-cam vn certain peuple qu'ils appellent Venezars, qui achettent le bled et le ris . . . pour le reuendre dans l'Indosthan . . . ou ils vont avec des Caffilas ou Caravances de cinq ou six, et quelque fois de neuf ou dix mille bestes de somme. . . ."—Mandelslo, 245.

1793.—"Whilst the army halted on the 23rd, accounts were received from Captain Read . . . that his convoy of brinjarries had been attacked by a body of horse."—Dirom, 2.

1800.—"The Binjarries I look upon in the light of servants of the public, of whose grain I have a right to regulate the sale . . . always taking care that they have a proportionate advantage."—A. Wellesley, in Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 264.

„ "The Brinjarries drop in by degrees."—Wellington, i. 175.

1810.—"Immediately facing us a troop of Brinjarees had taken up their residence for the night. These people travel from one end of India to the other, carrying salt, grain, assafœtida, almost as necessary to an army as salt."—Maria Graham, 61.

1813.—“We met there a number of Vanjarrahs, or merchants, with large droves of oxen, laden with valuable articles from the interior country, to commute for salt on the sea-coast.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 206; [2nd ed. i. 118; also see ii. 276 seqq.].

“As the Deccan is devoid of a single navigable river, and has no roads that admit of wheel-carriages, the whole of this extensive intercourse is carried on by laden bullocks, the property of that class of people known as Bunjaras.”—Acc. of Origin, Hist., and Manners of . . . Bunjaras, by Capt. John Briggs, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 61.

1825.—“We passed a number of Brinjarrees who were carrying salt. . . . They . . . had all bows . . . arrows, sword and shield. . . . Even the children had, many of them, bows and arrows suited to their strength, and I saw one young woman equipped in the same manner.”—Heber, ii. 94.

1877.—“They were brinjarries, or carriers of grain, and were quietly encamped at a village about 24 miles off; trading most unsuspiciously in grain and salt.”—Meadows Taylor, Life, ii. 17.

BRINJAUL, s. The name of a vegetable called in the W. Indies the Egg-plant, and more commonly known to the English in Bengal under that of bangun (prop. baingan). It is the Solanum Melongena, L., very commonly cultivated on the shores of the Mediterranean as well as in India and the East generally. Though not known in a wild state under this form, there is no reasonable doubt that S. Melongena is a derivative of the common Indian S. insanum, L. The word in the form brinjaul is from the Portuguese, as we shall see. But probably there is no word of the kind which has undergone such extraordinary variety of modifications, whilst retaining the same meaning, as this. The Skt. is bhantakī, H. bhāntā, baigan, baingan, P. badīngān, badīlgān, Ar. badinjān, Span. alberengena, berengena, Port. beringela, bringiela, bringella, Low Latin melangolus, merangolus, Ital. melangola, melanzana, mela insana, &c. (see P. della Valle, below), French aubergine (from alberengena), melongène, merangène, and provincially belingène, albergaine, albergine, albergame. (See Marcel Devic, p. 46.) Littré, we may remark, explains (dormitante Homero?) aubergine as ‘espèce de morelle,’ giving the etym. as “diminutif de auberge” (in the sense of a kind of peach). Melongena is no real Latin word, but a factitious rendering of melanzana, or, as Marcel Devic says, “Latin du botaniste.” It looks as if the Skt. word were the original of all. The H. baingan again seems to have been modified from the P. badīngān, [or, as Platts asserts, direct from the Skt. vānga, vāngana, ‘the plant of Bengal,’] and baingan also through the Ar. to have been the parent of the Span. berengena, and so of all the other European names except the English ‘egg-plant.’ The Ital. mela insana is the most curious of these corruptions, framed by the usual effort after meaning, and connecting itself with the somewhat indigestible reputation of the vegetable as it is eaten in Italy, which is a fact. When cholera is abroad it is considered (e.g. in Sicily) to be an act of folly to eat the melanzana. There is, however, behind this, some notion (exemplified in the quotation from Lane’s Mod. Egypt. below) connecting the badinjān with madness. [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 417.] And it would seem that the old Arab medical writers give it a bad character as an article of diet. Thus Avicenna says the badinjān generates melancholy and obstructions. To the N. O. Solanaceae many poisonous plants belong.

The word has been carried, with the vegetable, to the Archipelago, probably by the Portuguese, for the Malays call it berinjald. [On this Mr. Skeat writes: “The Malay form brinjal, from the Port., not berinjald, is given by Clifford and Swettenham, but it cannot be established as a Malay word, being almost certainly the Eng. brinjaul done into Malay. It finds no place in Klinkert, and the native Malay word, which is the only word used in pure Peninsular Malay, is terong or trong. The form berinjald, I believe, must have come from the Islands if it really exists.”] 1554.—(At Goa). “And the excise from garden stuff under which are comprised these things, viz.: Radishes, beetroot, garlick, onions green and dry, green tamarinds, lettuces, conbalinguas, ginger, oranges, dill, coriander, mint, cabbage, salted mangoes, brinjelas, lemons, gourda, citrons, cucumbers, which articles none may sell in retail except the Rendeiro of this excise, or some one who has got permission from him. . . .”—S. Botelho, Tombo, 49.

c. 1580.—“Trifolium quoque virens comedunt Arabes, mentham Judaei crudam, . . . mala insana . . .”—Prosper Alpinius, i. 66.

1611.—“We had a market there for upon the Strand of diuers sorts of provisions, towit . . . Pallingenies, cucumbers . . .”—N. Downton, in Purchas, i. 298.

1616.—“It seems to me to be one of those fruits which are called in good Tuscan petronciani, but which by the Lombards are called melanzane, and by the vulgar at Rome marignani; and if my memory does not deceive me, by the Neapolitans in their patois molegnane.”—P. della Valle, i. 197.

1673.—“The Garden . . . planted with Potatoes, Yawms, Berenjaws, both hot plants . . .”—Fryer, 104.

1738.—“Then follow during the rest of the summer, calabashas . . . bedin-janas, and tomatas.”—Shaw's Travels, 2nd ed. 1757, p. 141.

c. 1740.—“This man (Balaji Rao), who had become absolute in Hindostan as well as in Decan, was fond of bread made of Badjrah . . . he lived on raw Bringelas, on unripe mangoes, and on raw red pepper.”—Scir Mutagherin, iii. 229.

1782.—Sonnerat writes Béringédes.—i. 186.

1783.—Forrest spells brinjalles (V. to Merqui, 40); and (1810) Williamson biringal (V. M. i. 133). Forbes (1813), bringal and berenjal (Or. Mem. i. 32) [in 2nd ed. i. 22, bungal,] ii. 50; [in 2nd ed. i. 348].

1810.—“I saw last night at least two acres covered with brinjaal, a species of Solanum.”—Maria Graham, 24.

1826.—“A plate of poached eggs, fried in sugar and butter; a dish of badenjans, slit in the middle and boiled in grease.”—Hajji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 150.

1835.—“The neighbours unanimously declared that the husband was mad. . . . One exclaimed: ‘There is no strength nor power but in God! God restore thee!’ Another said: ‘How sad! He was really a worthy man.’ A third remarked: ‘Badingans are very abundant just now.’”—Lane, Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1860, 299.

1860.—“Amongst other triumphs of the native cuisine were some singular, but by no means inelegant chefs d'œuvre, brinjals boiled and stuffed with savoury meats, but exhibiting ripe and undressed fruit growing on the same branch.”—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 161. This dish is mentioned in the Sanskrit Cookery Book, which passes as by King Nala. It is managed by wrapping part of the fruit in wet cloths whilst the rest is being cooked.

BROACH, n.p. Bharōch, an ancient and still surviving city of Guzerat, on the River Nerbudda. The original forms of the name are Bhrigu-kachcha, and Bhāru-Kachchha, which last form appears in the Sunnar Cave Inscription No. ix., and this was written with fair correctness by the Greeks as Bapvyāsa and Bapyōsa. “Illiterate Guzerattees would in attempting to

c. B.C. 20.—“And then laughing, and stript naked, anointed and with his loin-cloth on, he leaped upon the pyre. And this inscription was set upon his tomb: Zarmanochēgas the Indian from Bargosē having rendered himself immortal after the hereditary custom of the Indians lieth here.”—Nicolaus Damascenus, in Strabo, xv. 72. [Lassen takes the name Zarmanochēgas to represent the Skt. Śrāmanācharya, teacher of the Śrāmanas, from which it would appear that he was a Buddhist priest.]

c. A.D. 80.—“On the right, at the very mouth of the gulf, there is a long and narrow strip of shoal. . . . And if one succeeds in getting into the gulf, still it is hard to hit the mouth of the river leading to Barygaza, owing to the land being so low . . . and when found it is difficult to enter, owing to the shoals of the river near the mouth. On this account there are at the entrances fishermen employed by the King . . . to meet ships as far off as Syrastrène, and by these they are piloted up to Barygaza.”—Periplus, sect. 43. It is very interesting to compare Horsburgh with this ancient account. “From the sands of Swallow to Broach a continued bank extends along the shore, which at Broach river projects out about 5 miles. . . . The tide flows here . . . velocity 6 knots . . . rising nearly 30 feet. . . . On the north side of the river, a great way up, the town of Broach is situated; vessels of considerable burden may proceed to this place, as the channels are deep in many places, but too intricate to be navigated without a pilot.”—India Directory (in loco).

c. 718.—Barūs is mentioned as one of the places against which Arab attacks were directed.—See Elliot, i. 441.

c. 1300.—“. . . a river which lies between the Sarsut and Ganges . . . has a south-westerly course till it falls into the sea near Bahrūch.”—Al-Birūni, in Elliot, i. 49.

A.D. 1321.—“After their blessed martyrdom, which occurred on the Thursday before Palm Sunday, in Thana of India, I baptised about 90 persons in a certain city called Parocco, 10 days' journey distant therefrom . . .”—Friar Jordanus, in Cathay, &c., 226.

1552.—“A great and rich ship said to belong to Meleque Gupij, Lord of Baroche.”—Barros, II. vi. 2.

1555.—“Sultan Ahmed on his part marched upon Bartj.”—Sidi 'Ali, 85.

[1615.—“It would be necessary to give credit unto two or three Guzzaratts for some cloth to make a voyage to Burrouse.”—Foster, Letters, iv. 94.]

1617.—“We gave our host . . . a peer of backar baroche to his children to ma them 2 coates."—Cocks's Diary, i. 330. [Backar here seems to represent a port connected with Broach, called in the Āin (ii. 243) Bhankora or Bhakor; Bayley gives Bhakorah as a village on the frontier of Gujerat.]

1623.—"Before the hour of complines . . . we arrived at the city of Barochi, or Behrug as they call it in Persian, under the walls of which, on the south side, flows a river called Nerbedà."—P. della Valle, ii. 529; [Hak. Soc. i. 60].

1648.—In Van Twist (p. 11), it is written Broichia.

1756.—"Bandar of Bhrōch."—(Bird's tr. of) Mirat-i-Ahmadi, 115.

1803.—"I have the honour to enclose . . . papers which contain a detailed account of the . . . capture of Baroach."—Wellington, ii. 289.

BUCK, v. To prate, to chatter, to talk much and egotistically. H. baknd. [A buck-stick is a chatterer.]

1880.—"And then . . . he bucks with a quiet stubborn determination that would fill an American editor, or an Under Secretary of State with despair. He belongs to the 12-foot-tiger school, so perhaps he can't help it."—Ali Baba, 164.

BUCKAUL, s. Ar. H. bukkāl, 'a shopkeeper'; a bunya (q. v. under BANYAN). In Ar. it means rather a 'second-hand' dealer.

[c. 1590.—"There is one cast of the Vaiśyas called Banik, more commonly termed Baniya (grain-merchant). The Persians name them bakkāl. . . ."—Āin, tr. Jurrott, iii. 118.]

1800.—". . . a buccal of this place told me he would let me have 500 bags tomorrow."—Wellington, i. 196.

1826.—"Should I find our neighbour the Baqual . . . at whose shop I used to spend in sweetmeats all the copper money that I could purloin from my father."—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, 295.

BUCKSHAW, s. We have not been able to identify the fish so called, or the true form of the name. Perhaps it is only H. bachchā, Mahr. bachchā (P. bacha, Skt. vatsa), 'the young of any creature.' But the Konkani Dict. gives 'boussa—peixe pequeno de qualquer sorte,' 'little fish of any kind.' This is perhaps the real word; but it also may represent bachcha. The practice of manuring the coco-palms with putrid fish is still rife, as residents of the Government House at Parell never forget. The fish in use is refuse bummelo (q. v.). [The word is really the H. bachhud, a well-known edible fish which abounds in the Ganges and other N. Indian rivers. It is either the Pseudotropius gurua, or P. murius of Day, Fish. Ind., nos. 474 or 471; Fau. Br. Ind. i. 141, 137.]

1673.—". . . Cocoe Nuts, for Oyl, which latter they dunging with (Bubaho) Fish, the Land-Breezes brought a poysonous Smell on board Ship."—Fryer, 55. [Also see Wheeler, Early Rec., 40.]

1727.—"The Air is somewhat unhealthful, which is chiefly imputed to their dunging their Cocoa-nut trees with Buckshoe, a sort of small Fishes which their Sea abounds in."—A. Hamilton, i. 181.

c. 1760.—". . . manure for the coco-nut-tree . . . consisting of the small fry of fish, and called by the country name of Buckshaw."—Grose, i. 31.

[1883.—"Mahsir, rohū and batchwa are found in the river Jumna."—Gazetteer of Delhi District, 21.]

BUCKSHAW, s. This is also used in Cocks's Diary (i. 63, 99) for some kind of Indian piece-goods, we know not what. [The word is not found in modern lists of piece-goods. It is perhaps a corruption of Pers. bukchah, 'a bundle,' used specially of clothes. Tavernier (see below) uses the word in its ordinary sense.

[1665.—"I went to lie down, my bouchha being all the time in the same place, half under the head of my bed and half outside."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, ii. 166.]

BUCKSHEESH, BUXEES, s. P. through P.—H. bakhshish. Buonamano, Trinkgeld, pourboire; we don't seem to have in England any exact equivalent for the word, though the thing is so general; 'something for (the driver)' is a poor expression; tip is accurate, but is slang; gratuity is official or dictionary English.

1759.—"To Presents:— R. A. P.

2 Pieces of flowered Velvet 532 7 0

1 ditto of Broad Cloth . . 50 0 0

Buxis to the Servants . . 50 0 0"

Cost of Entertainment to Jugget Set. In Long, 190.

c. 1760.—“. . . Buxie money.”—Ives, 51.

1810.—“. . . each mile will cost full one rupee (i.e. 2s. 6d.), besides various little disbursements by way of buxees, or presents, to every set of bearers.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 235.

1823.—“These Christmas-boxes are said to be an ancient custom here, and I could almost fancy that our name of box for this particular kind of present . . . is a corruption of buckahish, a gift or gratuity, in Turkish, Persian, and Hindoostanee.”—Heber, i. 45.

1853.—“The relieved bearers opened the shutters, thrust in their torch, and their black heads, and most unceremoniously demanded buxees.”—W. Arnold, Oakfield, i. 239.

BUCKYNE, s. H. bukāyan, the tree Melia sempervivens, Roxb. (N. O. Meliaceae). It has a considerable resemblance to the nīm tree (see NEEM); and in Bengali is called mahā-nīm, which is also the Skt. name, mahā-nimba. It is sometimes erroneously called Persian Lilac.

BUDDHA, BUDDHISM, BUDDHIST. These words are often written with a quite erroneous assumption of precision Bhudda, &c. All that we shall do here is to collect some of the earlier mentions of Buddha and the religion called by his name.

c. 200.—“Εἰσὶ δὲ τῶν Ἰνδῶν οἱ τοῖς Βούττα πειθόμενοι παραγγέλμασιν· ὃν δι’ ὑπερβολὴν σεμνότητος εἰς θεὸν τιμήκασι.” Clementis Alexandrinus, Strōmatōn, Liber I. (Oxford ed., 1715, i. 359).

c. 240.—“Wisdom and deeds have always from time to time been brought to mankind by the messengers of God. So in one age they have been brought to mankind by the messenger called Buddha to India, in another by Zarādusht to Persia, in another by Jesus to the West. Thereupon this revelation has come down, this prophecy in this last age, through me, Mānī, the messenger of the God of truth to Babylonian.”—The Book of Mānī, called Shābūrkān, quoted by Albirūnī, in his Chronology, tr. by Sachau, p. 190.

c. 400.—“Apud Gymnosophistas Indiae quasi per manus hujus opinionis auctoritas traditur, quod Buddam principem dogmatis eorum, e latere suo virgo generaret. Nec hoc mirum de barbaris, quum Minervam quoque de capite Jovis, et Liberum patrem de femore ejus procreatos, docta finxit Graecia.”—St. Jerome, Adv. Jovinianum, Lib. i. ed. Vallarsii, ii. 309.

c. 440.—“. . . Τηνικαῦτα γὰρ τὸ Ἐμπεδοκλέους τοῦ παρ’ Ἑλλήσι φιλοσόφου δόγμα, διὰ τοῦ Μανιχαίου χριστιανισμὸν ὑπεκρίνατο . . . τοῦτον δὲ τοῦ Σκυθιανοῦ μαθητῆς γίνεται Βούδδας, πρότερον Τερέβινθος καλού-μενος . . . κ. τ. λ.” (see the same matter from Georgius Cedrenus below).—Socratis, Hist. Eccles. Lib. I. cap. 22.

c. 840.—“An certè Bragmanorum sequemur opinionem, ut quemadmodum illi sectae suae auctorem Bubdam, per virginis latus narrant exortum, ita nos Christum fuisse praedicemus? Vel magis sic nascitur Dei sapientia de virginis cerebro, quomodo Minerva de Jovis vertice, tamquam Liber Pater de femore? Ut Christicolam de virginis partu non solennis natura, vel auctoritas sacrae lectionis, sed superstitio Gentilis, et commenta perdoceant fabulosa.”—Ratramni Corbeiensis L. de Nativitate Xri., cap. iii. in L. D’Achery, Spicilegium, tom. i. p. 54, Paris, 1723.

c. 870.—“The Indians give in general the name of budd to anything connected with their worship, or which forms the object of their veneration. So, an idol is called budd.”—Bilāduri, in Elliot, i. 123.

c. 904.—“Budāsaf was the founder of the Sabaeen Religion . . . he preached to mankind renunciation (of this world) and the intimate contemplation of the superior worlds. . . . There was to be read on the gate of the Naobihar* at Balkh an inscription in the Persian tongue of which this is the interpretation: ‘The words of Budāsaf: In the courts of kings three things are needed, Sense, Patience, Wealth.’ Below had been written in Arabic: ‘Budāsaf lies. If a free man possesses any of the three, he will flee from the courts of Kings.’”—Mas’ūdī, iv. 45 and 49.

1000.—“. . . pseudo-prophets came forward, the number and history of whom it would be impossible to detail. . . . The first mentioned is Būdhāsaf, who came forward in India.”—Albirūnī, Chronology, by Sachau, p. 186. This name given to Buddha is specially interesting as showing a step nearer the true Bodhisattva, the origin of the name Ἰωδσαφ, under which Buddha became a Saint of the Church, and as elucidating Prof. Max Müller’s ingenious suggestion of that origin (see Chips, &c., iv. 184; see also Academy, Sept. 1, 1883, p. 146).

c. 1030.—“A stone was found there in the temple of the great Budda on which an inscription . . . purporting that the temple had been founded 50,000 years ago. . . .”—Al’Utbi, in Elliot, ii. 39.

c. 1060.—“This madman then, Manēs (also called Scythianus) was by race a Brachman, and he had for his teacher Budas, formerly called Terebinthus, who having been brought up by Scythianus in the learning of the Greeks became a follower of the sect of Empedocles (who said there were two first principles opposed to one another), and when he entered Persia declared that he had been born of a virgin, and had been brought up among the hills . . . and this Budas (also Terebinthus) did perish, crushed by an evil clean spirit.”—Georg. Cedrenus, Hist. Con-

* Naobihār = Nava-Vihāra (‘New Buddha Monastery’) is still the name of a district adjoining Balkh.

Beau ed., 455 (old ed. i. 250). This wonderful jumble, mainly copied, as we see, from Socrates (supra), seems to bring Buddha and Manes together. "Many of the ideas of Manichæism were but fragments of Buddhism."—R. B. Cowell, in Smith's Dict. of Christ. Biog.

c. 1190.—"Very grieved was Hārang Deva. Constantly he performed the worship of the Aribant; the Buddhist religion he adopted, he wore no sword."—The Firm of Chand Bardai, paraphr. by Brassier, in Ind. Ant. i. 271.

1610.—". . . This Prince is called in the histories of him by many names: his proper name was Irand Rāyo; but that by which he has been known since they have held him for a saint is the Buddha, which is as much as to say 'Sage' . . . and to this name the Gentiles throughout all India have dedicated great and superb Pagodas."—Cocu, Dec. V., liv. vi. cap. 2.

c. 1666.—"There is indeed another, a seventh Sect, which is called Baudd, whence do proceed 12 other different sects, but this is not so common as the others, the Votaries of it being hated and despised as a company of irreligious and atheistical people, nor do they live like the rest."—Bernier, E. T., ii. 107; [ed. Comptoir, 336].

1685.—"Above all these they have one to whom they pay much veneration, whom they call Budda, his figure is that of a man."—Ribeiro, f. 406.

1726.—"Before Gautama Budhum there have been known 26 Budhmo—viz. : . . ."
—Valentya, v. (Ceylon) 366.

1753. "Edrisi nous instruit de cette circonstance, en disant que le Balalar est adorateur de Bodda. Les Brahmanes du Malabar disent que c'est le nom que Vishtou a pris dans une de ses apparitions, et on connoît Vishtou pour une des trois principales divinités Indiennes. Suivant St. Jérôme et St. Clément d'Alexandrie, Budda ou Butta est le législateur des Gymnosophistes de l'Inde. La secte des Shamans ou Samanéens, qui ont demeuré la dominante dans tous les royaumes d'au delà du Gange, a fait de Budda en cette qualité son objet d'adoration. C'est la première des divinités Chingulanes ou de Culin, selon Ribeiro. Naman (Célou) (scu GAUTAMA), la grande idole des Chinois, est par eux appelé Putti."—D'Ancelle, Relaunciscarna, 75. "What knowledge and apprehension, on a subject then so obscure, is shown by this great (geographer) Compare the pretentious ignorance of the flashy Abbé Raynal in the quotations under 1770.

1770.—"Among the deities of the second order, particular honours are paid to Buddou, who descended upon earth to take upon himself the office of mediator between God and mankind."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 91.

"The Redsoits are another sect of Japan, of which Budda was the founder. . . . The spirit of Budism is dreadful. It breathes nothing but penitence, excessive fear, and cruel severity."—Ibid. i. 135. Raynal in the two preceding passages shows that he was not aware that the religions alluded to in Ceylon and in Japan were the same.

1779.—"Il y avoit alors dans ces parties de l'Inde, et principalement à la Côte de Coromandel et à Ceylan, un Culte dont on ignore absolument les Dignes; le Dieu Beouth, dont on ne connoit aujourd'hui, dans l'Inde que le Nom et l'objet de ce Culte; mais il est tout-à-fait aboli, si ce n'est, qu'il se trouve encore quelques familles d'Indiens séparés et méprisés des autres Castes, qui sont restés fidèles à Beouth, et qui ne reconnoissent pas la religion des Brames."—L'opuscule de M. Gratiol, quoted by W. Chambers, in As. Res. i. 170.

1801.—"It is generally known that the religion of Boudhoun is the religion of the people of Ceylon, but no one is acquainted with its forms and precepts. I shall here relate what I have heard upon the subject."—M. Jernette, in As. Res. vii. 369.

1806.—". . . The head is covered with the cone that ever adorns the head of the Chinese deity Fo, who has been often supposed to be the same as Boudah."—Salt, Queen of Salsette, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Be. i. 50.

1810.—"Among the Buddhists there are no distinct castes."—Maria Graham, 69.

It is remarkable how many poems on the subject of Buddha have appeared of late years. We have noted :

1. Buddha, Epische Dichtung in Zwanzig Gesängen, i.e. an Epic Poem in 20 cantos (in octaves rima). Von Joseph Vittor Widmann, Bern. 1869.

2. The Story of Gautama Buddha and his Creed: An Epic by Richard Phillips, Longmans, 1871. This is also printed in octaves, but each octave consists of 4 heroic couplets.

3. Vasavadatta, a Buddhist Idyll; by Dean Plumtre. Republished in Things New and Old, 1884. The subject is the story of the Courtesan of Mathura ("Vasavadattā and Upagupta"), which is given in Burnouf's Introd. à l'Histoire du Bouddhisme Indien, 146-148; a touching story, even in its original crude form.

It opens :
"Where proud Mathoura rears her hundred towers. . . ."

The Skt. Dict. gives indeed as an alternative Mathura, but Mathura is the usual name, whence Anglo-Ind. Muttra.

4. The brilliant Poem of Sir Edwin Arnold, called The Light of Asia, or the Great Renunciation, being the Life—

Teaching of Gautama, Prince of India, and Founder of Buddhism, as told in verse by an Indian Buddhist, 1879.

BUDGE-BUDGE, n. p. A village on the Hooghly R., 15 m. below Calcutta, where stood a fort which was captured by Clive when advancing on Calcutta to recapture it, in December, 1756. The Imperial Gazetteer gives the true name as Baj-baj, [but Hamilton writes Bhuja-bhuj].

1756.—“On the 29th December, at six o'clock in the morning, the admiral having landed the Company's troops the evening before at Mayapur, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Clive, cannonaded Bougee Bougee Fort, which was strong and built of mud, and had a wet ditch round it.”—Ives, 99.

1757.—The Author of Memoir of the Revolution in Bengal calls it Busbudgia; (1763), Luke Sraffton Budge Boodjee.

BUDGEROW, s. A lumbering keelless barge, formerly much used by Europeans travelling on the Gangetic rivers. Two-thirds of the length aft was occupied by cabins with Venetian windows. Wilson gives the word as H. and B. bajrā; Shakespear gives H. bajrā and bajra, with an improbable suggestion of derivation from bajar, ‘hard or heavy.’ Among Blochmann's extracts from Mahomedan accounts of the conquest of Assam we find, in a detail of Mīr Junla's fleet in his expedition of 1662, mention of 4 bajras (J. As. Soc. Ben. xli. pt. i. 73). The same extracts contain mention of war-sloops called bach'haris (pp. 57, 75, 81), but these last must be different. Bajra may possibly have been applied in the sense of ‘thunder-bolt.’ This may seem unsuited to the modern budgerow, but is not more so than the title of ‘lightning-darter’ is to the modern Burkundauze (q.v.)! We remember how Joinville says of the approach of the great galley of the Count of Jaffa:—“Sembloit que foudre cheist des cieux.” It is however perhaps more probable that bajrā may have been a variation of baglā. And this is especially suggested by the existence of the Portuguese form pajeres, and of the Ar. form bagara (see under BUGGALOW). Mr. Edye, Master Shipwright of the Naval Yard in Trincomalee, in a paper on the Native Craft of India and Ceylon, speaks of the Baggala or Budgerow, as if he had been accustomed to hear the words used indiscriminately. (See J. R. A. S., vol. i. p. 12). [There is a drawing of a modern Budgerow in Grant, Rural Life, p. 5.]

c. 1570.—“Their barks be light and armed with oars, like to Foistes . . . and they call these barks Bazaras and Patuas” (in Bengal).—Cæsar Fredericke, E. T. in Hakl. ii. 358.

1662.—(Blochmann's Ext. as above).

1705.—“ . . . des Bazaras qui sont de grands bateaux.”—Luillier, 52.

1723.—“Le lendemain nous passâmes sur les Bazaras de la compagnie de France.”—Lett. Edif. xiii. 269.

1727.—“ . . . in the evening to recreate themselves in Chaises or Palankins: . . . or by water in their Budgeroes, which is a convenient Boat.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 12.

1737.—“Charges, Budgrows . . . Rs. 281. 6. 3.”—MS. Account from Ft. William, in India Office.

1780.—“A gentleman's Bugerow was drove ashore near Chaun-paul Gaut . . .” —Hicky's Bengal Gazette, May 13th.

1781.—“The boats used by the natives for travelling, and also by the Europeans, are the budgerows, which both sail and row.”—Hodges, 39.

1783.—“ . . . his boat, which, though in Kashmire (it) was thought magnificent, would not have been disgraced in the station of a Kitchen-tender to a Bengal budgero.”—G. Forster, Journey, ii. 10.

1784.—“I shall not be at liberty to enter my budgerow till the end of July, and must be again at Calcutta on the 22nd of October.”—Sir W. Jones, in Mem. ii. 38.

1785.—“Mr. Hastings went aboard his Budgerow, and proceeded down the river, as soon as the tide served, to embark for Europe on the Berrington.”—In Selon-Karr, i. 86.

1794.—“By order of the Governor-General in Council . . . will be sold the Hon'ble Company's Budgerow, named the Sonamookhee . . . the Budgerow lays in the nullah opposite to Chitpore.”—Ibid. ii. 114.

1830.—

“Upon the bosom of the tide
Vessels of every fabric ride;
The fisher's skiff, the light canoe,

The Bujra broad, the Bholia trim,
Or Pinnaces that gallant swim,
With favouring breeze—or dull and slow
Against the heady current go”

H. H. Wilson, in Bengal Annual, 29.

* This (Sonamukhi, ‘Chrysostoma’) has continued to be the name of the Viceroy's river yacht (probably) to this day. It was so in Lord Canning's time, then represented by a barge adapted to be towed by a steamer.

BUDGROOK.

This may possibly contain some indication of the true form of this obscure word, but I have derived no light from it myself. The budgrook was apparently current at Muscat down to the beginning of last century (see Milburn, i. 116).

BUDLEE, s. A substitute in public or domestic service. H. badli, 'exchange; a person taken in exchange; a locum tenens'; from Ar. badal, 'he changed.' (See MUDDLE.)

BUDMASH, s. One following evil courses; Fr. mauvais sujet; It. malandrino. Properly bad-ma'dash, from P. bad, 'evil,' and Ar. ma'dash, 'means of livelihood.'

1844.—". . . the reputation which John Lawrence acquired . . . by the masterly manœuvring of a body of police with whom he descended on a nest of gamblers and cut-throats, 'budmashes' of every description, and took them all prisoners."—Bosworth Smith's Life of Ld. Lawrence, i. 178.

1866.—"The truth of the matter is that I was foolish enough to pay these budmashes beforehand, and they have thrown me over."—The Dawk Bungalow, by G. O. Trevelyan, in Fraser, p. 385.

1866.—"Cholmondeley. Why the shaitan didn't you come before, you lazy old budzart?"—The Dawk Bungalow, p. 215.

BUFFALO, s. This is of course originally from the Latin bubalus, which we have in older English forms, buffle and buff and bugle, through the French. The present form probably came from India, as it seems to be the Port. bufalo. The proper meaning of bubalus, according to Pliny, was not an animal of the ox-kind (βοῦβαλις was a kind of African antelope); but in Martial, as quoted, it would seem to bear the vulgar sense, rejected by Pliny.

At an early period of our connection with India the name of buffalo appears to have been given erroneously to the common Indian ox, whence came the still surviving misnomer of London shops, 'buffalo humps.' (See also the quotation from Ovington.) The buffalo has no hump. Buffalo tongues are another matter, and an old luxury, as the third quotation shows. The ox having appropriated the name of the buffalo, the true Indian domestic buffalo was differentiated as the 'water buffalo, a phrase still maintained by the British soldier in India. This has probably misled Mr. Blochmann, who uses the term 'water buffalo,' in his excellent English version of the Āin (e.g. i. 219). We find the same phrase in Barkley's Five Years in Bulgaria, 1876: "Besides their bullocks every well-to-do Turk had a drove of water-buffaloes" (32). Also in Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist (1868), p. 43, and in Miss Bird's Golden Chersonese (1883), 60, 274. [The unscientific use of the word as applied to the American Bison is as old as the end of the 18th century (see N.E.D..)]

The domestic buffalo is apparently derived from the wild buffalo (Bubalus arni, Jerd.; Bos bubalus, Blanford), whose favourite habitat is in the swampy sites of the Sunderbunds and Eastern Bengal, but whose haunts extend north-eastward to the head of the Assam valley, in the Terai west to Oudh, and south nearly to the Godavery; not beyond this in the Peninsula, though the animal is found in the north and north-east of Ceylon.

The domestic buffalo exists not only in India but in Java, Sumatra, and Manilla, in Mazanderan, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Adherbijan, Egypt, Turkey, and Italy. It does not seem to be known how or when it was introduced into Italy.—(See Hehn.) [According to the Encycl. Britt. (9th ed. iv. 442), it was introduced into Greece and Italy towards the close of the 6th century.]

c. A.D. 70.—"Howbeit that country bringeth forth certain kinds of goodly great wild bæufes: to wit the Bisontes, mained with a collar, like Lions; and the Vri [Urus], a mightie strong beast, and a swift, which the ignorant people call Buffles (bubalos), whereas indeed the Buffle is bred in Affrica, and carieth some resemblance of a calfe rather, or a Stag."—Pliny, by Ph. Hollande, i. 199-200.

"The King (Akbar) hath . . . as they doe credibly report, 1000 Elephants, 30,000 horses, 1400 tame deere, 800 concubines; such store of ounces, tigers, Buffles, cocks and Haukes, that it is very strange to see."—Ibid. 386.

1589.—"They doo plough and till their ground with kine, bufalos, and bulles."—Mendoza's China, tr. by Parkes, ii. 56.

[c. 1590.—Two methods of snaring the buffalo are described in Āin, Blockmann, tr. i. 293.]

1598.—"There is also an infinite number of wild buffs that go wandering about the desarts."—Pigafetta, E. T. in Harleian Coll. of Voyages, ii. 546.

[1623.—"The inhabitants (of Malabar) keep Cows, or buffalls."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 207.]

1630.—"As to Kine and Buffaloes . . . they besmeare the floores of their houses with their dung, and thinke the ground sanctified by such pollution."—Lord, Discoverie of the Banian Religion, 60-61.

1644.—"We tooke coach to Livorno, thro' the Great Duke's new Parke, full of huge corke-trees; the underwood all myrtills, amongst which were many buffalos feeding, a kind of wild ox, short nos'd, horns reversed."—Evelyn, Oct. 21.

1666.—". . . it produces Elephants in great number, oxen and buffaloes" (bufaros).—Faria y Souza, i. 189.

1689.—". . . both of this kind (of Oxen), and the Buffaloes, are remarkable for a big piece of Flesh that rises above Six Inches high between their Shoulders, which is the choicest and delicatest piece of Meat upon them, especially put into a dish of Palau."—Orington, 254.

1808.—". . . the Buffala milk, and curd, and butter simply churned and clarified, is in common use among these Indians, whilst the dainties of the Cow Dairy is prescribed to valetudinarians, as Hectics, and preferred by vicious (sic) appetites, or impotents alone, as that of the caprine and assine is at home."—Drummond, Illus. of Guzerattee, &c.

"The tank which fed his fields was there. . . There from the intolerable heat

The buffaloes retreat;

Only their nostrils raised to meet the air,
Amid the shelt'ring element they rest."

Curse of Kehama ix. 7.

1878.—"I had in my possession a head of a cow buffalo that measures 13 feet 8 inches in circumference, and 6 feet 6 inches between the tips—the largest buffalo head in the world."—Pollok, Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 107.

BUGGALOW, s. Mahr. baglā, bagalā. A name commonly given on the W. coast of India to Arab vessels of the old native form. It is also in common use in the Red Sea (bakalā) for the larger native vessels, all built of teak from India. It seems to be a corruption of the Span. and Port. bajel, baxel, baixel, baxella, from the Lat. vascellum (see Diez, Etym. Wörterb. i. 439, s. v.). Cobarruvias (1611) gives in his Sp. Dict. "Baxel, quasi vasel" as a generic name for a vessel of any kind going on the sea, and quotes St. Isidore, who identifies it with phaselus, and from whom we transcribe the passage below. It remains doubtful whether this word was introduced into the East by the Portuguese, or had at an earlier date passed into Arabic marine use. The latter is most probable. In Correa (c. 1561) this word occurs in the form pajer, pl. pajeres (j and x being interchangeable in Sp. and Port. See Lendas, i. 2, pp. 592, 619, &c.). In Pinto we have another form. Among the models in the Fisheries Exhibition (1883), there was "A Zaroogat or Bagarah from Aden." [On the other hand Burton (Ar. Nights, i. 119) derives the word from the Ar. baghlah, 'a she-mule.' Also see BUDGEROW.]

c. 636.—"Phaselus est navigium quod nos corrupte baselum dicimus. De quo Virgilius: Pictisque phaselis."—Isidorus Hispalensis, Originum et Etymol. lib. xix.

c. 1539.—"Partida a nao pera Goa, Fernão de Morais . . . seguiu sua viagem na volta do porto de Dabul, onde chegou ao outro dia as nove horas, e tomando nelle hū paguel de Malavares, carregado de algodao e de pimenta, poz logo a tormento o Capitano e o piloto delle, os quaes confessarão. . . ."—Pinto, ch. viii.

1842.—"As store and horse boats for that service, Capt. Oliver, I find, would prefer the large class of native buggalas, by which so much of the trade of this coast with Scinde, Cutch . . . is carried on."—Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Admin. of Lord Ellenborough, 222.

BUGGY, s. In India this is a (two-wheeled) gig with a hood, like the gentleman's cab that was in vogue in London about 1830-40, before broughams came in. Latham puts a (?) after the word, and the earliest examples that he gives are from the second quarter of this century (from Praed and I. D'Israeli). Though we trace the word much further back, we have not discovered its birthplace or etymology. The word, though used in England, has never been very common there; it is better known both

Ireland and in America. Littré gives boghei as French also. The American buggy is defined by Noah Webster as "a light, one-horse, four-wheel vehicle, usually with one seat, and with or without a calash-top." Cuthbert Bede shows (N. & Q. 5 ser. v. p. 445) that the adjective 'buggy' is used in the Eastern Midlands for 'conceited.' This suggests a possible origin. "When the Hunterian spelling-controversy raged in India, a learned Member of Council is said to have stated that he approved the change until ——— began to spell buggy as bagi. Then he gave it up." — (M.-G. Keatinge.) I have recently seen this spelling in print. [The N.E.D. leaves the etymology unsettled, merely saying that it has been connected with bogie and bug. The earliest quotation given is that of 1773 below.]

1773.—"Thursday 3d (June). At the sessions at Hicks's Hall two boys were indicted for driving a post-coach and four against a single horse-chaise, throwing out the driver of it, and breaking the chaise to pieces. Justice Welch, the Chairman, took notice of the frequency of the brutish custom among the post drivers, and their insensibility in making it a matter of sport, ludicrously denominating mischief of this kind 'Running down the Buggies.'—The prisoners were sentenced to be confined in Newgate for 12 months." — Gentleman's Magazine, xliii. 297.

"Shall D(onal)d come with Butts and tons
And knock down Epigrams and Puns?
With Chairs, old Cots, and Buggies trick ye?
Forbid it, Phœbus, and forbid it, Hicky!"
In Hicky's Bengal Gazette, May 13th.

"... go twice round the Race-Course as hard as we can set legs to ground, but we are beat hollow by Bob Crochet's Horses driven by Miss Fanny Hardheart, who in her career oversets Tim Capias the Attorney in his Buggy. . . ." — India Gazette, Dec. 23rd.

1782.—"Wanted, an excellent Buggy Horse about 15 Hands high, that will trot 15 miles an hour." — India Gazette, Sept. 14.

1784.—"For sale at Mr. Mann's, Rada Bazar. A Phaeton, a four-spring'd Buggy, and a two-spring'd ditto. . . ." — Calcutta Gazette, in Seton-Karr, i. 41.

1793.—"For sale. A good Buggy and Horse. . . ." — Bombay Courier, Jan. 20th.

1824.—"... the Archdeacon's buggy and horse had every appearance of issuing from the back-gate of a college in Cambridge on Sunday morning." — Heber, i. 192 (ed. 1844).

[1837.—"The vehicles of the place (Mong-hir), amounting to four Buggies (that is a foolish term for a cabriolet, but as it is the only vehicle in use in India, and as buggy is the only name for said vehicle, I give it up). . . . were assembled for our use." — Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 14.]

c. 1838.—"But substitute for him an average ordinary, uninteresting Minister: obese, dumpy . . . with a second-rate wife—dusty, deliquescent— . . . or let him be seen in one of those Shem-Ham-and-Japhet buggies, made on Mount Ararat soon after the subsidence of the waters. . . ." — Sydney Smith, 3rd Letter to Archdeacon Singleton.

1848.—"Joseph wants me to see if his—his buggy is at the door."

"What is a buggy, papa?"

"It is a one-horse palanquin," said the old gentleman, who was a wag in his way." — Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

1872.—"He drove his charger in his old buggy." — A True Reformer, ch. i.

1878.—"I don't like your new Bombay buggy. With much practice I have learned to get into it, I am hanged if I can ever get out." — Oerland Times of India, 4th Feb.

1879.—"Driven by that hunger for news which impels special correspondents, he had actually ventured to drive in a 'spider,' apparently a kind of buggy, from the Tugela to Gingliho." — Spectator, May 24th.

BUGIS, n.p. Name given by the Malays to the dominant race of the island of Célebes, originating in the S.-Western limb of the island; the people calling themselves Wugi. But the name used to be applied in the Archipelago to native soldiers in European service, raised in any of the islands. Compare the analogous use of Telinga (q.v.) formerly in India.

1656.—"Thereupon the Hollanders resolv'd to unite their forces with the Bouquises, that were in rebellion against their Sovereign." — Tavernier, E. T. ii. 192.

1688.—"These Buggasses are a sort of warlike trading Malayans and mercenary soldiers of India. I know not well whence they come, unless from Macassar in the Isle of Celebes." — Dampier, ii. 108.

1758.—"The Dutch were commanded by Colonel Roussely, a French soldier of fortune. They consisted of nearly 700 Europeans, and as many buggoses, besides country troops." — Narr. of Dutch attempt in Hoogly, in Malcolm's Clive, ii. 87.

1783.—"Buggesses, inhabitants of Celebes." — Forrest, Voyage to Merqui, p. 59.

BUND, s. Any artificial embankment, a dam, dyke, or causeway. H. band. The root is both Skt. (bandh) and P., but the common word, used as it is without aspirate, seems to have come from the latter. The word is common in Persia (e.g. see BENDAMEER). It is also naturalised in the Anglo-Chinese ports. It is there applied especially to the embanked quay along the shore of the settlements. In Hong Kong alone this is called (not bund, but) praia (Port. 'shore' [see PRAYA]), probably adopted from Macao.

1810.—“The great bund or dyke.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 279.

1860.—“The natives have a tradition that the destruction of the bund was effected by a foreign enemy.”—Tennant's Ceylon, ii. 504.

1875.—“... it is pleasant to see the Chinese ... being propelled along the bund in their hand carts.”—Thomson's Malacca, &c., 408.

1876.—“... so I took a stroll on Tien-Tsin bund.”—Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 28.

BUNDER, s. P. bandar, a landing-place or quay; a seaport; a harbour; (and sometimes also a custom-house). The old Ital. scala, mod. scalo, is the nearest equivalent in most of the senses that occurs to us. We have (c. 1565) the Mir-bandar, or Port Master, in Sind (Elliot, i. 277) [cf. Shabunder]. The Portuguese often wrote the word bandel. Bunder is in S. India the popular native name of Masulipatam, or Machli-bandar.

c. 1344.—“The profit of the treasury, which they call bandar, consists in the right of buying a certain portion of all sorts of cargo at a fixed price, whether the goods be only worth that or more; and this is called the Law of the Bandar.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 120.

c. 1346.—“So we landed at the bandar, which is a large collection of houses on the sea-shore.”—Ibid. 228.

1552.—“Coga-atar sent word to Affonzo d'Albuquerque that on the coast of the main land opposite, at a port which is called Bandar Angon ... were arrived two ambassadors of the King of Shiraz.”—Barros, II. ii. 4.

[1616.—“Besides the danger in intercepting our boats to and from the shore, &c., their firing from the Banda would be with much difficulty.”—Foster, Letters, iv. 328.]

1673.—“We fortify our Houses, have Bunders or Docks for our Vessels, to which belong Yards for Seamen, Soldiers, and Stores.”—Fryer, 115.

1809.—“On the new bunder or pier.”—Maria Graham, 11.

[1847, 1860. — See quotations under APOLLO BUNDER.]

BUNDER-BOAT, s. A boat in use on the Bombay and Madras coast for communicating with ships at anchor, and also much employed by officers of the civil departments (Salt, &c.) in going up and down the coast. It is rigged as Bp. Heber describes, with a cabin amidships.

1825.—“We crossed over ... in a stout boat called here a bundur boat. I suppose from 'bundur' a harbour, with two masts, and two lateen sails. ...”—Heber, ii. 121, ed. 1844.

BUNDOBUST, s. P.-H.—band-o-bast, lit. 'tying and binding.' Any system or mode of regulation; discipline; a revenue settlement.

[1768.—“Mr. Rumbold advises us ... he proposes making a tour through that province ... and to settle the Bandobust for the ensuing year.”—Letter to the Court of Directors, in Verelst, Viro of Bengal, App. 77.]

c. 1843.—“There must be bahut achch'hā bandobast (i.e. very good order or discipline) in your country,” said an aged Khāsamā (in Hindustani) to one of the present writers. “When I have gone to the Sandheads to meet a young gentleman from Bilāyat, if I gave him a cup of tea, 'tānki tānki,' said he. Three months afterwards this was all changed; bad language, violence, no more tānki.”

1880.—“There is not a more fearful wild-fowl than your travelling M.P. This unhappy creature, whose mind is a perfect blank regarding Faujdari and Bando-bast. ...”—Ali Buba, 181.

BUNDOOK, s. H. bandūk, from Ar. bunduk. The common H. term for a musket or matchlock. The history of the word is very curious. Bunduk, pl. banūdik, was a name applied by the Arabs to filberts (as some allege) because they came from Venice (Banadik, comp. German Venedig). The name was transferred to the nut-like pellets shot from cross-bows, and thence the cross-bows or arblasts were called bunduk, elliptically for kaus al-b., 'pellet-bow.' From cross-bows the name was transferred again to fire-arms, as in the parallel case of arquebus. [Al-Bandukāni, 'the man of the pellet-bow,' was one of the names by which the Caliph Hārūn-al-Rashīd was known, and Al Zahir Baybars al-Bandukdāri, the fourth Baharite Soldan (A.D. 1260-77) was so entitled because he had been slave to a Bandukdār, or Master of Artillery (Burton, Ar. Nights, xii. 38).]

[1875.—“Bandūqia, or orderlies of the Maharaja, carrying long guns in a loose red cloth cover.”—Drew, Jummoo and Kashmir, 74.]

BUNGALOW, s. H. and Mahr. banglā. The most usual class of house occupied by Europeans in the interior of India; being on one story, and covered by a pyramidal roof, which in the normal bungalow is of thatch, but may be of tiles without impairing its title to be called a bungalow. Most of the houses of officers in Indian cantonments are of this character. In reference to the style of the house, bungalow is sometimes employed in contradistinction to the (usually more pretentious) pukka house; by which latter term is implied a masonry house with a terraced roof. A bungalow may also be a small building of the type which we have described, but of temporary material, in a garden, on a terraced roof for sleeping in, &c., &c. The word has also been adopted by the French in the East, and by Europeans generally in Ceylon, China, Japan, and the coast of Africa.

Wilson writes the word bānglā, giving it as a Bengālī word, and as probably derived from Banga, Bengal. This is fundamentally the etymology mentioned by Bp. Heber in his Journal (see below), and that etymology is corroborated by our first quotation, from a native historian, as well as by that from F. Buchanan. It is to be remembered that in Hindustan proper the adjective ‘of or belonging to Bengal’ is constantly pronounced as bangālā or banglā. Thus one of the eras used in E. India is distinguished as the Banglā era. The probability is that, when Europeans began to build houses of this character in Behar and Upper India, these were called Banglī or ‘Bengal-fashion’ houses; that the name was adopted by the Europeans themselves and their followers, and so was brought back to Bengal itself, as well as carried to other parts of India. [“In Bengal, and notably in the districts near Calcutta, native houses to this day are divided into ath-chala, chau-chala, and Bangala, or eight-roofed, four-roofed, and Bengali, or common huts. The first term does not imply that the house has eight coverings, but that the roof has four distinct sides with four more projections, so as to cover a verandah all round the house, which is square. The Bangala, or Bengali house, or bungalow has a sloping roof on two sides and two gable ends. Doubtless the term was taken up by the first settlers in Bengal from the native style of edifice, was materially improved, and was thence carried to other parts of India. It is not necessary to assume that the first bungalows were erected in Behar.” (Saturday Rev., 17th April 1886, in a review of the first ed. of this book).]

A.H. 1041=A.D. 1633.—“Under the rule of the Bengalis (darahd-i-Bangālīyān) a party of Frank merchants, who are inhabitants of Sundīp, came trading to Sātganw. One kos above that place they occupied some ground on the banks of the estuary. Under the pretence that a building was necessary for their transactions in buying and selling, they erected several houses in the Bengālī style.”—Badshāhnāma, in Elliot, vii. 31.

c. 1680.—In the tracing of an old Dutch chart in the India Office, which may be assigned to about this date, as it has no indication of Calcutta, we find at Hoogly: “Ougli . . . Hollantze Logie . . . Bangelaer of Speelhuys,” i.e. “Hoogly . . . Dutch Factory . . . Bungalow, or Pleasure-house.”

1711.—“Mr. Herring, the Pilot's, Directions for bringing of Ships down the River of Hughley.”

“From Gull Gat all along the Hughley Shore until below the New Chaney almost as far as the Dutch Bungelow lies a Sand. . . .”—Thornton, The English Pilot, Pt. III. p. 54.

1711.—“Natty Bungelo or Nedds Bangalla River lies in this Reach (Tanna) on the Larboard side. . . .”—Ibid. 56. The place in the chart is Nedds Bengalla, and seems to have been near the present Akra on the Hoogly.

1747.—“Nabob's Camp near the Hedge of the Bounds, building a Bangallaa, raising Mudd Walls round the Camp, making Gun Carriages, &c. . . . (Pagodas) 55 : 10 : 73.”—Acct. of Extraordinary Charges . . . January, at Fort St. David, MS. Records in India Office.

1758.—“I was talking with my friends in Dr. Fullerton's bangla when news came of Ram Narain's being defeated.”—Seir Mutaqherin, ii. 103.

1780.—“To be Sold or Let, A Commodious Bungalo and out Houses . . . situated on the Road leading from the Hospital to the Burying Ground, and directly opposite to the Avenue in front of Sir Elijah Impey's House. . . .”—The India Gazette, Dec. 23.

1781-83.—“Bungelows are buildings in India, generally raised on a base of brick, one, two, or three feet from the ground, and consist of only one story: the plan of them usually is a large room in the center for an eating and sitting room, and rooms at each corner for sleeping; the whole is covered with one general thatch, which comes low to each side; the spaces between the angle rooms are riranders or open porticoes . . . sometimes the center riranders at each end are converted into rooms.”—Hodges, Travels, 146.

1784.—“To be let at Chinsurah . . . That large and commodious House. . . . The out-buildings are—a warehouse and two large bottle-connahs, 6 store-rooms, a cook-room, and a garden, with a bungalow near the house.”—Cal. Gazette, in Seton-Karr, i. 40.

1787.—“At Barrackpore many of the Bungalows much damaged, though none entirely destroyed.”—Ibid. p. 213.

1793.—“ . . . the bungalo, or Summer-house. . . .”—Dirom, 211.

“For Sale, a Bungalo situated between the two Tombstones, in the Island of Coulaba.”—Bombay Courier, Jan. 12.

1794.—“The candid critic will not however expect the parched plains of India, or bungaloes in the land-winds, will hardly tempt the Aonian maids wont to disport on the banks of Tiber and Thames. . . .”—Hugh Boyd, 170.

1809.—“We came to a small bungalo or garden-house, at the point of the hill, from which there is, I think, the finest view I ever saw.”—Maria Graham, 10.

c. 1810.—“The style of private edifices that is proper and peculiar to Bengal consists of a hut with a pent roof constructed of two sloping sides which meet in a ridge forming the segment of a circle. . . . This kind of hut, it is said, from being peculiar to Bengal, is called by the natives Banggolo, a name which has been somewhat altered by Europeans, and applied by them to all their buildings in the cottage style, although none of them have the proper shape, and many of them are excellent brick houses.”—Buchanan's Dinagepore (in Eastern India, ii. 922).

1817.—“The Yorū-bangala is made like two thatched houses or bangalas, placed side by side. . . . These temples are dedicated to different gods, but are not now frequently seen in Bengal.”—Ward's Hindoos, Bk. II. ch. i.

c. 1818.—“As soon as the sun is down we will go over to the Captain's bungalow.”—Mrs Sherwood, Stories, &c., ed. 1873, p. 1. The original editions of this book contain an engraving of “The Captain's Bungalow at Cawnpore” (c. 1811-12), which shows that no material change has occurred in the character of such dwellings down to the present time.

1824.—“The house itself of Barrackpore . . . barely accommodates Lord Amherst's own family; and his aides-de-camp and visitors sleep in bungalows built at some little distance from it in the Park. Bungalow, a corruption of Bengalee, is the general name in this country for any structure in the cottage style, and only of one floor. Some of these are spacious and comfortable dwellings. . . .”—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 33.

1872.—“L'emplacement du bungalou avait été choisi avec un soin tout particulier.”—Rev. des Deux Mondes, tom., xcvi. 930.

1875.—“The little groups of officers dispersed to their respective bungalows to dress and breakfast.”—The Dilemma, ch. i.

[In Oudh the name was specially applied to Fyzabad.

[1858.—“Fyzabad . . . was founded by the first rulers of the reigning family, and called for some time Bungalow, from a bungalow which they built on the verge of the stream.”—Sleeman, Journey through the Kingdom of Oudh, i. 137.]

BUNGALOW, DAWK-, s. A rest-house for the accommodation of travellers, formerly maintained (and still to a reduced extent) by the paternal care of the Government of India. The matériel of the accommodation was humble enough, but comprised the things essential for the weary traveller—shelter, a bed and table, a bath-room, and a servant furnishing food at a very moderate cost. On principal lines of thoroughfare these bungalows were at a distance of 10 to 15 miles apart, so that it was possible for a traveller to make his journey by marches without carrying a tent. On some less frequented roads they were 40 or 50 miles apart, adapted to a night's run in a palankin.

1853.—“Dak-bungalows have been described by some Oriental travellers as the ‘Inns of India.’ Playful satirists!”—Oakfield, ii. 17.

1866.—“The Dawk Bungalow; or, Is his Appointment Pucka?”—By G. O. Trevelyan, in Fraser's Magazine, vol. 73, p. 215.

1878.—“I am inclined to think the value of life to a dak bungalow fowl must be very trifling.”—In my Indian Garden, 11.

BUNGY, s. H. bhangī. The name of a low caste, habitually employed as sweepers, and in the lowest menial offices, the man being a house sweeper and dog-boy, [his wife an Ayah]. Its members are found throughout Northern and Western India, and every European household has a servant of this class. The colloquial application of the term bungy to such servants is however peculiar to Bombay, [but the word is commonly used in the N.W.P. but always with a contemptuous significance]. In the Bengal Pry. he is generally called Mehtar (q.v.), and by politer natives Halalkhor (see HALALCORE), &c. In Madras toti (see TOTY) is the usual word; [in W. India Dher or Dhed]. Wilson suggests that the caste name may be derived from bhāṅg (see BANG), and this is possible enough, as the class is generally given to strong drink and intoxicating drugs.

1826.—“The Kalpa or Skinner, and the Bunghes, or Sweeper, are yet one step below the Dher.”—Tr. Lit. Soc. Bombay, iii. 362.

BUNOW, s. and v. H. bando, used in the sense of ‘preparation, fabrication,’ &c., but properly the imperative of bandnā, ‘to make, prepare, fabricate.’ The Anglo-Indian word is applied to anything fictitious or factitious, ‘a cram, a shave, a sham’; or, as a verb, to the manufacture of the like. The following lines have been found among old papers belonging to an officer who was at the Court of the Nawāb Sa’adat ‘Ali at Lucknow, at the beginning of the last century :—

“Young Grant and Ford the other day
Would fain have had some Sport,
But Hound nor Beagle none had they,
Nor aught of Canine sort.
A luckless Parry * came most pat
When Ford—‘we’ve Dogs enow !
Here Maitre—Karn aur Doom ko Kant
Judd ! Terrier bunnow !†

“So Saadut with the like design
(I mean, to form a Pack)
To * * * * † gave a Feather fine
And Red Coat to his Back ;
A Persian Sword to clog his side,
And Boots Hussar sub-nyah,‡
Then eyed his Handiwork with Pride, Crying Meejir myn bunnayah ! ! !§

“Appointed to be said or sung in all Mosques, Mutts, Tuckeahs, or Eedgahs within the Reserved Dominions.”||

1853.—“You will see within a week if

* I.e. Pariah dog.

† “Mehtar ! cut his ears and tail, quick ; fabricate a Terrier !”

§ “See, I have fabricated a Major !”

|| The writer of these lines is believed to have been Captain Robert Skirving, of Croys, Galloway, a brother of Archibald Skirving, a Scotch artist of repute, and the son of Archibald Skirving, of East Lothian, the author of a once famous ballad on the battle of Prestonpans. Captain Skirving served in the Bengal army from about 1780 to 1806, and died about 1840.

this is anything more than a banau.”—Oakfield, ii. 58.

[1870.—“We shall be satisfied with choosing for illustration, out of many, one kind of benowed or prepared evidence.”—Chevers, Med. Jurisprud., 86.]

BURDWAN, n.p. A town 67 m. N.W. of Calcutta — Bardwān, but in its original Skt. form Vardhamāna, ‘thriving, prosperous,’ a name which we find in Ptolemy (Bardamana), though in another part of India. Some closer approximation to the ancient form must have been current till the middle of 18th century, for Holwell, writing in 1765, speaks of “Burdwan, the principal town of Burdomaan” (Hist. Events, &c., i. 112 ; see also 122, 125).

BURGHIER. This word has three distinct applications.

a. s. This is only used in Ceylon. It is the Dutch word burger, ‘citizen.’ The Dutch admitted people of mixt descent to a kind of citizenship, and these people were distinguished by this name from pure natives. The word now indicates any persons who claim to be of partly European descent, and is used in the same sense as ‘half-caste’ and ‘Eurasian’ in India Proper. [In its higher sense it is still used by the Boers of the Transvaal.]

1807.—“The greater part of them were admitted by the Dutch to all the privileges of citizens under the denomination of Burghers.”—Cordiner, Desc. of Ceylon.

1877.—“About 60 years ago the Burghers of Ceylon occupied a position similar to that of the Eurasians of India at the present moment.”—Calcutta Review, cxvii. 180-1.

b. n.p. People of the Nilgherry Hills, properly Badagas, or ‘North-erners.’—See under BADEGA.

c. s. A rafter, H. bargū.

BURKUNDAUZE, s. An armed retainer ; an armed policeman, or other armed unmounted employé of a civil department ; from Ar.-P. bark-andāz, ‘lightning-darter,’ a word of the same class as jān-bāz, &c. [Also see BUXERRY.]

1726.—“2000 men on foot, called Bircandes, and 2000 pioneers to make the road, called Bieldars (see BILDAR).”—Valentijn, iv. Suratte, 276.

1793.—“Capt. Welsh has succeeded in driving the Bengal Berkendosses out of Assam.”—Cornwallis, ii. 207.

1794.—“Notice is hereby given that persons desirous of sending escorts of burkandases or other armed men, with merchandises, are to apply for passports.”—In Sidon-Narr, ii. 139.

[1832.—“The whole line of march is guarded in each procession by burkhand-hars (matchlock men), who fire singly, at intervals, on the way.”—Mrs Mer Haman Ad, i. 67.]

BURMA, BURMAH (with BURMESE, &c.) n.p. The name by which we designate the ancient kingdom and nation occupying the central basin of the Irawadi River. “British Burma” is constituted of the provinces conquered from that kingdom in the two wars of 1824-26 and 1852-53, viz. (in the first) Arakan, Martaban, Tenasserim, and (in the second) Pegu. [Upper Burma and the Shan States were annexed after the third war of 1885.]

The name is taken from Mran-mā, the national name of the Burmese people, which they themselves generally pronounce Ram-mā, unless when speaking formally and emphatically. Sir Arthur Phayre considers that this name was in all probability adopted by the Mongoloid tribes of the Upper Irawadi, on their conversion to Buddhism by missionaries from Gangetic India, and is identical with that (Brahm-mā) by which the first and holy inhabitants of the world are styled in the (Pali) Buddhist Scriptures. Brahma-desa was the term applied to the country by a Singhalese monk returning thence to Ceylon, in conversation with one of the present writers. It is however the view of Bp. Bigandet and of Prof. Forchhammer, supported by considerable arguments, that Mran, Myan, or Myen was the original name of the Burmese people, and is traceable in the names given to them by their neighbours; e.g. by Chinese Mien (and in Marco Polo); by Kakhyaens, Myen or Mren; by Shans, Mān; by Sgaw Karens, Payo; by Pgaw Karens, Payān; by Paloungs, Pādān, &c.* Prof. F. considers that Mran-mā (with this honorific suffix) does not date beyond the 14th century. [In J. R. A. Soc. (1894, p. 152 seq.), Mr. St John suggests that the word Myamma is derived from myan, ‘swift,’ and ma, ‘strong,’ and was taken as a sobriquet by the people at some early date, perhaps in the time of Anawrahta, A.D. 1150.]

* Forchhammer argues further that the original name was Ran or Tan, with m, ma, or pa as a pronominal accent.

1516.—“Having passed the Kingdom of Bengale, along the coast which turns to the South, there is another Kingdom of Gentiles, called Burma. . . . They frequently are at war with the King of Pegu. We have no further information respecting this country, because it has no shipping.”—Barbosa, 181.

[“Verma.” See quotation under ARAKAN.]

1543.—“And folk coming to know of the secrecy with which the force was being despatched, a great desire took possession of all to know whither the Governor intended to send so large an armament, there being no Rumis to go after, and nothing being known of any other cause why ships should be despatched in secret at such a time. So some gentlemen spoke of it to the Governor, and much importuned him to tell them whither they were going, and the Governor, all the more bent on concealment of his intentions, told them that the expedition was going to Pegu to fight with the Bramas who had taken that Kingdom.”—Ibid. iv. 298.

c. 1545.—“How the King of Bramā undertook the conquest of this kingdom of Silo (Siam), and of what happened till his arrival at the City of Udih.”—F. M. Pinto (orig.) cap. 185.

[1553.—“Bramā.” See quotation under JANGONAY.]

1606.—“Although one’s whole life were wasted in describing the superstitions of these Gentiles—the Pegus and the Bramas—one could not have done with the half, therefore I only treat of some, in passing, as I am now about to do.”—Canto, viii. cap. xii.

[1639.—“His (King of Pegu’s) Guard consists of a great number of Soldiers, with them called Brahmans, is kept at the second Port.”—Mandelstau, Travels, E. T. ii. 118.]

1680.—“ARTICLES of COMMERCE to be proposed to the King of Barma and Pegu, in behalfe of the English Nation for the settling of a Trade in those countryes.”—Fl. St. Geo. Cons, in Notes and Exts., iii. 7.

1727.—“The Dominions of Barma are at present very large, reaching from Moravi near Tanasserin, to the Province of Yunan in China.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 41.

1759.—“The Straghamas are much more numerous than the Peguenses and more addicted to commerce; even in Pegu their numbers are 100 to 1.” Letter in Dalrymple, O. R., i. 99. The writer appears desirous to convey by his unusual spelling some accurate reproduction of the name as he had heard it. His testimony as to the predominance of Burmese in Pegu, at that date even, is remarkable.

[1767.—“Buraghmagh.” See quotation under SONAPARANTA.

[1782.—“Bahmans.” See quotation under GAUTAMA.]

1793.—“Burmah borders on Pegu to the north, and occupies both banks of the river as far as the frontiers of China.”—Rennell's Memoir, 297.

[c. 1819.—“In fact in their own language, their name is not Burmese, which we have borrowed from the Portuguese, but Biamma.”—Sangermano, 36.]

BURRA-BEEBEE, s. H. bari bibi, ‘Grande dame.’ This is a kind of slang word applied in Anglo-Indian society to the lady who claims precedence at a party. [Nowadays Barī Mem is the term applied to the chief lady in a Station.]

1807.—“At table I have hitherto been allowed but one dish, namely the Burro Bebee, or lady of the highest rank.”—Lord Minto in India, 29.

1848.—“The ladies carry their burrah-bibiship into the steamers when they go to England. . . . My friend endeavoured in vain to persuade them that whatever their social importance in the ‘City of Palaces,’ they would be but small folk in London.”—Chow Chow, by Viscountess Falkland, i. 92.

[BURRA-DIN, s. H. barā-din. A ‘great day,’ the term applied by natives to a great festival of Europeans, particularly to Christmas Day.

[1880.—“This being the Burra Din, or great day, the fact of an animal being shot was interpreted by the men as a favourable augury.”—Ball, Jungle Life, 279.]

BURRA-KHANA, s. H. barā khāna, ‘big dinner’; a term of the same character as the two last, applied to a vast and solemn entertainment.

[1880.—“To go out to a burra khana, or big dinner, which is succeeded in the same or some other house by a larger evening party.”—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 51.]

BURRA SAHIB. H. barā, ‘great’; ‘the great Sāhib (or Master),’ a term constantly occurring, whether in a family to distinguish the father or the elder brother, in a station to indicate the Collector, Commissioner, or whatever officer may be the recognised head of the society, or in a department to designate the head of that department, local or remote.

[1889.—“At any rate a few of the great lords and ladies (Burra Sahib and Burra Mem Sahib) did speak to me without being driven to it.”—Lady Dufferin, 34.]

BURRAMPOOTER, n.p. Properly (Skt.) Brahmaputra (‘the son of Brahmā’), the great river Brahmaputr of which Assam is the valley. Rising within 100 miles of the source of the Ganges, these rivers, after being separated by 17 degrees of longitude, join before entering the sea. There is no distinct recognition of this great river by the ancients, but the Diardanes or Oidanes, of Curtius and Strabo, described as a large river in the remoter parts of India, abounding in dolphins and crocodiles, probably represents this river under one of its Skt. names, Hladini.

1552.—Barros does not mention the name before us, but the Brahmaputra seems to be the river of Caor, which traversing the kingdom so called (Gour) and that of Comotay, and that of Cirola (see SILHET), issues above Chatigdo (see CHITTAGONG), in that notable arm of the Ganges which passes through the island of Sornagam.

c. 1590.—“There is another very large river called Berhumputter, which runs from Khatai to Coach (see COOCH BEHAR) and from thence through Bazoohah to the sea.”—Ayeen Akberry (Gladwin) ed. 1800, ii. 6: [ed. Jarrett, ii. 121].

1726.—“Out of the same mountains we see . . . a great river flowing which . . . divides into two branches, whereof the easterly one on account of its size is called the Great Barrempooter.”—Valentijn, v. 154.

1753.—“Un peu au-dessous de Daka, le Gange est joint par une grosse rivière, qui sort de la frontière du Tibet. Le nom de Bramanpoutre qu’on lui trouve dans quelques cartes est une corruption de celui de Brahmaputren, qui dans le langage du pays signifie tirant son origine de Brahma.”—D’Anville, Eclaircissements, 62.

1767.—“Just before the Ganges falls into ye Bay of Bengall, it receives the Baramputrey or Assam River. The Assam River is larger than the Ganges . . . it is a perfect Sea of fresh Water after the Junction of the two Rivers. . . .”—MS. Letter of James Rennell, d. 10th March.

1793.—“. . . till the year 1765, the Burrampooter, as a capital river, was unknown in Europe. On tracing this river in 1765, I was no less surprised at finding it rather larger than the Ganges, than at its course previous to its entering Bengal. . . . I could no longer doubt that the Burrampooter and Sanpoo were one and the same river.”—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. 356.

BURREL, s. H. bharal; Ovis nallura, Hodgson. The blue wild sheep of the Himalaya. [Blanford, Mamm. 499, with illustration.]

a. The word properly is applied to a disease to which horses are liable in the rains, pustular eruptions breaking out on the head and fore parts of the body.

[1828.—"That very extraordinary disease, the bursattee."—Or. Sport. Mag., reprint, 1873, i. 125.]

[1832.—"Horses are subject to an infectious disease, which generally makes its appearance in the rainy season, and therefore called burrhsattie."—Mrs Meer Hassan Ali, ii. 27.]

b. But the word is also applied to a waterproof cloak, or the like. (See BRANDY COORTEE.)

1880.—"The scenery has now been arranged for the second part of the Simla season . . . and the appropriate costume for both sexes is the decorous bursatti."—Pioneer Mail, July 8.

BUS, adv. P.-H. bas, 'enough.' Used commonly as a kind of interjection: 'Enough! Stop! Ohe jam satis! Basta, basta!' Few Hindustani words stick closer by the returned Anglo-Indian. The Italian expression, though of obscure etymology, can hardly have any connection with bas. But in use it always feels like a mere expansion of it!

1853.—"'And if you pass,' say my dear good-natured friends, 'you may get an appointment. Bus! (you see my Hindostanee knowledge already carries me the length of that emphatic monosyllable). . . .'"—Oakfield, 2nd ed. i. 42.

BUSHIRE, n.p. The principal modern Persian seaport on the Persian Gulf; properly Abūshahr.

1727.—"Bowchier is also a Maritim Town. . . . It stands on an Island, and has a pretty good Trade."—A. Hamilton, i. 90.

BUSTEE, s. An inhabited quarter, a village. H. basti, from Skt. vas = 'dwell.' Many years ago a native in Upper India said to a European assistant in the Canal Department: "You Feringis talk much of your country and its power, but we know that the whole of you come from five villages" (pānch basti). The word is applied in Calcutta to the separate groups of huts in the humbler native quarters, the sanitary state of which has often been held up to reprobation.

[1889.—"There is a dreary bustee in the neighbourhood which is said to make the most of any cholera that may be going."—R. Kipling, City of Dreadful Night, 54.]

BUTLER, s. In the Madras and Bombay Presidencies this is the title usually applied to the head-servant of any English or quasi-English household. He generally makes the daily market, has charge of domestic stores, and superintends the table. As his profession is one which affords a large scope for feathering a nest at the expense of a foreign master, it is often followed at Madras by men of comparatively good caste. (See CONSUMAH.)

1616.—"Yosky the butler, being sick, asked lycense to goe to his howse to take phisick."—Cocks, i. 135.

1689.—". . . the Butlers are enjoind to take an account of the Place each Night, before they depart home, that they (the Peons) might be examin'd before they stir, if ought be wanting."—Orrington, 393.

1782.—"Wanted a Person to act as Steward or Butler in a Gentleman's House, he must understand Hairdressing."—India Gazette, March 2.

1789.—"No person considers himself as comfortably accommodated without entertaining a Dulash at 4 pagodas per month, a Butler at 3, a Peon at 2, a Cook at 3, a Compradore at 2, and kitchen boy at 1 pagoda."—Munro's Narrative of Operations, p. 27.

1873.—"Glancing round, my eye fell on the pantry department . . . and the butler trimming the reading lamps."—Camp Life in India, Fraser's Mag., June, 696.

1879.—". . . the moment when it occurred to him (i.e. the Nyoung-young Prince of Burma) that he ought really to assume the guise of a Madras butler, and be off to the Residency, was the happiest inspiration of his life."—Standard, July 11.

BUTLER-ENGLISH. The broken English spoken by native servants in the Madras Presidency; which is not very much better than the Pigeon-English of China. It is a singular dialect; the present participle (e.g.) being used for the future indicative, and the preterite indicative being formed by 'done'; thus I telling = 'I will tell'; I done tell = 'I have told'; done come = 'act'. Peculiar meanings are words; thus family = 'wife.' The oddest characteristic about this jargon is (or was) that masters used it in speaking to their servants as well as servants to their masters.

BUXEE, s. A military paymaster; H. bakhshī. This is a word of complex and curious history.

In origin it is believed to be the Mongol or Turki corruption of the Skt. bhikṣu, 'a beggar,' and thence a Buddhist or religious mendicant or member of the ascetic order, bound by his discipline to obtain his daily food by begging.* Bakshi was the word commonly applied by the Tartars of the host of Chingiz and his successors, and after them by the Persian writers of the Mongol era, to the regular Buddhist clergy; and thus the word appears under various forms in the works of medieval European writers from whom examples are quoted below. Many of the class came to Persia and the west with Hulākū and with Bātū Khān; and as the writers in the Tartar camps were probably found chiefly among the bakshis, the word underwent exactly the same transfer of meaning as our clerk, and came to signify a literatus, scribe or secretary. Thus in the Latino-Perso-Turkish vocabulary, which belonged to Petrarch and is preserved at Venice, the word scriba is rendered in Comanian, i.e. the then Turkish of the Crimea, as Bacsi. The change of meaning did not stop here.

Abu'l-Faḡl in his account of Kashmīr (in the Āin, [ed. Jarrett, iii. 212]) recalls the fact that bakhshī was the title given by the learned among Persian and Arabic writers to the Buddhist priests whom the Tibetans styled lāmds. But in the time of Baber, say circa 1500, among the Mongols the word had come to mean surgeon; a change analogous again, in some measure, to our colloquial use of doctor. The modern Mongols, according to Pallas, use the word in the sense of 'Teacher,' and apply it to the most venerable or learned priest of a community. Among the Kirghiz Kazzāks, who profess Mahommedanism, it has come to bear the character which Marco Polo more or less associates with it, and means a mere conjurer or medicine-man; whilst in Western Turkestan it signifies a 'Bard' or 'Minstrel.' [Vambéry in his Sketches of Central Asia (p. 81) speaks of a Bakhshi as a troubadour.]

By a further transfer of meaning, of which all the steps are not clear, in another direction, under the Mohammedan Emperors of India the word bakhshi was applied to an officer high in military administration, whose office is sometimes rendered 'Master of the Horse' (of horse, it is to be remembered, the whole substance of the army consisted), but whose duties sometimes, if not habitually, embraced those of Paymaster-General, as well as, in a manner, of Commander-in-Chief, or Chief of the Staff. [Mr. Irvine, who gives a detailed account of the Bakhshi under the latter Moguls (J. R. A. Soc., July 1896, p. 539 seqq.), prefers to call him Adjutant-General.] More properly perhaps this was the position of the Mir Bakhshī, who had other bakhshis under him. Bakhshis in military command continued in the armies of the Mah-rattas, of Hyder Ali, and of other native powers. But both the Persian spelling and the modern connection of the title with pay indicate a probability that some confusion of association had arisen between the old Tartar title and the P. bakhsh, 'portion,' bakhshīdan, 'to give,' bakhshīsh, 'payment.' In the early days of the Council of Fort William we find the title Buxee applied to a European Civil officer, through whom payments were made (see Long and Seton-Karr, passim). This is obsolete, but the word is still in the Anglo-Indian Army the recognised designation of a Paymaster.

This is the best known existing use of the word. But under some Native Governments it is still the designation of a high officer of state. And according to the Calcutta Glossary it has been used in the N.W.P. for 'a collector of a house tax' (?) and the like; in Bengal for 'a superintendent of peons'; in Mysore for 'a treasurer,' &c. [In the N.W.P. the Bakhshī, popularly known to natives as 'Bakhshī Tikka,' 'Tax Bakhshi,' is the person in charge of one of the minor towns which are not under a Municipal Board, but are managed by a Panch, or body of assessors, who raise the income needed for watch and ward and conservancy by means of a graduated house assessment.] See an interesting note on this word in Quatremère, H. des Mongols, 184 seqq.; also see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 61, note.

* In a note with which we were favoured by the late Prof. Anton Schiefner, he expressed doubts whether the Bakshi of the Tibetans and Mongols was not of early introduction through the Uigurs from some other corrupted Sanskrit word, or even of pre-buddhist derivation from an Iranian source. We do not find the word in Jaeschke's Tibetan Dictionary.

1298.—“There is another marvel performed by those Bacsi, of whom I have been speaking as knowing so many enchantments. . . .”—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 61.

c. 1300.—“Although there are many Bakhshis, Chinese, Indian and others, those of Tibet are most esteemed.”—Rashid-uddin, quoted by D’Ouseon, ii. 370.

c. 1300.—“Et sciendum, quod Tartar quosdam homines super omnes de mundo honorant: boxitas, scilicet quosdam pontifices ydolorum.”—Ricoldus de Montecrucis, in Peregrinationes, IV. p. 117.

c. 1308.—“Ταῦτα γὰρ Κουτζιμπαξίς ἐπαρχῶν πρὸς βασιλέα διεβεβαλον· πρῶτος δὲ τῶν ἱερομάγων, τοῦνομα τοῦτο ἐξελληνίζεται.”—Georg. Pachymeres de Andronico Palaeologo, Lib. vii. The last part of the name of this Kutziparis, ‘the first of the sacred magi,’ appears to be Bakhshi; the whole perhaps to be Khoja-Bakhshi, or Kachin-Bakhshi.

c. 1340.—“The Kings of this country sprung from Jinghiz Khan . . . followed exactly the yasak (or laws) of that Prince and the dogmas received in his family, which consisted in revering the sun, and conforming in all things to the advice of the Bakhshis.”—Shihabuddin, in Not. et Extr. xiii. 237.

1420.—“In this city of Kamcheu there is an idol temple 500 cubits square. In the middle is an idol lying at length, which measures 50 paces. . . . Behind this image . . . figures of Bakhshis as large as life. . . .”—Shah Rukh’s Mission to China, in Cathay, i: cciii.

1615.—“Then I moved him for his favor for an English Factory to be Resident in the Towne, which hee willingly granted, and gave present order to the Buxy, to draw a Firma both for their comming vp, and for their residence.”—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 541; [Hak. Soc. i. 93.]

c. 1660.—“. . . obliged me to take a Salary from the Grand Mogol in the quality of a Phisitian, and a little after from Danechmend-Kan, the most knowing man of Asia, who had been Bakhshis, or Great Master of the Horse.”—Bernier, E.T. p. 2; [ed. Constable, p. 4].

1701.—“The friendship of the Buxie is not so much desired for the post he is now in, but that he is of a very good family, and has many relations near the King.”—In Wheeler, i. 378.

1706-7.—“So the Emperor appointed a nobleman to act as the bakhshi of Kám Bakhsh, and to him he intrusted the Prince, with instructions to take care of him. The bakhshi was Sultan Hasan, otherwise called Mir Malang.”—Dorson’s Elliot, vii. 385.

1711.—“To his Excellency Zulfikar Khan Bahadur, Nurzerat Sing (Nasrat-Jang!) Backshee of the whole Empire.”—Address of a Letter from President and Council of Fort St. George, in Wheeler, ii. 160.

1712.—“Chan Dhjehaan . . . first Bakshi general, or Muster-Master of the horsemen.”—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte), 295.

1753.—“The Buxey acquaints the Board he has been using his endeavours to get sundry artificers for the Negrals.”—In Long, 43.

1756.—Barth. Plaisted represents the bad treatment he had met with for “strictly adhering to his duty during the Buxy-ship of Messrs. Bellamy and Kempe”; and “the abuses in the post of Buxy.”—Letter to the Hon. the Court of Directors, &c., p. 3.

1763.—“The buxey or general of the army, at the head of a select body, closed the procession.”—Orme, i. 26 (reprint).

1766.—“The Buxey lays before the Board an account of charges incurred in the Buxey Connah . . . for the relief of people saved from the Falmouth.”—Ft. William, Cons., Long, 457.

1793.—“The bukshay allowed it would be prudent in the Sultan not to hazard the event.”—Dirom, 50.

1804.—“A buckshee and a body of horse belonging to this same man were opposed to me in the action of the 5th; whom I daresay that I shall have the pleasure of meeting shortly at the Peshwah’s darbar.”—Wellington, iii. 80.

1811.—“There appear to have been different descriptions of Buktshies (in Tippoo’s service). The Buktshies of Kushoons were a sort of commissaries and paymasters, and were subordinate to the sipahdâr, if not to the Resâladâr, or commandant of a battalion. The Meer Buktshy, however, took rank of the Sipahdâr. The Buktshies of the Kisham and Jyshe were, I believe, the superior officers of these corps respectively.”—Note to Tippoo’s Letters, 165.

1823.—“In the Mahratta armies the prince is deemed the Sirdar or Commander; next to him is the Bukshee or Paymaster, who is vested with the principal charge and responsibility, and is considered accountable for all military expenses and disbursements.”—Malcolm, Central India, i. 534.

1827.—“Doubt it not—the soldiers of the Beegum Mootee Mahul . . . are less hers than mine. I am myself the Bukshee . . . and her Sirdars are at my devotion.”—Walter Scott, The Surgeon’s Daughter, ch. xii.

1861.—“To the best of my memory he was accused of having done his best to urge the people of Dhar to rise against our Government, and several of the witnesses deposed to this effect; amongst them the Bukshi.”—Memo. on Dhar, by Major McMullen.

1874.—“Before the depositions were taken down, the gomasta of the planter drew aside the Bakshi, who is a police-officer next to the darogá.”—Govinda Samanta, ii. 235.

BUXERRY, s. A matchlock man; apparently used in much the same sense as Burkundauze (q.v.) now obsolete. We have not found this term excepting in documents pertaining to the middle decades of 18th century in Bengal; [but see references supplied by Mr. Irvine below;] nor have we found any satisfactory etymology. Buxo is in Port. a gun-barrel (Gerin. Buchse); which suggests some possible word buxeiro. There is however none such in Bluteau, who has, on the other hand, “Butgeros, an Indian term, artillery-men, &c.,” and quotes from Hist. Orient. iii. 7: “Butgeri sunt hi qui quinque tormentis praefficiuntur.” This does not throw much light. Bajjar, ‘thunderbolt,’ may have given vogue to a word in analogy to P. bark-andāz, ‘lightning-darter,’ but we find no such word. As an additional conjecture, however, we may suggest Baksāris, from the possible circumstance that such men were recruited in the country about Baksār (Buzar), i.e. the Shahābād district, which up to 1857 was a great recruiting ground for sepoy. [There can be no doubt that this last suggestion gives the correct origin of the word. Buchanan Hamilton, Eastern India, i. 471, describes the large number of men who joined the native army from this part of the country.]

[“Aḥshām—Bandūqchī-i-jangī—Baksariyah wa Bundelah Aḥshām, i.e. regular matchlock-men, Baksariyahs and Bundelahs.”—Dastūr-ul-ʿamal, written about 1690-1; B. Museum M.S., No. 1641, fol. 58b.]

1748.—“Ordered the Zemindars to send Buxerries to clear the boats and bring them up as Prisoners.”—Ft. William Cons., April, in Long, p. 6.

“We received a letter from . . . Council at Cossimbazar . . . advising of their having sent Ensign McKion with all the Military that were able to travel, 150 buxerries, 4 field pieces, and a large quantity of ammunition to Cutway.”—Ibid. p. 1.

1749.—“Having frequent reports of several straggling parties of this banditti plundering about this place, we on the 2d November ordered the Zemindars to entertain one hundred buxeries and fifty pike-men over and above what were then in pay for the protection of the outskirts of your Honor's town.”—Letter to Court, Jan. 13, Ibid. p. 21.

1755.—“Agreed, we despatch Lieutenant John Harding of a command of soldiers 25 Buxaries in order to clear these boats if stopped in their way to this place.”—Ibid. 55.

“In an account for this year we find among charges on behalf of William Wallis, Esq., Chief at Cossimbazar:

Rs.

“4 Buxeries . . . 20 (year) . 240.”

M.S. Records in India Office.

1761.—“The 5th they made their last effort with all the Sepoys and Buxerries they could assemble.”—In Long, 254.

“The number of Buxerries or matchlockmen was therefore augmented to 1500.”—Orme (reprint), ii. 59.

“In a few minutes they killed 6 buxerries.”—Ibid. 65; see also 279.

1772.—“Buckserrias. Foot soldiers whose common arms are only sword and target.”—Glossary in Grose's Voyage, 2nd ed. [This is copied, as Mr. Irvine shows, from the Glossary of 1757 prefixed to An Address to the Proprietors of E. I. Stock, in Holwell's Indian Tracts, 3rd ed., 1779.]

1788.—“Buxerries—Foot soldiers, whose common arms are swords and targets or spears.”—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale's).

1850.—“Another point to which Clive turned his attention . . . was the organization of an efficient native regular force. . . . Hitherto the native troops employed at Calcutta . . . designated Buxarries were nothing more than Burkundāz, armed and equipped in the usual native manner.”—Broome, Hist. of the Rise and Progress of the Bengal Army, i. 92.

BYDE, or BEDE HORSE, s. A note by Kirkpatrick to the passage below from Tippoo's Letters says Byde Horse are “the same as Pindārehs, Looties, and Kuzzāks” (see PINDARRY, LOOTY, COSSACK). In the Life of Hyder Ali by Hussain 'Ali Khān Kirmāni, tr. by Miles, we read that Hyder's Kuzzaks were under the command of “Ghazi Khan Bede.” But whether this leader was so called from leading the “Bede” Horse, or gave his name to them, does not appear. Miles has the highly intelligent note: ‘Bede is another name for (Kuzzak): Kirkpatrick supposed the word Bede meant infantry, which, I believe, it does not’ (p. 36). The quotation from the Life of Tippoo seems to indicate that it was the name of a caste. And we find in Sherring's Indian Tribes and Castes, among those of Mysore, mention of the Bedar as a tribe, probably of huntsmen, dark, tall, and warlike. Formerly many were employed as soldiers, and served in Hyder's wars (iii. 153; see also the same tribe in the S. Mahratta country, ii. 321). Assuming -ar to be a plural sign, we have here probably the "Bedes" who gave their name to these plundering horse. The Bedar are mentioned as one of the predatory classes of the peninsula, along with Marawars, Kallars, Ramūsis (see RAMOOSY), &c., in Sir Walter Elliot's paper (J. Ethnol. Soc., 1869, N.S. pp. 112-13). But more will be found regarding them in a paper by the late Gen. Briggs, the translator of Ferishta's Hist. (J. R. A. Soc. xiii.). Besides Bedar, Bednor (or Nagar) in Mysore seems to take its name from this tribe. [See Rice, Mysore, i. 255.]

1758.—" . . . The Cavalry of the Rao . . . received such a defeat from Hydur's Bedes or Kuzzaks that they fled and never looked behind them until they arrived at Goori Bundar."—Hist. of Hydur Naik, p. 120.

1785.—"Byde Horse, out of employ, have committed great excesses and depredations in the Sircar's dominions."—Letters of Tippoo Sultan, 6.

1802.—"The Kakur and Chapao horse . . . (Although these are included in the Bede tribe, they carry off the palm even from them in the arts of robbery) . . ."—H. of Tipu, by Hussein 'Ali Khan Kirmani, tr. by Miles, p. 76.

[BYLEE, s. A small two-wheeled vehicle drawn by two oxen. H. bahal, bahlī, bailī, which has no connection, as is generally supposed, with bail, 'an ox'; but is derived from the Skt. vah, 'to carry.' The bylee is used only for passengers, and a larger and more imposing vehicle of the same class is the Rut. There is a good drawing of a Panjab bylee in Kipling's Beast and Man (p. 117); also see the note on the quotation from Forbes under HACKERY.

[1841.—"A native bylee will usually produce, in gold and silver of great purity, ten times the weight of precious metals to be obtained from a general officer's equipage."—Society in India, i. 162.

[1854.—"Most of the party . . . were in a barouch, but the rich man himself [one of the Muttra Seths] still adheres to the primitive conveyance of a bylis, a thing like a footboard on two wheels, generally drawn by two oxen, but in which he drives a splendid pair of white horses, sitting cross-legged the while!"—Mrs Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, &c., ii. 205.]

O

CABAYA, s. This word, though of Asiatic origin, was perhaps introduced into India by the Portuguese, whose writers of the 16th century apply it to the surcoat or long tunic of muslin, which is one of the most common native garments of the better classes in India. The word seems to be one of those which the Portuguese had received in older times from the Arabic (kabā, 'a vesture'). From Dozy's remarks this would seem in Barbary to take the form kabāya. Whether from Arabic or from Portuguese, the word has been introduced into the Malay countries, and is in common use in Java for the light cotton surcoat worn by Europeans, both ladies and gentlemen, in dishabille. The word is not now used in India Proper, unless by the Portuguese. But it has become familiar in Dutch, from its use in Java. [Mr. Gray, in his notes to Pyrard (i. 372), thinks that the word was introduced before the time of the Portuguese, and remarks that kabaya in Ceylon means a coat or jacket worn by a European or native.]

c. 1540.—"There was in her an Ambassador who had brought Hidalcan [Idalcan] a very rich Cabaya . . . which he would not accept of, for that thereby he would not acknowledge himself subject to the Turk."—Cogan's Pinto, pp. 10-11.

1552.—" . . . he ordered him then to bestow a cabaya."—Castanheda, iv. 438. See also Stanley's Correa, 132.

1554.—"And moreover there are given to these Kings (Malabar Rajas) when they come to receive these allowances, to each of them a cabaya of silk, or of scarlet, of 4 cubits, and a cap or two, and two sheath-knives."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 26.

1572.—
"Luzem da fina purpura as cabayas, Lustram os pannos da tecida seda."

Camões, ii. 93.

"Cabaya de damasco rico e dino Da Tyria cor, entre elles estimada."

Ibid. 95.

In these two passages Burton translates caftan.

1585.—"The King is apparelled with a Cable made like a shirt tied with strings on one side."—R. Fitch, in Hakl., ii. 386.

1598.—"They wear sometimes when they go abroad a thinne cotton linnen gowne called Cabaia. . . ."—Linschoten, 70; [Hakl. Soc. i. 247].

c. 1610.—“Cette jaquette ou soutane, qu'ils appellent Libasse (P. libās, ‘clothing’) ou Cabaye, est de toile de Cotton fort fine et blanche, qui leur va jusqu'aux talons.”—Pyrard de Laval, i. 265; [Hak. Soc. i. 372].

[1614.—“The white Cabas which you have with you at Bantam would sell here.”—Foster, Letters, ii. 44.]

1645.—“Vne Cabaye qui est vne sorte de vestement comme vne large soutane couverte par le devant, à manches fort larges.”—Cardim, Rel. de la Prov. du Japon, 56.

1860.—“I afterwards understood that the dress they were wearing was a sort of native garment, which there in the country they call sarong or kabai, but I found it very unbecoming.”—Max Havelaar, 43. [There is some mistake here, sarong and Kabaya are quite different.]

1878.—“Over all this is worn (by Malay women) a long loose dressing-gown style of garment called the kabaya. This robe falls to the middle of the leg, and is fastened down the front with circular brooches.”—McNair, Perak, &c., 151.

CABOB, s. Ar.-H. kabāb. This word is used in Anglo-Indian households generically for roast meat. [It usually follows the name of the dish, e.g. murghi kabāb, ‘roast fowl’.] But specifically it is applied to the dish described in the quotations from Fryer and Ovington.

c. 1580.—“Altero modo . . . ipsam (carnem) in parva frustra dissectam, et veruculis ferreis acum modo infixam, super crates ferreas igne supposito positam torrefaciunt, quam succo limonum aspersam avidè esitant.”—Prosper Alpinus, Pt. i. 229.

1673.—“Cabob is Rostmeat on Skewers, cut in little round pieces no bigger than a Sixpence, and Ginger and Garlick put between each.”—Fryer, 404.

1689.—“Cabob, that is Beef or Mutton cut in small pieces, sprinkled with salt and pepper, and dipt with Oil and Garlick, which have been mixt together in a dish, and then roasted on a Spit, with sweet Herbs put between and stuff in them, and basted with Oil and Garlick all the while.”—Ovington, 397.

1814.—“I often partook with my Arabs of a dish common in Arabia called Kabob or Kab-ab, which is meat cut into small pieces and placed on thin skewers, alternately between slices of onion and green ginger, seasoned with pepper, salt, and Kian, fried in ghee, to be ate with rice and dholl.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 480; [2nd ed. ii. 82; in i. 315 he writes Kebabs].

CABOOK, s. This is the Ceylon term for the substance called in India Laterite (q.v.), and in Madras by the native name Moorum (q.v.). The word is perhaps the Port. cabouco or cavouco, ‘a quarry.’ It is not in Singh. Dictionaries. [Mr. Ferguson says that it is a corruption of the Port. pedras de cavouco, ‘quarry-stones,’ the last word being by a misapprehension applied to the stones themselves. The earliest instance of the use of the word he has met with occurs in the Travels of Dr. Aegidius Daalmans (1687-89), who describes kaphok stone as ‘like small pebbles lying in a hard clay, so that if a large square stone is allowed to lie for some time in the water, the clay dissolves and the pebbles fall in a heap together; but if this stone is laid in good mortar, so that the water cannot get at it, it does good service’ (J. As. Soc. Ceylon, x. 162). The word is not in the ordinary Singhalese Dicts., but A. Mendis Gunasekara in his Singhalese Grammar (1891), among words derived from the Port., gives kabuk-gal (cabouco), cabook (stone), ‘laterite.’]

1834.—“The soil varies in different situations on the Island. In the country round Colombo it consists of a strong red clay, or marl, called Cabook, mixed with sandy ferruginous particles.”—Ceylon Gazetteer, 33.

” “The houses are built with cabook, and neatly whitewashed with chunam.”—Ibid. 75.

1860.—“A peculiarity which is one of the first to strike a stranger who lands at Galle or Colombo is the bright red colour of the streets and roads . . . and the ubiquity of the fine red dust which penetrates every crevice and imparts its own tint to every neglected article. Natives resident in these localities are easily recognisable elsewhere by the general hue of their dress. This is occasioned by the prevalence . . . of laterite, or, as the Singhalese call it, cabook.”—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 17.

CABUL, CAUBOOL, &c., n.p. This name (Kābul) of the chief city of N. Afghanistan, now so familiar, is perhaps traceable in Ptolemy, who gives in that same region a people called Καβολῖται, and a city called Κάβουρα. Perhaps, however, one or both may be corroborated by the νάρδος Καβαλίτη of the Periplus. The accent of Kābul is most distinctly on the first and long syllable, but English mouths are very perverse in error here. Moore accents the last syllable :

“ . . . pomegranates full
Of melting sweetness, and the pears
And sunniest apples that Caubul
In all its thousand gardens bears.”

Light of the Harem.

Mr. Arnold does likewise in Sohrab and Rustam :

“ But as a troop of pedlars from Cabool, Cross underneath the Indian Caucasus. . . .”

It was told characteristically of the late Lord Ellenborough that, after his arrival in India, though for months he heard the name correctly spoken by his councillors and his staff, he persisted in calling it Cabool till he met Dost Mahommed Khan. After the interview the Governor-General announced as a new discovery, from the Amir's pronunciation, that Cabul was the correct form.

1552.—Barros calls it “a Cidade Cabol, Metropoli dos Mogoles.”—IV. vi. 1.

“ Ah Cabul ! word of woe and bitter shame ;
Where proud old England's flag, dis-honoured, sank Beneath the Crescent ; and the butcher knives
Beat down like reeds the bayonets that had flashed
From Plassey on to snow-capt Caucasus, In triumph through a hundred years of war.”

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

CACOULI, s. This occurs in the App. to the Journal d'Antoine Galland, at Constantinople in 1673 : “ Dragmes de Cacouli, drogue qu'on use dans le Cahue,” i.e. in coffee (ii. 206). This is Pers. Arab. kākula for Cardamom, as in the quotation from Garcia. We may remark that Kākula was a place somewhere on the Gulf of Siam, famous for its fine aloes-wood (see Ibn Batuta, iv. 240-44). And a bastard kind of Cardamom appears to be exported from Siam, Amomum xanthoides, Wal.

1563.—“O. Avicena gives a chapter on the cacullá, dividing it into the bigger and the less . . . calling one of them cacollá quebir, and the other cacollá ceguer [Ar. kabir, ṣayhūr], which is as much as to say greater cardamom and smaller cardamom.”—Garcia De O., f. 47r.

1759.—“These Vakeels . . . stated that the Rani (of Bednore) would pay a yearly sum of 100,000 *Hoon*s or Pagodas, besides a tribute of other valuable articles, such as Foful (betel), Dates, Sandal-wood, Kakul . . . black pepper, &c.”—Hist. of Hydr Naik, 133.

CADDY, s. i.e. tea-caddy. This is possibly, as Crawford suggests, from Catty (q.v.), and may have been originally applied to a small box containing a catty or two of tea. The suggestion is confirmed by this advertisement :

1792.—“By R. Henderson . . . A Quantity of Tea in Quarter Chests and Caddies, imported last season. . . .”—Madras Courier, Dec. 2.

CADET, s. (From Prov. capdet, and Low Lat. capitettum, [dim. of caput, ‘head’] Skeat). This word is of course by no means exclusively Anglo-Indian, but it was in exceptionally common and familiar use in India, as all young officers appointed to the Indian army went out to that country as cadets, and were only promoted to ensigncies and posted to regiments after their arrival—in olden days sometimes a considerable time after their arrival. In those days there was a building in Fort William known as the ‘Cadet Barrack’; and for some time early in last century the cadets after their arrival were sent to a sort of college at Baraset; a system which led to no good, and was speedily abolished.

1763.—“We should very gladly comply with your request for sending you young persons to be brought up as assistants in the Engineering branch, but as we find it extremely difficult to procure such, you will do well to employ any who have a talent that way among the cadets or others.”—Court's Letter, in Long, 290.

1769.—“Upon our leaving England, the cadets and writers used the great cabin promiscuously; but finding they were troublesome and quarrelsome, we brought a Bill into the house for their ejection.”—Life of Lord Teignmouth, i. 15.

1781.—“The Cadets of the end of the years 1771 and beginning of 1772 served in the country four years as Cadets and carried the musket all the time.”—Letter in Hicky's Bengal Gazette, Sept. 29.

CADJAN, s. Jav. and Malay kājānq, [or according to Mr. Skeat, kajānq], meaning ‘palm-leaves,’ especially those of the Nipa (q.v.) palm, dressed for thatching or matting. Favre's Dict. renders the word feuilles entrelacées. It has been introduced by foreigners into S. and W. India, where it is used in two senses :

a. Coco-palm leaves matted, the common substitute for thatch in S. India.

1673.—“ . . . flags especially in their Villages (by them called Cajans, being Co-coe-tree branches) upheld with some few sticks, supplying both Sides and Coverings to their Cottages.”—Fryer, 17. In his Explanatory Index Fryer gives ‘Cajan, a bough of a Toddy-tree.’

c. 1680.—“ Ex iis (foliis) quoque rudiores mattae, Cadjang vocatae, conficiuntur, quibus aedium muri et navium orae, quum frumentum aliquod in iis deponere velimus, obteguntur.”—Rumphius, i. 71.

1727.—“ We travelled 8 or 10 miles before we came to his (the Cananore Raja's) Palace, which was built with Twigs, and covered with Cadjans or Cocoa-nut Tree Leaves woven together.”—A. Hamilton, i: 296.

1809.—“ The lower classes (at Bombay) content themselves with small huts, mostly of clay, and roofed with cadjan.”—Maria Graham, 4.

1860.—“ Houses are timbered with its wood, and roofed with its plaited fronds, which under the name of cadjana, are likewise employed for constructing partitions and fences.”—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 126.

b. A strip of fan-palm leaf, i.e. either of the Talipot (q.v.) or of the Palmyra, prepared for writing on; and so a document written on such a strip. (See OLLAH.)

1716.—“ The President acquaints the Board that he has intercepted a villainous letter or Cajan.”—Ibid. ii. 231.

1839.—“ At Rajahmundry . . . the people used to sit in our reading room for hours, copying our books on their own little cadjan leaves.”—Letters from Madras, 275.

CADJOWA, s. [P. kajāwah]. A kind of frame or pannier, of which a pair are slung across a camel, sometimes made like litters to carry women or sick persons, sometimes to contain sundries of camp equipage.

1645.—“ He entered the town with 8 or 10 camels, the two Cajavas or Litters on each side of the Camel being close shut. . . . But instead of Women, he had put into every Cajava two Souldiers.”—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 61; [ed. Bull, i. 144].

1790.—“ The camel appropriated to the accommodation of passengers, carries two persons, who are lodged in a kind of pannier, laid loosely on the back of the animal. This pannier, termed in the Persic Kidjahwah, is a wooden frame, with the sides and bottom of netted cords, of about 3 feet long and 2 broad, and 2 in depth . . . the journey being usually made in the night-time, it becomes the only place of his rest. . . . Had I been even much accustomed to this manner of travelling, it must have been irksome; but a total want of practice made it excessively grievous.”—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 104-5.

CAEL, n.p. Properly Kāyal [Tam. kāyu, ‘to be hot’], ‘a lagoon’ or ‘back-water.’ Once a famous port near the extreme south of India at the mouth of the Tamraparni R., in the Gulf of Manaar, and on the coast of Tinnevely, now long abandoned. Two or three miles higher up the river lies the site of Korkai or Kolkui, the Κόλχοι ἐμπόριον of the Greeks, each port in succession having been destroyed by the retirement of the sea. Tutikorin, six miles N., may be considered the modern and humbler representative of those ancient marts; [see Stuart, Man. of Tinnevely, 38 seqq.].

1442.—“ The Coast, which includes Calicut with some neighbouring ports, and which extends as far as Kabel (read Kāyel) a place situated opposite the Island of Serendib. . . .”—Abdurrazzāk, in India in the XVth Cent., 19.

1444.—“ Ultra eas urbs est Cahila, qui locus margaritas . . . producit.”—Conti, in Poggius, De Var. Fortunae.

1514.—“ Passando oltre al Cavo Comedi (C. Comorin), sono gentili; e intra esso e Gael è dove si pesca le perle.”—Giov. da Empoli, 79.

1516.—“ Further along the coast is a city called Cael, which also belongs to the King of Coulam, peopled by Moors and Gentoos, great traders. It has a good harbour, whither come many ships of Malabar; others of Charamandel and Benguala.”—Barbosa, in Lisbon Coll., 357-8.

CAFFER, CAFFRE, COFFREE, &c., n.p. The word is properly the

Ar. Kafir, pl. Kofra, 'an infidel, an unbeliever in Islām.' As the Arabs applied this to Pagan negroes, among others, the Portuguese at an early date took it up in this sense, and our countrymen from them. A further appropriation in one direction has since made the name specifically that of the black tribes of South Africa, whom we now call, or till recently did call, Caffres. It was also applied in the Philippine Islands to the Papuas of N. Guinea, and the Alfuras of the Moluccas, brought into the slave-market.

In another direction the word has become a quasi-proper name of the (more or less) fair, and non-Mahomedan, tribes of Hindu-Kush, sometimes called more specifically the Sidh-posh or 'black-robed' Cafirs.

The term is often applied malevolently by Mahomedans to Christians, and this is probably the origin of the mistake pervading some of the early Portuguese narratives, especially the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, which described many of the Hindu and Indo-Chinese States as being Christian.*

[c. 1300.—"Kafir." See under LACK.]

c. 1404.—Of a people near China: "They were Christians after the manner of those of Cathay."—Clavijo by Markham, 141.

„ And of India: "The people of India are Christians, the Lord and most part of the people, after the manner of the Greeks; and among them also are other Christians who mark themselves with fire in the face, and their creed is different from that of the others; for those who thus mark themselves with fire are less esteemed than the others. And among them are Moors and Jews, but they are subject to the Christians."—Clavijo, (orig.) § cxxi.; comp. Markham, 153-4. Here we have (1) the confusion of Caffer and Christian; and (2) the confusion of Abyssinia (India Tertia or Middle India of some medieval writers) with India Proper.

c. 1470.—"The sea is infested with pirates, all of whom are Kofars, neither Christians nor Mussulmans; they pray to stone idols, and know not Christ."—Athan. Nitikin, in India in the XVth Cent., p. 11.

1552.—"... he learned that the whole people of the Island of S. Lourenço . . . were black Cafres with curly hair like those of Mozambique."—Barros, II. i. 1.

* Thus: "Chomanularia (i.e. Coromandel) he de Christãos e o rey Christão." So also Ceylam Camatarra, Melequa (Malacca), Peguo, &c., are all described as Christian states with Christian kings. Also the so-called Indian Christians who came on board Da Gama at Melinde seem to have been Hindu banians.

1563.—"In the year 1484 there came to Portugal the King of Benin, a Caffre by nation, and he became a Christian."—Stanley's Corren p. 8.

"Verão os Cafres asperos e avaros Tirar a linda dama seus vestidos."

[c. 1610.—"... a Christian whom they call Caparou."—Ibid., Hak. Soc. i. 261.]

1614.—"That knave Simon the Caffro, not what the writer took him for—he is a knave, and better lost than found."—Sainsbury, i. 356.

1653.—": : : toy mesme qui passe pour vn Kiaffer, ou homme sans Dieu, parmi les Mausulmans."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, 310 (ed. 1657).

c. 1665.—"It will appear in the sequel of this History, that the pretence used by Aureng-Zeb, his third Brother, to cut off his (Dara's) head, was that he was turned Kafer, that is to say, an Infidel, of no Religion, an Idolater."—Bernier, E. T. p. 3; [ed. Constable, p. 7].

1673.—"They show their Greatness by their number of Sumbroeroes and Cofferies, whereby it is dangerous to walk late."—Fryer, 74.

„ "Beggars of the Musslemen Cast, that if they see a Christian in good Clothes . . . are presently upon their Punctilios with God Almighty, and interrogate him, Why he suffers him to go afoot and in Rags, and this Coffery (Unbeliever) to vaunt it thus?"—Ibid. 91.

1678.—"The Justices of the Choultry to turn Padry Pasquall, a Popish Priest, out of town, not to return again, and if it proves to be true that he attempted to seduce Mr. Mohun's Coffre Franck from the Protestant religion."—Ft. St. Geo. Cons. in Notes and Exts., Pt. i. p. 72.

1759.—"Blacks, whites, Coffries, and even the natives of the country (Pegu) have not been exempted, but all universally have been subject to intermittent Fevers and Fluxes" (at Negrais).—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 124.

„ Among expenses of the Council at Calcutta in entertaining the Nabob we find "Purchasing a Coffre boy, Rs. 500."—In Long, 194.

1781.—"To be sold by Private Sale—Two Coffree Boys, who can play remarkably well on the French Horn, about 18 Years of Age: belonging to a Portuguese Paddrie lately deceased. For particulars apply to the Vicar of the Portuguese Church, Calcutta, March 17th, 1781."—The India Gazette or Public Advertiser, No. 19.

1781.—"Run away from his Master, a good-looking Coffree Boy, about 20 years old, and about 6 feet 7 inches in height. . . . When he went off he had a high toupie."—Ibid. Dec. 29.

1782.—"On Tuesday next will be sold three Coffree Boys, two of whom play the French Horn . . . a three-wheel'd Buggy, and a variety of other articles."—India Gazette, June 15.

1799.—"He (Tippoo) had given himself out as a Champion of the Faith, who was to drive the English Caffers out of India."—Letter in Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 221.

1800.—"The Caffre slaves, who had been introduced for the purpose of cultivating the lands, rose upon their masters, and seizing on the boats belonging to the island, effected their escape."—Symes, Embassy to Ava, p. 10.

c. 1866.—

"And if I were forty years younger, and my life before me to choose, I wouldn't be lectured by Kafirs, or swindled by fat Hindoos."

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

CAFILA, s. Arab. kāfila; a body or convoy of travellers, a Caravan (q.v.). Also used in some of the following quotations for a sea convoy.

1552.—"Those roads of which we speak are the general routes of the Cafilas, which are sometimes of 3,000 or 4,000 men . . . for the country is very perilous because of both hill-people and plain-people, who haunt the roads to rob travellers."—Barros, IV. vi. 1.

1596.—"The ships of Chatins (see CHETTY) of these parts are not to sail along the coast of Malavar or to the north except in a cafila, that they may come and go more securely, and not be cut off by the Malavars and other corsairs."—Proclamation of Goa Viceroy, in Archiv. Port. Or., fasc. iii. 661.

1623.—"Non navigammo di notte, perchè la cafila era molto grande, al mio parere di più di ducento vascelli."—P. della Valle, ii. 587; [and comp. Hak. Soc. i. 18].

1630.—". . . some of the Raiahs . . . making Outroades prey on the Caffaloes passing by the Way. . . ."—Lord, Banian's Religion, 81.

1672.—"Several times yearly numerous cafilas of merchant barques, collected in the Portuguese towns, traverse this channel (the Gulf of Cambay), and these always await the greater security of the full moon. It is also observed that the vessels which go through with this voyage should not be joined and fastened with iron, for so great is the abundance of loadstone in the bottom, that indubitably such vessels go to pieces and break up."—P. Vincenzo, 109. A curious survival of the old legend of the Loadstone Rocks.

1673.—". . . Time enough before the Caphalas out of the Country come with their Wares."—Fryer, 86.

1727.—"In Anno 1699, a pretty rich Caffila was robbed by a Band of 4 or 5000 villains . . . which struck Terror on all that had commerce at Tatta."—A. Hamilton, i. 116.

1867.—"It was a curious sight to see, as was seen in those days, a carriage enter one of the northern gates of Palermo preceded and followed by a large convoy of armed and mounted travellers, a kind of Kafila, that would have been more in place in the opening chapters of one of James's romances than in the latter half of the 19th century."—Quarterly Review, Jan., 101-2.

CAFIRISTAN, n.p. P. Kāfiristān, the country of Kāfirs, i.e. of the pagan tribes of the Hindu Kush noticed in the article Caffer.

c. 1514.—"In Cheghānsērāi there are neither grapes nor vineyards; but they bring the wines down the river from Kaferistān. . . . So prevalent is the use of wine among them that every Kafer has a khig, or leathern bottle of wine about his neck; they drink wine instead of water."—Autobiog. of Baber, p. 144.

1603.—". . . they fell in with a certain pilgrim and devotee, from whom they learned that at a distance of 30 days' journey there was a city called Capperstam, into which no Mahomedan was allowed to enter. . . ."—Journey of Beurd. Goës, in Cuthay, &c. ii. 554.

CAIMAL, s. A Nair chief; a word often occurring in the old Portuguese historians. It is Malayāl. kaimal.

1504.—"So they consulted with the Zamorin, and the Moors offered their agency to send and poison the wells at Cochin, so as to kill all the Portuguese, and also to send Nairs in disguise to kill any of our people that they found in the palm-woods, and away from the town. . . . And meanwhile the Mangate Caimal, and the Caimal of Primbalam, and the Caimal of Diamper, seeing that the Zamorin's affairs were going from bad to worse, and that the castles which the Italians were making were all wind and nonsense, that it was already August when ships might be arriving from Portugal . . . departed to their own estates with a multitude of their followers, and sent to the King of Cochin their ollas of allegiance."—Correa, i. 482.

1566.—" . . . certain lords bearing title, whom they call Caimals" (caimões).—Itimian de Goës, Chron. del Rei Dom Emmanuel, p. 49.

1606.—"The Malabars give the name of Caimals (Caimões) to certain great lords of vassals, who are with their governments haughty as kings; but most of them have confederation and alliance with some of the great kings, whom they stand bound to aid and defend . . ."—Joncau, f. 270.

"Ficário seus Caimais prezos e mortos."
Maluca Conquistada, v. 10.

CAIQUE, s. The small skiff used at Constantinople, Turkish kāik. Is it by accident, or by a radical connection through Turkish tribes on the Arctic shores of Siberia, that the Greenlander's kayak is so closely identical? [The Stanf. Dict. says that the latter word is Esquimaux, and recognises no connection with the former.]

CAJAN, s. This is a name given by Sprengel (Cajanus indicus), and by Linnæus (Cytisus cajan), to the leguminous shrub which gives dhall (q.v.). A kindred plant has been called Dolichos catjang, Willdenow. We do not know the origin of this name. The Cajan was introduced to America by the slave-traders from Africa. De Candolle finds it impossible to say whether its native region is India or Africa. (See DHALL, CALAVANCE.) [According to Mr. Skeat the word is Malay. poko'kuchang, 'the plant which gives beans,' quite a different word from kajang which gives us Cadjan.]

CAJEPUT, s. The name of a fragrant essential oil produced especially in Celebes and the neighbouring island of Bouro. A large quantity is exported from Singapore and Batavia. It is used most frequently as an external application, but also internally, especially (of late) in cases of cholera. The name is taken from the Malay kayu-putih, i.e. 'Lignum album.' Filet (see p. 140) gives six different trees as producing the oil, which is derived from the distillation of the leaves.

The chief of these trees is Melaleuca leucadendron, L., a tree diffused from the Malay Peninsula to N.S. Wales. The drug and tree were first described by Rumphius, who died 1693. (See Hanbury and Flückiger, 247 [and Wallace, Malay Arch., ed. 1890, p. 294].)

CAKSEN, s. This is Sea H. for Coxsackin (Roebuck).

CALALUZ, s. A kind of swift rowing vessel often mentioned by the Portuguese writers as used in the Indian Archipelago. We do not know the etymology, nor the exact character of the craft. [According to Mr. Skeat, the word is Jav. kelulus, kalulus, spelt keloeles by Klinkert, and explained by him as a kind of vessel. The word seems to be derived from loeloes, 'to go right through anything,' and thus the literal translation would be 'the threader,' the reference being, as in the case of most Malay boat names, to the special figure-head from which the boat was supposed to derive its whole character.]

1525.—"4 great lancharas, and 6 calaluzes and manchuus which row very fast."—Lembrança, 8.

1539.—"The King (of Achin) set forward with the greatest possible despatch, a great armament of 200 rowing vessels, of which the greater part were lancharas, jangas, and calaluzes, besides 15 high-sided junks."—F. M. Pinto, cap. xxxii.

1552.—"The King of Siam . . . ordered to be built a fleet of some 200 sail, almost all lancharas and calaluzes, which are rowing-vessels."—Barros, II. vi. 1.

1613.—"And having embarked with some companions in a caloluz or rowing vessel. . . ."—Godinho de Fregia, f. 51.

CALAMANDER WOOD, s. A beautiful kind of rose-wood got from a Ceylon tree (Diospyros quæsita). Tennent regards the name as a Dutch corruption of Coromandel wood (i. 118), and Drury, we see, calls one of the ebony-trees (D. melanoxylon) "Coromandel-ebony." Forbes Watson gives as Singhalese names of the wood Calumidiriya, Kalumederiye, &c., and the term Kalumadiriya is given with this meaning in Clough's Singh. Dict.; still in ~~abundant~~ information, it may remain doubtful if this be not a borrowed word. It may be worth while to observe that, according to Tavernier, [ed. Ball, ii. 4] the "painted calicoes" or "chites" of Masulipatam were called "Calmendar, that is to say, done with a pencil" (Kalam-ddr?), and possibly this appellation may have been given by traders to a delicately veined wood. [The N.E.D. suggests that the Singh. terms quoted above may be adaptations from the Dutch.]

1777.—"In the Cingalese language Calaminder is said to signify a black flaming tree. The heart, or woody part of it, is extremely handsome, with whitish or pale yellow and black or brown veins, streaks and waves."—Thunberg, iv. 205-6.

1813.—"Calaminder wood" appears among Ceylon products in Milburn, i. 345.

1825.—"A great deal of the furniture in Ceylon is made of ebony, as well as of the Calamander tree . . . which is become scarce from the improvident use formerly made of it."—Heber (1844), ii. 161.

1834.—"The forests in the neighbourhood afford timber of every kind (Calamander excepted)."—Chitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 198.

CALAMBAC, s. The finest kind of aloes-wood. Crawford gives the word as Javanese, kalambak, but it perhaps came with the article from Champa (q.v.).

1510.—"There are three sorts of aloes-wood. The first and most perfect sort is called Calampat."—Varthema, 235.

1516.—". . . It must be said that the very fine calembuco and the other eagle-wood is worth at Calicut 1000 maravedis the pound."—Barbosa, 204.

1539.—"This Ambassador, that was Brother-in-law to the King of the Batas . . . brought him a rich Present of Wood of Aloes, Calambaa, and 5 quintals of Benjamin in flowers."—F. M. Pinto, in Cogan's tr. p. 15 (orig. cap. xiii.).

1551.—(Campar, in Sumatra) "has nothing but forests which yield aloeswood, called in India Calambuco."—Castanheda, bk. iii. cap. 63, p. 218, quoted by Crawford, Des. Dic. 7.

1552.—"Past this kingdom of Camboja begins the other Kingdom called Campa (Champa), in the mountains of which grows the genuine aloes-wood, which the Moors of those parts call Calambuc."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

[c. 1590.—"Kalanbak (calembic) is the wood of a tree brought from Zirbad; it is heavy and full of veins. Some believe it to be the raw wood of aloes."—Ain, ed. Blochmann, i. 81.

[c. 1610.—"From this river (the Ganges) comes that excellent wood Calamba, which is believed to come from the Earthly Paradise."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 335.]

1613.—"And the Calamba is the most fragrant medulla of the said tree."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 15r.

[1615.—"Lumra (a black gum), gumlack, collomback."—Foster, Letters, iv. 87.]

1618.—"We opened the ij chistes which came from Syam with callamback and silk, and waid it out."—Cocks's Diary, ii. 51.

See EAGLE-WOOD and ALOES.

CALASH, s. French calèche, said by Littré to be a Slav word, [and so N.E.D.]. In Bayly's Dict. it is calash and caloche. [The N.E.D. does not recognise the latter form; the former is as early as 1679]. This seems to have been the earliest precursor of the buggy in Eastern settlements. Bayly defines it as 'a small open chariot.' The quotation below refers to Batavia, and the President in question was the Prest. of the English Factory at Chusan, who, with his council, had been expelled from China, and was halting at Batavia on his way to India.

1702.—"The Shabander riding home in his Calash this Morning, and seeing the President sitting without the door at his Lodgings, alighted and came and Sat with the President near an hour . . . what moved the Shabander to speak so plainly to the President thereof he knew not, But observed that the Shabander was in his Glasses at his first alighting from his Calash."—Progs. "Munday, 30th March," M.S. Report in India Office.

CALAVANCE, s. A kind of bean; acc. to the quotation from Osbeck, Dolichos sinensis. The word was once common in English use, but seems forgotten, unless still used at sea. Sir Joseph Hooker writes: "When I was in the Navy, haricot beans were in constant use as a substitute for potatoes and in Brazil and elsewhere, were called Calavances. I do not remember whether they were the seed of Phaseolus lunatus or vulgaris, or of Dolichos sinensis, alias Catjang" (see CAJAN). The word comes from the Span. garbanzos, which De Candolle mentions as Castilian for 'pois chiche,' or Cicer arietinum, and as used also in Basque under the form garbantzu,

1620.—". . . from hence they make their provition in abundance, viz. beefe and porke . . . garvances, or small peaze or beanes. . . ."—Cocks's Diary, ii. 311.

c. 1630.—". . . in their Canoes brought us . . . green pepper, caravance, Buffols, Hens, Eggs, and other things."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 350.

1719.—"I was forc'd to give them an extraordinary meal every day, either of Farina or calavances, which at once made a considerable consumption of our water and firing."—Shelvocke's Voyage, 62.

1738.—"But garvances are prepared in a different manner, neither do they grow soft like other pulse, by boiling. . . ."—Shaw's Travels, ed. 1757, p. 140.

1752.—". . . Callvances (Dolichos sinensis)."—Osbeck, i. 304.

1774.—"When I asked any of the men of Dory why they had no gardens of plantains and Kalavansas . . . I learnt . . . that the Haraforas supply them."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 109.

CALAY, s. Tin; also v., to tin copper vessels—H. kala'i karnd. The word is Ar. kala'i, 'tin,' which according to certain Arabic writers was so called from a mine in India called kala'. In spite of the different initial and terminal letters, it seems at least possible that the place meant was the same that the old Arab geographers called Kalah, near which they place mines of tin (al-kala'i), and which was certainly somewhere about the coast of Malacca, possibly, as has been suggested, at *Kadah or as we write it, Quedda. [See Āin, tr. Jarrett, iii 48.]

The tin produce of that region is well known. Kalang is indeed also a name of tin in Malay, which may have been the true origin of the word before us. It may be added that the small State of Salangor between Malacca and Perak was formerly known as Nagri-Kalang, or the 'Tin Country,' and that the place on the coast where the British Resident lives is called Klang (see Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 210, 215). The Portuguese have the forms calaim and calin, with the nasal termination so frequent in their Eastern borrowings. Bluteau explains calaim as 'Tin of India, finer than ours.' The old writers seem to have hesitated about the identity with tin, and the word is confounded in one quotation below with Tootnague (q.v.). The French use calin. In the P. version of the Book of Numbers (ch. xxxi. v. 22) kala'i is used for 'tin.' See on this word Quatremère in the Journal des Savans, Dec. 1846.

* It may be observed, however, that kwāla in Malay indicates the estuary of a navigable river, and denominates many small ports in the Malay region. The Kalah of the early Arabs is probably the Κῶλι πόλις of Ptolemy's Tables.

c. 920.—"Kalah is the focus of the trade in aloeswood, in camphor, in sandalwood, in ivory, in the lead which is called al-Kala'i."—Relation des Voyages, etc., i. 94.

c. 1154.—"Thence to the Isles of Lanki-āliūs is reckoned two days, and from the latter to the Island of Kalah 5. . . . There is in this last island an abundant mine of tin (al-Kala'i). The metal is very pure and brilliant."—Edrisi, by Jaubert, i. 80.

1552.—"—Tin, which the people of the country call Calem."—Castanheda, iii. 213. It is mentioned as a staple of Malacca in ii. 186.

1606.—"That all the chalices which were neither of gold, nor silver, nor of tin, nor of calaim, should be broken up and destroyed."—Gouvea, Synodo, f. 29b.

1610.—"They carry (to Hormuz) . . . clove, cinnamon, pepper, cardamom, ginger, mace, nutmeg, sugar, calayn, or tin."—Relaciones de P. Teixeira, 382.

c. 1610.—". . . money . . . not only of gold and silver, but also of another metal, which is called calin, which is white like tin, but harder, purer, and finer, and which is much used in the Indies."—Pyrard de Larul (1679) i. 164; [Hak. Soc. i. 234, with Gray's note].

1613.—"And he also reconnoitred all the sites of mines, of gold, silver, mercury, tin or calem, and iron and other metals . . ."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 58.

1726.—"The goods exported hither (from Pegu) are . . . Kalin (a metal coming very near silver) . . ."—Valentijn, v. 128.

1770.—"They send only one vessel (viz. the Dutch to Siam) which transports Javanese horses, and is freighted with sugar, spices, and linen; for which they receive in return calin, at 70 livres 100 weight."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 208.

1780.—". . . the port of Quedah; there is a trade for calin or tutenague . . ."

CALICUT.

and Spanish words, and the Italian calafattare, &c., with the Latin calefacere, a view which M. Marcel Devic rejects. The latter word would apply well enough to the process of pitching a vessel as practised in the Mediterranean, where we have seen the vessel careened over, and a great fire of thorns kindled under it to keep the pitch fluid. But caulking is not pitching; and when both form and meaning correspond so exactly, and when we know so many other marine terms in the Mediterranean to have been taken from the Arabic, there does not seem to be room for reasonable doubt in this case. The Emperor Michael V. (A.D. 1041) was called καλαφάρης, because he was the son of a caulker (see Ducange, Gloss. Graec., who quotes Zonaras).

1554. — (At Mozambique) . . . "To two calafattes . . . of the said brigantines, at the rate annually of 20,000 'reis each, with 9000 reis each for maintenance and 6 measures of millet to each, of which no count is taken."—Simão Botelho, Tombo, 11.

c. 1620. — "S'il estoit besoin de calfader le Vaisseau . . . on y auroit beaucoup de peine dans ce Port, principalement si on est contraint de se servir des Charpentiers et des Calfadeurs du Pays; parce qu'ils dependent tous du Gouverneur de Bombain."—Routier . . . des Indes Orient., par Aloix da Motta, in Thevenot's Collection.

CALUAT, s. This in some old travels is used for Ar. khilwat, 'privacy, a private interview' (C. P. Brown, MS.).

1404. — "And this Gardon they call Talicia, and in their tongue they call it Calbet."—Clavijo, § cix. Comp. Markham, 130.

[1670. — "Still deeper in the square is the third tent, called Caluet-Kane, the retired spot, or the place of the privy Council."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 361.]

1822. — "I must tell you what a good fellow the little Raja of Tallaca is. When I visited him we sat on two musnads without exchanging one single word, in a very respectable durbar; but the moment we retired to a Khilwat the Raja produced his Civil and Criminal Register, and his Minute of demands, collections and balances for the 1st quarter, and began explaining the state of his country as eagerly as a young Collector."—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 144.

1510. — "The said wood is fixed in the middle of the back of the malefactor, and passes through his body . . . this torture is called 'uncalvet.'"—Varthema, 147.

1582. — "The Capitaine General for to encourage them the more, commanded before them all to pitch a long staffe in the ground, the which was made sharp at ye one end. The same among the Malabars is called Calvete, upon ye which they do execute justice of death, unto the poorest or vilest people of the country."—Castañeda, tr. by N. L., ff. 142r, 143.

1606. — "The Queen marvelled much at the thing, and to content them she ordered the sorcerer to be delivered over for punishment, and to be set on the caloete, which is a very sharp stake fixed firmly in the ground . . ." &c.—Gouvea, f. 47v; see also f. 163.

CALYAN, n.p. The name of more than one city of fame in W. and S. India; Skt. Kalyāna, 'beautiful, noble, propitious.' One of these is the place still known as Kalyān, on the Ulas river, more usually called by the name of the city, 33 m. N.E. of Bombay. This is a very ancient port, and is probably the one mentioned by Cosmas below. It appears as the residence of a donor in an inscription on the Kanheri caves in Salsette (see Fergusson and Burgess, p. 349). Another Kalyāna was the capital of the Chalukyas of the Deccan in the 9th-12th centuries. This is in the Nizam's district of Naldrūg, about 40 miles E.N.E. of the fortress called by that name. A third Kalyāna was a port of Canara, between Mangalore and Kundapur, in lat. 13° 28' or thereabouts, on the same river as Bacanore (q.v.). [This is apparently the place which Tavernier (ed. Bull, ii. 206) calls Callian Bondi or Kalyān Bandar.] The quotations refer to the first Calyan.

c. A.D. 80-90. — "The local marts which occur in order after Barygaza are Akabaru, Suppara, Kalliona, a city which was raised to the rank of a regular mart in the time of Saraganes, but, since Sandanes became its master, its trade has been put under restrictions; for if Greek vessels, even by accident, enter its ports, a guard is put on board, and they are taken to Barygaza."—Periplus, § 52.

Prof. Forchhammer has lately described the great remains of a Pagoda and other buildings with inscriptions, near the city of Pegu, called Kalyāni.

CAMBAY, n.p. Written by Mahommedan writers Kanbāyat, sometimes Kinbāyat. According to Col. Tod, the original Hindu name was Khambavati, 'City of the Pillar'; [the Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. gives stambha-tirtha, 'sacred pillar pool']. Long a very famous port of Guzerat, at the head of the Gulf to which it gives its name. Under the Mahommedan Kings of Guzerat it was one of their chief residences, and they are often called Kings of Cambay. Cambay is still a feudatory State under a Nawab. The place is in decay, owing partly to the shoals, and the extraordinary rise and fall of the tides in the Gulf, impeding navigation. [See Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 313 seqq.].

c. 951.—"From Kambāya to the sea about 2 parasangs. From Kambāya to Súrabāya (?) about 4 days."—Istakhri, in Elliot, i. 30.

Butler had evidently read the stories of Mahmūd Bigara, Sultan of Guzerat, in Varthema or Purchas.

CAMBOJA, n.p. An ancient kingdom in the eastern part of Indo-China, once great and powerful: now fallen, and under the 'protectorate' of France, whose Saigon colony it adjoins. The name, like so many others of Indo-China since the days of Ptolemy, is of Skt. origin, being apparently a transfer of the name of a nation and country on the N.W. frontier of India, Kamboja, supposed to have been about the locality of Chitral or Kafiristan. Ignoring this, fantastic Chinese and other etymologies have been invented for the name. In the older Chinese annals (c. 1200 B.C.) this region had the name of Fu-nan; from the period after our era, when the kingdom of Cambodia had become powerful, it was known to the Chinese as Chin-la. Its power seems to have extended at one time westward, perhaps to the shores of the B. of Bengal. Ruins of extraordinary vastness and architectural elaboration are numerous, and have attracted great attention since M. Mouhot's visit in 1859; though they had been mentioned by 16th century missionaries, and some of the buildings when standing in splendour were described by a Chinese visitor at the end of the 13th century. The Cambojans proper call themselves Khmer, a name which seems to have given rise to singular confusions (see COMAR). The gum Gamboge (Cambodiam in the early records [Birdwood, Rep. on Old Rec., 27]) so familiar in use, derives its name from this country, the chief source of supply.

CAMEEZE, s. This word (kamis) is used in colloquial H. and Tamil for ‘a shirt.’ It comes from the Port. camisa. But that word is directly from the Arab kamis, ‘a tunic.’ Was St. Jerome’s Latin word an earlier loan from the Arabic, or the source of the Arabic word? probably the latter; [so N.E.D. s.v. Camise]. The Mod. Greek Dict. of Sophocles has καμίσιον. Camesa is, according to the Slang Dictionary, used in the cant of English thieves; and in more ancient slang it was made into ‘commission.’

c. 400.—“Solent militantes habere lineas quas Camisias vocant, sic aptas membris et adstrictas corporibus, ut expediti sint vel ad cursum, vel ad praelia . . . quocumque necessitas traxerit.”—Scti. Hieronymi Epist. (lxiv.) ad Fabiolam, § 11.

1404.—“And to the said Ruy Gonzalez he gave a big horse, an ambler, for they prize a horse that ambles, furnished with saddle and bridle, very well according to their fashion; and besides he gave him a camisa and an umbrella” (see SOMBRERO).—Clarijo, § lxxxix.; Markham, 100.

1498.—“That a very fine camysa, which in Portugal would be worth 300 reis, was given here for 2 fanons, which in that country is the equivalent of 30 reis, though the value of 30 reis is in that country no small matter.”—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 77.

1573.—“The richest of all (the shops in Fez) are where they sell camisas. . . .”—Marmol. Desc. General de Africa, Pt. I. Bk. iii. f. 87v.

CAMP, s. In the Madras Presidency [as well as in N. India] an official not at his headquarters is always addressed as ‘in Camp.’

CAMPHOR, s. There are three camphors:—

a. The Bornean and Sumatran camphor from Dryobalanops aromatica.

b. The camphor of China and Japan, from Cinnamomum Camphora. (These are the two chief camphors of commerce; the first immensely exceeding the second in market value: see Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. xi. Note 3.)

c. The camphor of Blumea balsamifera, D.C., produced and used in China under the name of ngai camphor.

The relative ratios of value in the Canton market may be roundly given as b, 1; c, 10; a, 80.

The first Western mention of this drug, as was pointed out by Messrs Hanbury and Flückiger, occurs in the Greek medical writer Aëtius (see below), but it probably came through the Arabs, as is indicated by the ph, or f of the Arab kāfūr, representing the Skt. karpūra. It has been suggested that the word was originally Javanese, in which language kāpūr appears to mean both ‘lime’ and ‘camphor.’

Moodeen Sheriff says that kāfūr is used (in Ind. Materia Medica) for ‘amber.’ Tābashīr (see TABASHEER), is, according to the same writer, called bāns-kāfūr ‘bamboo-camphor’; and ras-kāfūr (mercury-camphor) is an impure subchloride of mercury. According to the same authority, the varieties of camphor now met with in the bazars of S. India are—1. kāfūr-i-kāišūrī, which is in Tamil called pach'ch'ai (i.e. crude karuppuram; 2. Sūratī kāfūr; 3. chīnī; 4. batai (from the Batta country?). The first of these names is a curious instance of the perpetuation of a blunder, originating in the misreading of loose Arabic writing. The name is unquestionably fanšūrī, which carelessness as to points has converted into kāišūrī (as above, and in Blochmann's Aīn, i. 79). The camphor alfanšūrī is mentioned as early as by Avicenna, and by Marco Polo, and came from a place called Pansūr in Sumatra, perhaps the same as Barus, which has now long given its name to the costly Sumatran drug.

A curious notion of Ibn Bat

(iv. 241) that the camphor of Sumatra (and Borneo) was produced in the inside of a cane, filling the joints between knot and knot, may be explained by the statement of Barboes (p. 204), that the Borneo camphor as exported was packed in tubes of bamboo. This camphor is by Barboes and some other old writers called 'estable camphor' (da mangiare), because used in medicine and with betel.

Our form of the word seems to have come from the Sp. alcanfor and canfora, through the French camphre. Dozy points out that one Italian form retains the truer name cajura, and an old German one (Mid. High Germ.) is gaffer (Oesterl. 47).

The first of these is the fine Sumatran camphor; the second at $\frac{1}{11}$ of the price is China camphor.

CAMPOO, s. H. kampū, corr. of the English 'camp,' or more properly of the Port. 'campo.' It is used for 'a camp,' but formerly was specifically applied to the partially disciplined brigades under European commanders in the Mahratta service.

[1525.—Mr. Whitway notes that Castanheda (bk. vi. ch. cl. p. 217) and Barros (iii. 10, 3) speak of a ward of Malacca as Campu China; and de Eredia (1813) calls it Campou China, which may supply a link between Campo and Kampung. (See COMPOUND).

1803.—"Begum Sumroo's Campo has come up the ghauts, and I am afraid . . . joined Scindiah yesterday. Two deserters . . . declared that Pohlman's Campo was following it."—Wellington, ii. 264.

CANARA, n.p. Properly Kannada. This name has long been given to that part of the West coast which lies below the Ghauts, from Mt. Dely northward to the Goa territory; and now to the two British districts constituted out of that tract, viz. N. and S. Canara. This appropriation of the name, however, appears to be of European origin. The name, probably meaning 'black country' [Dravid. kar, 'black,' nda 'country'], from the black cotton so prevailing there, was properly synonymous with Karaditaka (see CARNATI) and apparently a corruption of the word. Our quotations show it throughout the sixteenth century term was applied to the country at the Ghauts, sometimes to the kingdom of Narasinga or Vijayan. (see BISNAGAR). Gradually, and probably owing to local application to Goa, where the natives seem to have been from the first known to Portuguese as Canarije, a term in the old Portuguese works means the Konkani people and language of Goa, the name became appropriated to the low country on the coast between Goa and Malabar, which was subject to the kingdom in question, much in the same way that the name Carnatic came at a later date to be misapplied on the other side of the Peninsula.

The Kanara or Canarese language is spoken over a large tract above the Ghauts, and as far north as Bidar (see Caldwell, Introd. p. 33). It is only one of several languages spoken in the British districts of Canara, and that only in a small portion, viz. near Kundāpur. Tulu is the chief language in the Southern District. Kanadam occurs in the great Tanjore inscription of the 11th century.

1516.—“Beyond this river commences the Kingdom of Narsinga, which contains five very large provinces, each with a language of its own. The first, which stretches along the coast to Malabar, is Tulinat (i.e. Tulu-nadu, or the modern district of S. Canara); another lies in the interior . . . ; another has the name of Telinga, which confines with the Kingdom of Orisa; another is Canari, in which is the great city of Bisnaga; and then the Kingdom of Charamendel, the language of which is Tamul.”—Barbosa. This passage is exceedingly corrupt, and the version (necessarily imperfect) is made up from three—viz. Stanley’s English, from a Sp. MS., Hak. Soc. p. 79; the Portuguese of the Lisbon Academy, p. 291; and Ramusio’s Italian (i. f. 299^v).

c. 1535.—“The last Kingdom of the First India is called the Province Canarim; it is bordered on one side by the Kingdom of Goa and by Anjadiva, and on the other side by Middle India or Malabar. In the interior is the King of Narsinga, who is chief of this country. The speech of those of Canarim is different from that of the Kingdom of Decan and of Goa.”—Portuguese Summary of Eastern Kingdoms, in Ramusio, i. f. 330.

1552.—“The third province is called Canará, also in the interior. . . .”—Castanheda, ii. 50.

And as applied to the language :—

1552.—“The whole coast that we speak of back to the Ghaut (Gate) mountain range . . . they call Concan, and the people properly Concanese (Conquerijs), though our people call them Canarese (Canarijs). . . . And as from the Ghauts to the sea on the west of the Decan all that strip is called Concan, so from the Ghauts to the sea on the west of Canará, always excepting that stretch of 46 leagues of which we have spoken [north of Mount Doly] which belongs to the same Canará, the strip which stretches to Cape Comorin is called Malabar.”—Barros, Dec. I. liv. ix. cap. 1.

1552.—“ . . . The Kingdom of Canará, which extends from the river called Gate, north of Chaul, to Cape Comorin (so far as concerns the interior region east of the Ghats) . . . and which in the east marches with the kingdom of Orisa; and the Gentoo Kings of this great Province of Canará were those from whom sprang the present Kings of Bisnaga.”—Ibid. Dec. II. liv. v. cap. 2.

“Aqui se enxerga lá do mar undoso
Hum monte alto, que corre longamente
Servindo ao Malabar de forte muro,
Com que do Canará vive seguro.”

Camões, vii. 21.

Englished by Burton :

“Here seen yonside where wavy waters play a range of mountains skirts the murmuring main serving the Malabar for mighty mure, who thus from him of Canará dwells secure.”

1598.—“The land itself is called Decan, and also Canara.”—Linschoten, 49; [Hak. Soc. i. 169].

1614.—“Its proper name is Charnathaca, which from corruption to corruption has come to be called Canara.”—Couto, Dec. VI. liv. v. cap. 5.

In the following quotations the term is applied, either inclusively or exclusively, to the territory which we now call Canara :—

1615.—“Canara. Thence to the Kingdom of the Cannarins, which is but a little one, and 5 dayes journey from Dumans. They are tall of stature, idle, for the most part, and therefore the greater thieves.”—De Monfart, p. 23.

1623.—“Having found a good opportunity, such as I desired, of getting out of Goa, and penetrating further into India, that is more to the south, to Canara. . . .”—P. della Valle, ii. 601; [Hak. Soc. ii. 168].

1672.—“The strip of land Canara, the inhabitants of which are called Canarins, is fruitful in rice and other food-stuffs.”—Baldaeus, 98. There is a good map in this work, which shows ‘Canara’ in the modern acceptation.

1672.—“Description of Canara and Journey to Goa.—This kingdom is one of the finest in India, all plain country near the sea, and even among the mountains all peopled.”—P. Vincenzo Maria, 420. Here the title seems used in the modern sense, but the same writer applies Canara to the whole Kingdom of Bisnagar.

1673.—“At Mirja the Protector of Canara came on board.”—Fryer (margin), p. 57.

1726.—“The Kingdom Canara (under which Onor, Batticala, and Garcopa are dependent) comprises all the western lands lying between Walkan (Konkan!) and Malabar, two great coast countries."—Valentijn, v. 2.

1727.—"The country of Canara is generally governed by a Lady, who keeps her Court at a Town called Baydour, two Days journey from the Sea."—A. Hamilton, i. 280.

CANARIN, n.p. This name is applied in some of the quotations under Canara to the people of the district now so called by us. But the Portuguese applied it to the (Konkani) people of Goa and their language. Thus a Konkani grammar, originally prepared about 1600 by the Jesuit, Thomas Estevão (Stephens, an Englishman), printed at Goa, 1640, bears the title Arte da Lingoa Canarin. (See A. B(urnell) in Ind. Antiq. ii. 98).

CANAUT, CONAUT, CON-NAUGHT, s. H. from Ar. kanāt, the side wall of a tent, or canvas enclosure. [See SURRAPURDA.]

c. 1660.—"And (what is hard enough to believe in Indostan, where the Grandees especially are so jealous . . .) I was so near to the wife of this Prince (Dara), that the cords of the Kanates . . . which enclosed them (for they had not so much as a poor tent), were fastened to the wheels of my chariot."—Bernier, E. T. 29; [ed. Constable, 89].

1792.—"They passed close to Tippoo's tents: the canaut (misprinted canaul) was standing, but the green tent had been removed."—T. Munro, in Life, iii. 73.

1793.—"The canaut of canvas . . . was painted of a beautiful sea-green colour."—Dirom, 230.

1817.—"A species of silk of which they make tents and kanauts."—Mill, ii. 201.

CANDAHAR, n.p. Kandahār. The application of this name is now exclusively to (a) the well-known city of Western Afghanistan, which is the object of so much political interest. But by the Ar. geographers of the 9th to 11th centuries the name is applied to (b) the country about Peshāwar, as the equivalent of the ancient Indian Gandhāra, and the Gandaritis of Strabo. Some think the name was transferred to (a) in consequence of a migration of the people of Gandhāra carrying with them the begging-pot of Buddha, believed by Sir H. Rawlinson to be identical with a large sacred vessel of stone preserved in a mosque of Candahar. Others think that Candahar may represent Alexandropolis in Arachosia. We find a third application of the name (c) in Ibn Batuta, as well as in earlier and later writers, to a former port on the east shore of the Gulf of Cambay, Ghandhar in the Broach District.

a.—1552.—"Those who go from Persia, from the kingdom of Hōraçam (Khorasan), from Bohāra, and all the Western Regions, travel to the city which the natives corruptly call Candar, instead of Scandar, the name by which the Persians call Alexander. . . ."—Barros, IV. vi. 1.

1664.—"All these great preparations give us cause to apprehend that, instead of going to Kachemire, we be not led to besiege that important city of Kandahar, which is the Frontier to Persia, Indostan, and Usbeck, and the Capital of an excellent Country."—Bernier, E. T., p. 113; [ed. Constable, 352].

c.—c. 1343.—"From Kinbāya (Cambay) we went to the town of Kāwi (Kānvi, or Cambay), on an estuary where the ti rises and falls . . . thence to Kandahār a considerable city belonging to the Infide and situated on an estuary from the sea.—Ibn Batuta, iv. 57-8.

1516.—“Further on . . . there is another place, in the mouth of a small river, which is called Guendari. . . . And it is a very good town, a seaport.”—Barboza, 64.

1814.—“Candhar, eighteen miles from the wells, is pleasantly situated on the banks of a river; and a place of considerable trade; being a great thoroughfare from the sea coast to the Gaut mountains.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 206; [2nd ed. i. 116].

CANDAREEN, s. In Malay, to which language the word apparently belongs, kandūrī. A term formerly applied to the hundredth of the Chinese ounce or weight, commonly called by the Malay name tūhil (see TÆL). Fryer (1673) gives the Chinese weights thus:—

- 1 Catlee is nearest 16 Taies
- 1 Teen (Taie!) is 10 Mass
- 1 Mass in Silver is 10 Quandreens
- 1 Quandreen is 10 Cash
- 733 Cash make 1 Royal
- 1 grain English weight is 2 cash.

1554.—“In Malacca the weight used for gold, musk, &c., the cate, contains 20 taels, each tael 16 mazes, each maz 20 cumduryns; also 1 paua 4 mazes, each maz 4 cupongs; each cupong 5 cumduryns.”—A. Nunes, 39.

1615.—“We bought 5 greates square postes of the Kinges master carpenter; cost 2 mas 6 condrins per peece.”—Cocks, i. 1.

(1) CANDY, n.p. A town in the hill country of Ceylon, which became the deposit of the sacred tooth of Buddha at the beginning of the 14th century, and was adopted as the native capital about 1592. Chitty says the name is unknown to the natives, who call the place Mahā nuvera, ‘great city.’ The name seems to have arisen out of some misapprehension by the Portuguese, which may be illustrated by the quotation from Valentijn.

c. 1530.—“And passing into the heart of the Island, there came to the Kingdom of Candia, a certain Friar Pascoal with two companions, who were well received by the King of the country Javira Bandar . . . in so much that he gave them a great piece of ground, and everything needful to build a church, and houses for them to dwell in.”—Couto, Dec. VI. liv. iv. cap. 7.

1552.—“. . . and at three or four places, like the passes of the Alps of Italy, one finds entrance within this circuit (of mountains) which forms a Kingdom called Cande.”—Barros, Dec. III. Liv. ii. cap. 1.

1645.—“Now then as soon as the Emperor was come to his Castle in Candi he gave order that the 600 captive Hollanders should be distributed throughout his country among the peasants, and in the City.”—J. J. Suar's 15-Jährige Kriegs-Dienst, 97.

1681.—“The First is the City of Candy, so generally called by the Christians, probably from Conde, which in the Chingulays Language signifies Hills, for among them it is situated, but by the Inhabitants called Hingodugul-neure, as much as to say ‘The City of the Chingulay people,’ and Mauneur, signifying the ‘Chief or Royal City.’”—R. Knor, p. 5.

1726.—“Candi, otherwise Candia, or named in Cingalees Conde Ouda, i.e. the high mountain country.”—Valentijn (Ceylon), 19.

(2) CANDY, s. A weight used in S. India, which may be stated roughly at about 500 lbs., but varying much in different parts. It corresponds broadly with the Arabian Bahar (q.v.), and was generally equivalent to 20 Maunds, varying therefore with the maund. The word is Mahr. and Tel. khandi, written in Tam. and Mal. kandī, or Mal. kanti, [and comes from the Skt. khand, ‘to divide.’ A Candy of land is supposed to be as much as will produce a candy of grain, approximately 75 acres]. The Portuguese write the word candil.

1563.—“A candil which amounts to 522 pounds” (arrateis).—Garcia, f. 55.

1598.—“One candiel (v.l. candiil) is little more or less than 14 bushels, wherewith they measure Rice, Corne, and all graine.”—Linschoten, 69; [Hak. Soc. i. 245].

1618.—“The Candee at this place (Batecala) containeth neere 500 pounds.”—W. Hore, in Purchas, i. 657.

1710.—“They advised that they have supplied Habib Khan with ten candy of country gunpowder.”—In Wheeler, ii. 136.

c. 1760.—Grose gives the Bombay candy as 20 maunds of 28 lbs. each = 560 lbs.; the Surat ditto as 20 maunds of 37½ lbs. = 746½ lbs.; the Anjengo ditto 560 lbs.; the Carwar ditto 575 lbs.; the Coromandel ditto at 500 lbs. &c.

(3) CANDY (SUGAR-). This name of crystallized sugar, though it came no doubt to Europe from the P.-Ar. kand (P. also shakar kand; Sp. azucar cande; It. candi and zucchero candito; Fr. sucre candi) is of Indian origin. There is a Skt. root khand, ‘to break,’ whence khandā, ‘broken,’ also applied in various compounds to granulated and candied sugar. But there is also Tam. kar-kanda, kala-kanda, Mal. kandī, kal-kandī, and kalkanti, which may have been the direct source of the P. and Ar. adoption of the word, and perhaps its original, from a Dravidian word = 'lump.' [The Dravidian terms mean 'stone-piece.']

A German writer, long within last century (as we learn from Mahn, quoted in Diez's Lexicon), appears to derive candy from Candia, "because most of the sugar which the Venetians imported was brought from that island"—a fact probably invented for the nonce. But the writer was the same wiseacre who (in the year 1829) characterised the book of Marco Polo as a "clumsily compiled ecclesiastical fiction disguised as a Book of Travels" (see Introduction to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. pp. 112-113).

c. 1343.—"A centinajo si vende gien-giovo, cannella, lacca, incenso, indaco . . . verzino scorzuto, zucchero . . . zuccherò candi . . . porcellane . . . costo . . ."—Pegolotti, p. 134.

c. 1596.—"White sugar candy (kandi safed) . . . 5½ dams per ser."—Āin, i. 63.

1627.—"Sugar Candie, or Stone Sugar."—Minshew, 2nd ed. s.v.

1727.—"The Trade they have to China is divided between them and Surat . . . the Gross of their own Cargo, which consists in Sugar, Sugar-candy, Allom, and some Drugs . . . are all for the Surat Market."—A. Hamilton, i. 371.

CANGUE, s, A square board, or portable pillory of wood, used in China as a punishment, or rather, as Dr. Wells Williams says, as a kind of censure, carrying no disgrace; strange as that seems to us, with whom the essence of the pillory is disgrace. The frame weighs up to 30 lbs., a weight limited by law. It is made to rest on the shoulders without chafing the neck, but so broad as to prevent the wearer from feeding himself. It is generally taken off at night (Giles, [and see Gray, China, i. 55 seqq.]).

The Cangue was introduced into China by the Tartar dynasty of Wei in the 5th century, and is first mentioned under A.D. 481. In the Kwang-yun (a Chin. Dict. published A.D. 1009) it is called kanggiai (modern mandarin hiang-hiai), i.e. 'Neck-fetter.' From this old form probably the Anamites have derived their word for it, gong, and the Cantonese k'ang-ka, 'to wear the Cangue,' a survival (as frequently happens in Chinese vernaculars) of an ancient term with a new orthography. It is probable that the Portuguese took the word from one of these latter forms, and associated it with their own canga, 'an ox-yoke,' or 'porter's yoke for carrying burdens.' [This view is rejected by the N.E.D. on the authority of Prof. Legge, and the word is regarded as derived from the Port. form given above. In reply to an enquiry, Prof. Giles writes: "I am entirely of opinion that the word is from the Port., and not from any Chinese term."] The thing is alluded to by F. M. Pinto and other early writers on China, who do not give it a name.

Something of this kind was in use in countries of Western Asia, called in P. doshāka (bilignum). And this word is applied to the Chinese cangue in one of our quotations. Doshāka, however, is explained in the lexicon Burhān-i-Kdti as 'a piece of timber with two branches placed on the neck of a criminal' (Quatremère, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 172, 173).

1420.—" . . . made the ambassadors come forward side by side with certain prisoners. . . . Some of these had a doshāka on their necks."—Shah Rukh's Mission to China, in Cathay, p. cciv.

[1525.—Castanheda (Bk. VI. ch. 71, p. 154) speaks of women who had come from Portugal in the ships without leave, being tied up in a caga and whipped.]

c. 1540.—" . . . Ordered us to be put in a horrid prison with fetters on our feet, manacles on our hands, and collars on our necks. . . ."—F. M. Pinto, (orig.) ch. lxxxiv.

1585.—"Also they doo lay on them a certaine covering of timber, wherein remaineth no more space of hollownesse than their bodies doth make: thus they are vsed that are condemned to death."—Mendoza (tr. by Parke, 1599), Hak. Soc. i. 117-118.

1696.—"He was imprisoned, congoed, tormented, but making friends with his Money . . . was cleared, and made Under-Customer. . . ."—Bowyer's Journal at Cochin China, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 81.

[1705.—"All the people were under confinement in separate houses and also in con-gass"—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxl.]

"I desir'd several Times to wait upon the Governour; but could not, he was so taken up with over-halling the Goods, that came from Pulo Condore, and weighing the Money, which was found to amount to 21,300 Tale. At last upon the 28th, I was obliged to appear as a Criminal in Congas, before the Governour and his Grand Council, attended with all the Slaves in the Congas."—Letter from Mr. James Conyngham, survivor of the Pulo Condore massacre, in Lockyer, p. 93. Lockyer adds: "I understood the Congas to be Thumbolts" (p. 95).

1727.—"With his neck in the congoes which are a pair of Stocks made of bamboo."—A. Hamilton, ii. 175.

1779.—"Ausmitôt on les mit tous trois en prison, des chaines aux pieds, une cangue au cou."—Lettres Edif. xxv. 427.

1797.—"The punishment of the cha, usually called by Europeans the cangue, is generally inflicted for petty crimes."—Staunton, Embassy, &c., ii. 492.

1878.—". . . frapper sur les joues à l'aide d'une petite lame de cuir; c'est, je crois, la seule correction infligée aux femmes, car je n'en ai jamais vu aucune porter la cangue."—Léon Roussel, A Travers la Chine, 124.

CANHAMEIRA, CONIMERE, [COONIMODE], n.p. Kanyimedu [or Kunimedu, Tam. kūni, 'humped,' medu, 'mound']; a place on the Coromandel coast, which was formerly the site of European factories (1682-1698) between Pondicherry and Madras, about 13 m. N. of the former.

1501.—In Amerigo Vespucci's letter from C. Verde to Lorenzo de' Medici, giving an account of the Portuguese discoveries in India, he mentions on the coast, before Mailepur, "Conimal."—In Baldelli-Boni, Introd. to Il Milione, p. liii.

1561.—"On this coast there is a place called Canhameira, where there are so many deer and wild cattle that if a man wants to buy 500 deer-skins, within eight days the blacks of the place will give him delivery, catching them in snares, and giving two or three skins for a fanam."—Correia, ii. 772.

1680.—"It is resolved to apply to the Soobidar of Sevagee's Country of Chengy for a Cowle to settle factories at Cooraboor (?) and Coonemerro, and also at Porto Novo, if desired."—Pt. St. Gen. Consols., 7th Jan., in Notes and Exts., No. iii. p. 44.

[1689.—"We therefore conclude it more safe and expedient that the Chief of Conimere . . . do go and visit Rama Raja."—In Wheeler, Early Rec., p. 97.]

1727.—"Connymere or Conjemeer is the next Place, where the English had a Factory many Years, but, on their purchasing Fort St. David, it was broken up. . . . At present its name is hardly seen in the Map of Trade."—A. Hamilton, i. 357.

1753.—"De Pondichéri, à Madras, la côte court en général nord-nord-est quelques degrés est. Le premier endroit de remarque est Congi-medu, vulgairement dit Congimer, à quatre lieues marines plus que moins de Pondichéri."—D'Anville, p. 123.

CANNANOBE, n.p. A port on the coast of northern Malabar, famous in the early Portuguese history, which still is the chief British military station on that coast, with a European regiment. The name is Kannūr Kannanūr, 'Krishna's Town.' [Madras Gloss. gives Mal. kannu, 'village,' i.e. 'beautiful village.')

c. 1506.—"In Cananor il suo Re zentil, e qui nasce zz. (i.e. zenzari, 'ginger') ma li zz. pochi e non cusi boni come quelli de Calcut."—Leonardo Ca' Masser, in Arch. Storico Ital., Append.

1510.—"Canonor is a fine and large town in which the King of Portugal has a strong castle. . . . This Canonor is a place at which horses which come from Persia disembark."—L'Arthemia, 123.

* * * * *

Fará que todo o Nayre em fim se mova Que entre Calcut jaz, e Cananor."

Camões, x.

By Burton:

"The Samorin shall summon fresh allies lo! at his bidding every Nayr-man his that dwells 'twixt Calcut and Cananor."

* * * * *

[1611.—"The old Nahuda Mahomed Cainnor goeth aboard in this boat."—Danvers, Letters, i. 95.]

CANONGO, s. P. kānūn-go, 'Law-utterer' (the first part being Arab. from Gr. κανών). In upper India, and formerly in Bengal, registrar of a tahsil, or other revenue subdivision, who receives the reports of the patwārīs, or village registrars.

1758.—"Add to this that the Connegoes were maintained at our expense as well as the Gomastahs and other servants belonging to the Zemindars, whose accounts we sent for."—Letter to Court, Dec. 31, 1758, Long, 157.

1765.—"I have to struggle with the difficulty that can be thrown in by my war ministers, mutsedies, congoes (!), &c., their dependents."—Letter from F. S. in Curraccioli's Life of Clive, i. 542.

CANTEROY, s. A gold coin formerly used in the S.E. part of Madras territory. It was worth 3 paces. Properly Kanthiravi hun (or pagoda from Kanthiravā Rāyā, 'the voiced,' [Skt. kantha, 'throat,' ra, 'noise'], who ruled in Mysore from 1638 to 1659 (C. P. Brown, MS.; [Mysore, i. 803]. See Dirom's Narrative, p. 279, where the revenues of territory taken from Tippoo in 1792 are stated in Canteray pagodas.

1790.—“The full collections amounted to five Crores and ninety-two lacks of Canteroy pagodas of 3 Rupees each.”—Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 237.

1800.—“Accounts are commonly kept in Canter'raia Palams, and in an imaginary money containing 10 of these, by the Muslims called chucrams [see CHUCKRUM], and by the English Canteroy Pagodas. . . .”—Buchanan's Mysore, i. 129.

CANTON, n.p. The great seaport of Southern China, the chief city of the Province of Kwang-tung, whence we take the name, through the Portuguese, whose older writers call it Cantão. The proper name of the city is Kwang-chau-fu. The Chin. name Kwang-tung (= ‘Broad East’) is an ellipsis for “capital of the E. Division of the Province Liang-Kwang (or ‘Two Broad Realms’).”—(Bp. Moule).

1516.—“So as this went on Fernão Peres arrived from Pacem with his cargo (of pepper), and having furnished himself with necessities set off on his voyage in June 1516 . . . they were 7 sail altogether, and they made their voyage with the aid of good pilots whom they had taken, and went without harming anybody touching at certain ports, most of which were subject to the King of China, who called himself the Son of God and Lord of the World. Fernão Peres arrived at the islands of China, and when he was seen there came an armed squadron of 12 junks, which in the season of navigation always cruized about, guarding the sea, to prevent the numerous pirates from attacking the ships. Fernão Peres knew about this from the pilots, and as it was late, and he could not double a certain island there, he anchored, sending word to his captains to have their guns ready for defence if the Chins desired to fight. Next day he made sail towards the island of Veniaga, which is 18 leagues from the city of Cantão. It is on that island that all the traders buy and sell, without licence from the rulers of the city. . . . And 3 leagues from that island of Veniaga is another island, where is posted the Admiral or Captain-Major of the Sea, who immediately on the arrival of strangers at the island of Veniaga reports to the rulers of Cantão, who they are, and what goods they bring or wish to buy; that the rulers may send orders what course to take.”—Correa, ii. 524.

c. 1535.—“. . . queste cose . . . vanno alla China con li lor giunchi, e a Camton, che è Città grande. . . .”—Sommario de' Regni, Ramusio, i. f. 337.

1585.—“The Chinos do vse in their pronunciation to terme their cities with this sylable, Fu, that is as much as to say, citie, as Taybin fu, Canton fu, and their townes with this syllable, Cheu.”—Mendoza, Parke's old E. T. (1588) Hak. Soc. i. 24.

1727.—“Canton or Quantung (as the Chinese express it) is the next maritime Province.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 217.

CANTONMENT, s. (Pron. Can-toonment, with accent on penult.). This English word has become almost appropriated as Anglo-Indian, being so constantly used in India, and so little used elsewhere. It is applied to military stations in India, built usually on a plan which is originally that of a standing camp or ‘cantonment.’

1783.—“I know not the full meaning of the word cantonment, and a camp this singular place cannot well be termed; it more resembles a large town, very many miles in circumference. The officers' bungalows on the banks of the Tappee are large and convenient,” &c.—Forbes, Letter in Or. Mem. describing the “Bengal Cantonments near Surat.” iv. 239.

1825.—“The fact, however, is certain . . . the cantonments at Lucknow, nay Calcutta itself, are abominably situated. I have heard the same of Madras; and now the lately-settled cantonment of Nusseerabad appears to be as objectionable as any of them.”—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 7.

1848.—“Her ladyship, our old acquaintance, is as much at home at Madras as at Brussels—in the cantonment as under the tents.”—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. 8.

CAPASS, s. The cotton plant and cotton-wool. H. kapis, from Skt. karpasa, which seems as if it must be the origin of κάρπασος, though the latter is applied to flax.

1753.—“. . . They cannot any way conceive the musters of 1738 to be a fit standard for judging by them of the cloth sent us this year, as the copass or country cotton has not been for these two years past under nine or ten rupees. . . .”—Fl. Wm. Cons., in Long, 40.

[1813.—“Guzerat cows are very fond of the capaussia, or cotton-seed.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 35.]

CAPEL, s. Malayāl. kappal, ‘a ship.’ This word has been imported into Malay, kāpal, and Javanese. [It appears to be still in use on the W. Coast; see Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. (2) 470.]

1498.—In the vocabulary of the language of Calicut given in the Roteiro de V. de Jamá we have—

1510.—“Some others which are made like ours, that is in the bottom, they call capel.”—Varthema, 154.

CAPELAN, n.p. This is a name which was given by several 16th-century travellers to the mountains in Burma from which the rubies purchased at Pegu were said to come; the idea of their distance, &c., being very vague. It is not in our power to say what name was intended. [It was perhaps Kyat-pyen.] The real position of the 'ruby-mines' is 60 or 70 m. N.E. of Mandalay. [See Ball's Tavernier, ii. 99, 465 seqq.]

1506.—“... e qui è uno porto appresso uno loco che si chiama Acaplen, dove li se trova molti rubini, e spinade, e zolie d'ogni sorte.”—Leonardo di Ca' Musser, p. 28.

1510.—“The sole merchandise of these people is jewels, that is, rubies, which come from another city called Capellan, which is distant from this (Pegu) 30 days' journey.”—Varthema, 218.

1516.—“Further inland than the said Kingdom of Ava, at five days journey to the south-east, is another city of Gentiles . . . called Capelan, and all round are likewise found many and excellent rubies, which they bring to sell at the city and fair of Ava, and which are better than those of Ava.”—Barbosa, 187.

c. 1535.—“This region of Arquam borders on the interior with the great mountain called Capelangam, where are many places inhabited by a not very civilised people. These carry musk and rubies to the great city of Ava, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Arquam. . . .”—Sommario de Regni, in Ramusio, i. 334c.

c. 1660.—“... A mountain 12 days journey or thereabouts, from Siren towards the North-east: the name whereof is Capelan. In this mine are found great quantities of Rubies.”—Tavernier (E. T.) ii. 143; [ed. Ball, ii. 99].

Phillip's Mineralogy (according to Col. Burney) mentions the locality of the ruby as “the Capelan mountains, sixty miles from Pegu, a city in Ceylon!”—(J. As. Soc. Bengal, ii. 75). This writer is certainly very loose in his geography, and Dana (ed. 1850) is not much better: “The best ruby sapphires occur in the Capelan mountains, near Syrian, a city of Pegu.”—Mineralogy, p. 222.

CAPUCAT, n.p. The name of a place on the sea near Calicut, mentioned by several old authors, but which has now disappeared from the maps, and probably no longer exists. The proper name is uncertain. [It is the little port of Kāppatt or Kappattangadi (Mal. kāval, ‘guard,’ pātu, ‘place,’) in the Cooroombranaud Taluka of the Malabar District. (Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 73). The Madras Gloss.

calls it Caupaud. Also see Gr. Pyrard, i. 360.]

1498.—In the Roteiro it is called Capu

1500.—“This being done the Captain-M (Pedralvares Cabral) made sail with the f sail and mizen, and went to the port Capocate which was attached to the city of Calicut, and was a haven where there was a great landing of vessels, where many ships were moored that were all engaged in the trade of Calicut. . . .”—Correa, i. 207.

1510.—“... another place called Cap gatto, which is also subject to the King of Calicut. This place has a very beautiful palace, built in the ancient style.”—Varthema, 133-134.

1516.—“Further on . . . is another town at which there is a small river, which is called Capucad, where there are many coun horn Moors, and much shipping.”—Barbosa, 152.

CARACOA, CARACOLLE, KARAKOLLEN, &c., s. Malay kōra-kōra, kāra-kāra, which is [either a transferred use of the Malay kāra-kāra or from the Ar. karkūr, pl. karākūr, ‘a large merchant vessel.’ Scott (Coracora), says: “In the absence of proof to the contrary, we may assume kōra-kōra to be native Malaya. Dozy (s.v. Caraca) says that the kāra-kāra was, among the Arabs, a merchant vessel, sometimes of very great size. Crawford describes the Malay kāra-kāra, as ‘a large kind of sailing vessel’; but the quotation from Jarric shows it to have been the Malay galley. Marre (Kata-kāra Malayou, 87) says: “The Malay kōra is a great row-boat; still in use in the Moluccas. Many measure 100 feet long and 10 wide. Some have as many as 90 rowers.”

c. 1330.—“We embarked on the sea in a big karkūra belonging to the Genoese people, the master of which was called Martalamin.”—Ibn Batuta, ii. 254.

1349.—“I took the sea on a small karkūra belonging to a Tunisian.”—Ibid. iv. 327.

1606.—“The foremost of these galleys or Caracolles recovered our Shippe, wherein was the King of Tarnata.”—Middleton's Voyage, E. 2.

1659.—“They (natives of Ceram, &c.) hawked these dry heads backwards and forwards in their korrekordes as a special rarity.”—Walter Schultzen's Ost-Indische Reise, &c., p. 41.

1711.—“Les Philippines nomment ces batimens caracoas. C'est vne espèce de petite galère à rames et à voiles.”—Lettres Edif. iv. 27.

1774.—“A corocoro is a vessel generally fitted with outriggers, having a high arched stem and stern, like the points of a half moon. . . . The Dutch have fleets of them at Amboyna, which they employ as guardacostas.”—Forrest, Voyage to N. Guinea, 23. Forrest has a plate of a corocoro, p. 64.

[1869.—“The boat was one of the kind called kora-kora, quite open, very low, and about four tons burden. It had out-riggers of bamboo, about five off each side, which supported a bamboo platform extending the whole length of the vessel. On the extreme outside of this sat the twenty rowers, while within was a convenient passage fore and aft. The middle of the boat was covered with a thatch-house, in which baggage and passengers are stowed; the gunwale was not more than a foot above water, and from the great side and top weight, and general clumsiness, these boats are dangerous in heavy weather, and are not infrequently lost.”—Wallace, Malay Arch., ed. 1890, p. 266.]

CARAFFE, s. Dozy shows that this word, which in English we use for a water-bottle, is of Arabic origin, and comes from the root gharaf, ‘to draw’ (water), through the Sp. garráfa. But the precise Arabic word is not in the dictionaries. (See under CARBOY.)

CARAMBOLA, s. The name given by various old writers on Western India to the beautiful acid fruit of the tree (N.O. Oxalideae) called by Linn. from this word, Averrhoa carambola. This name was that used by the Portuguese. De Orta tells us that it was the Malabar name. The word karanbal is also given by Molesworth as the Mahratti name; [another form is karambela, which comes from the Skt. karmara given below in the sense of ‘food-appetizer’]. In Upper India the fruit is called kamranga, kamrakh, or khamrak (Skt. karmara, karmāra, karmaraka, karmaranga).* (See also BLIMBEE.) Why a cannon at billiards should be called by the French carambolage we do not know. [If Mr. Ball be right, the fruit has a name, Cape-Gooseberry, in China which in India is used for the Tiparry.—Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 253.]

c. 1530.—“Another fruit is the Kermerik. It is fluted with five sides,” &c.—Erskine's Baber, 325.

1563.—“O. Antonia, pluck me from that tree a Carambola or two (for so they call them in Malavar, and we have adopted the Malavar name, because that was the first region where we got acquainted with them).

“A. Here they are.

“R. They are beautiful; a sort of sour-sweet, not very acid.

“O. They are called in Canarin and Decan camariz, and in Malay balimba. . . . they make with sugar a very pleasant conserve of these. . . . Antonia! bring hither a preserved carambola.”—Garcia, ff. 46^c, 47.

1598.—“There is another fruito called Carambolas, which hath 8 (5 really) corners, as bigge as a smal aple, sower in eating, like vnripe plums, and most vsed to make Conserues. (Note by Paludanus). The fruito which the Malabars and Portingales call Carambolas, is in Decan called Camarix, in Canar, Camarix and Carabeli; in Malaio, Bolumba, and by the Persians Chamaroch.”—Linschoten, 96; [Hak. Soc. ii. 33].

1672.—“The Carambola. . . as large as a pear, all sculptured (as it were) and divided into ribs, the ridges of which are not round but sharp, resembling the heads of those iron maces that were anciently in use.”—I. Vincenzo Maria, 352.

1878.—“... the oxalic Kamrak.”—In my Indian Garden, 50.

[1900.—“... that most curious of fruits, the carambola, called by the Chinese the yong-t'o, or foreign peach, though why this name should have been selected is a mystery, for when cut through, it looks like a star with five rays. By Europeans it is also known as the Cape gooseberry.”—Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. p. 253.]

CARAT, s. Arab kirrāt, which is taken from the Gr. κεράριον, a bean of the κεράρα or carob tree (Ceratonia siliqua, L.). This bean, like the Indian rati (see RUTTEE) was used as a weight, and thence also it gave name to a coin of account, if not actual. To discuss the carat fully would be a task of extreme complexity, and would occupy several pages.

Under the name of siliqua it was the 24th part of the golden solidus of Constantine, which was again = $\frac{1}{4}$ of an ounce. Hence this carat was = $\frac{1}{96}$ of an ounce. In the passage from St. Isidore quoted below, the cerates is distinct from the siliqua, and = $\frac{1}{12}$ siliquae. This we cannot explain, but the siliqua Graeca was the κεράτιον; and the siliqua as $\frac{1}{4}$ of a solidus is the parent of the carat in all its uses. [See Prof. Gardner, in Smith, Dict. Ant. 3rd ed. ii. 675.] Thus we find the carat at Constantinople in the 14th century = $\frac{1}{4}$ of the hyperpera or Greek bezant, which was a debased representative of the solidus; and at Alexandria $\frac{1}{4}$ of the Arabic dīndr, which was a purer representative of the solidus. And so, as the Roman uncia signified $\frac{1}{16}$ of any unit (compare ounce, inch), so to a certain extent carat came to signify $\frac{1}{4}$. Dictionaries give Arab. kīrrat as " $\frac{1}{4}$ of an ounce." Of this we do not know the evidence. The English Cyclopaedia (s.v.) again states that "the carat was originally the 24th part of the marc, or half-pound, among the French, from whom the word came." This sentence perhaps contains more than one error; but still both of these allegations exhibit the carat as $\frac{1}{4}$ th part. Among our goldsmiths the term is still used to measure the proportionate quality of gold; pure gold being put at 24 carats, gold with $\frac{1}{2}$ alloy at 22 carats, with $\frac{3}{4}$ alloy at 18 carats, &c. And the word seems also (like Anna, q.v.) sometimes to have been used to express a proportionate scale in other matters, as is illustrated by a curious passage in Marco Polo, quoted below.

The carat is also used as a weight for diamonds. As $\frac{1}{144}$ of an ounce troy this ought to make it $3\frac{1}{4}$ grains. But these carats really run $151\frac{1}{2}$ to the ounce troy, so that the diamond carat is $3\frac{1}{4}$ grs. nearly. This we presume was adopted direct from some foreign system in which the carat was $\frac{1}{144}$ of the local ounce. [See Ball, Tavernier, ii. 447.]

c. A.D. 636.—"Siliqua vigesima quarta pars solidi est, ab arboris semine vocabulum tenens. Cerates oboli pars media est siliquā habens unam semis. Hanc latinitas semiobulū vocat: Cerates autem Græce, Latino siliqua cornū interpretatur. Obulus siliquis tribus appenditur, habens cerates duos, calcos quatuor."—Isidori Hispalensis Opera (ed. Paris, 1601), p. 224.

1298.—"The Great Kaan sends his commissioners to the Province to select four or five hundred . . . of the most beautiful young women, according to the scale of beauty enjoined upon them. The commissioners . . . assemble all the girls of the province, in presence of appraisers appointed for the purpose. These carefully survey the points of each girl. . . . They will then set down some as estimated at 16 carats, some at 17, 18, 20, or more or less, according to the sum of the beauties or defects of each. And whatever standard the Great Kaan may have fixed for those that are to be brought to him, whether it be 20 carats or 21, the commissioners select the required number from those who have attained to that standard."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. i. 350-351.

1673.—"A stone of one Carrack is worth 10l."—Fryer, 214.

CARAVAN, s. P. karwān; a convoy of travellers. The Ar. kāfilā is more generally used in India. The word is found in French as early as the 13th century (Littre). A quotation below shows that the English transfer of the word to a wheeled conveyance for travellers (now for goods also) dates from the 17th century. The abbreviation van in this sense seems to have acquired rights as an English word, though the altogether analogous bus is still looked on as slang.

c. 1270.—"Meanwhile the convoy (la caravana) from Tortosa . . . armed seven vessels in such wise that any one of them could take a galley if it ran alongside."—Chronicle of James of Aragon, tr. by Foster, i. 379.

1627.—"At Band Ally we found a neat Carravansraw or Inne . . . built by mens charity, to give all civill passengers a resting place gratis; to keepe them from the injury of theeves, beasts, weather, &c."—Herbert, p. 124.

CARAVEL, s. This often occurs in the old Portuguese narratives. The word is alleged to be not Oriental, but Celtic, and connected in its origin with the old British coracle; see the quotation from Isidore of Seville, the indication of which we owe to Bluteau, s.v. The Portuguese caravel is described by the latter as a 'round vessel' (i.e. not long and sharp like a galley), with lateen sails, ordinarily of 200 tons burthen. The character of swiftness attributed to the caravel (see both Damian and Bacon below) has suggested to us whether the word has not come rather from the Persian Gulf—Turki karāwul, 'a scout, an outpost, a vanguard.' Doubtless there are difficulties. [The N.E.D. says that it is probably the dim. of Sp. caraba.] The word is found in the following passage, quoted from the Life of St. Nilus, who died c. 1000, a date hardly consistent with Turkish origin. But the Latin translation is by Cardinal Sirlet, c. 1550, and the word may have been changed or modified:—

"Cogitavit enim in unaquaque Calabriae regione perficere navigia. . . . Id autem non ferentes Russani cives . . . simul irruentes ac tumultuantes navigia combusserunt et eas quae Caravellae appellantur secuerunt."—In the Collection of Martene and Durand, vi. col. 930.

c. 1615.—"She may spare me her mizen and her bonnets; I am a carvel to her."—Beaum. & Fllet., Wit without Money, i. 1.

1883.—"The deep-sea fishing boats called Machoads . . . are carvel built, and now generally iron fastened. . . ."—Short Account of Bombay Fisheries, by D. G. Macdonald, M.D.

CARBOY, s. A large glass bottle holding several gallons, and generally covered with wicker-work, well known in England, where it is chiefly used to convey acids and corrosive liquids in bulk. Though it is not an Anglo-Indian word, it comes (in the form karāba) from Persia, as Wedgwood has pointed out. Kaempfer, whom we quote from his description of the wine trade at Shiraz, gives an exact etching of a carboy. Littré mentions that the late M. Mohl referred caraffe to the same original; but see that word. Karāba is no doubt connected with Ar. kirba, 'a large leathern milk-bottle.'

1712.—"Vasa vitrea, alia sunt majora, ampullacea et circumducto scirpo tunicata, quae vocant Karabā . . . Venit Karaba una apud vitriarios duobus mamudi, raro carius."—Kaempfer, Amoen. Exot. 379.

1754.—"I delivered a present to the Governor, consisting of oranges and lemons, with several sorts of dried fruits, and six karboys of Isfahan wine."—Hanway, i. 102.

1800.—"Six oorababs of rose-water."—Symes, Emb. to Ava, p. 488.

1813.—"Carboy of Rosewater. . . ."—Milburn, ii. 330.

1875.—"People who make it (Shiraz Wine) generally bottle it themselves, or else sell it in huge bottles called 'Kuraba' holding about a dozen quarts."—Macgregor, Journey through Khorassan, &c., 1879, i. 37.

CARCANA, CARCONNA, s. H. from P. kārkāna, 'a place where business is done'; a workshop; a departmental establishment such as that of the commissariat, or the artillery park, in the field.

1663.—"There are also found many raised Walks and Tents in sundry Places, that are the offices of several Officers. Besides these there are many great Halls that are called Kar-Kanays, or places where Handy-craftsmen do work."—Bernier, E. T. 83; [ed. Constable, 258].

c. 1756.—"In reply, Hydur pleaded his poverty . . . but he promised that as soon as he should have established his power, and had time to regulate his departments (Kārkānājāt), the amount should be paid."—Hussein Ali Khan, History of Hydur Naik, p. 87.

1800.—"The elephant belongs to the Kar-kana, but you may as well keep him till we meet."—Wellington, i. 144.

1804.—"If the (bullock) establishment should be formed, it should be in regular Karkanas."—Ibid. iii. 512.

CARCOON, s. Mahr. kārkūn, 'a clerk,' H.—P. kār-kun, (faciendorum factor) or 'manager.'

[c. 1590.—"In the same way as the kar-kun sets down the transactions of the assessments, the muḥaddam and the patiwāri shall keep their respective accounts."—Āin, tr. Jarrett, ii. 45.

[1615.—"Made means to the Corcone or Scrivano to help us to the copia of the King's licence."—Foster, Letters, iii. 122.

1826.—"My benefactor's chief carcoon or clerk allowed me to sort out and direct despatches to officers at a distance who belonged to the command of the great Sawant Rao."—Pandurung Hari, 21; [ed. 1873, i. 28.]

CARÉNS, n.p. Burnm. Ka-reng, [a word of which the meaning is very uncertain. It is said to mean 'dirty-feeders,' or 'low-caste people,' and it has been connected with the Kirdta tribe (see the question discussed by McMahon, The Karens of the Golden Chersonese, 43 seqq.)). A name applied to a group of non-Burmese tribes, settled in the forest and hill tracts of Pegu and the adjoining parts of Burma, from Mergui in the south, to beyond Toungoo in the north, and from Arakan to the Salwen, and beyond that river far into Siamese territory. They do not know the name Kareng, nor have they one name for their own race; distinguishing, among these whom we call Karens, three tribes, Sgaw, Pwo, and Bghai, which differ somewhat in customs and traditions, and especially in language. "The results of the labours among them of the American Baptist Mission have the appearance of being almost miraculous, and it is not going too far to state that the cessation of blood feuds, and the peaceable way in which the various tribes are living . . . and have lived together since they came under British rule, is far more due to the influence exercised over them by the missionaries than to the measures adopted by the English Government, beneficial as these doubtless have been" (Br. Burma Gazetteer, [ii. 226]). The author of this excellent work should not, however, have admitted the quotation of Dr. Mason's fanciful notion about the identity of Marco Polo's Carajan with Karen, which is totally groundless.

1759.—"There is another people in this country called Carianners, whiter than either (Burmans or Peguans), distinguished into Buragmah and Pegu Carianners; they live in the woods, in small Societies, of ten or twelve houses; are not wanting in industry, though it goes no further than to procure them an annual subsistence."—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 100.

1799.—"From this reverend father (V. Sangermano) I received much useful information. He told me of a singular description of people called Carayners or Carianers, that inhabit different parts of the country, particularly the western provinces of Dalla and Bassein, several societies of whom also dwell in the district adjacent to Rangoon. He represented them as a simple, innocent race, speaking a language distinct from that of the Burmans, and entertaining rude notions of religion. . . . They are timorous, honest, mild in their manners, and exceedingly hospitable to strangers."—Symes, 207

c. 1819.—"We must not omit here the Carian, a good and peaceable people, who live dispersed through the forests of Pegu, in small villages consisting of 4 or 5 houses . . . they are totally dependent upon the despotic government of the Burmese."—Sangermano, p. 34.

CARICAL, n.p. Etymology doubtful; Tam. Karakkal, [which is either kāra, 'masonry' or 'the plant, thorny webera': kāl, 'channel' (Madras Adm. Man. ii. 212, Gloss. s.v.)]. A French settlement within the limits of Tanjore district.

CARNATIO, n.p. Karnataka and Karṇāṭaka, Skt. adjective forms from Karṇā or Karṇāṭa, [Tam. kar, 'black,' nāṭu, 'country']. This word in native use, according to Bp. Caldwell, denoted the Telegu and Canarese people and their language, but in process of time became specially the appellation of the people speaking Canarese and their language (Drav. Gram. 2nd ed. Introd. p. 34). The Mahomedans on their arrival in S. India found a region which embraces Mysore and part of Telingāna (in fact the kingdom of Vijayanagara), called the Karṇāṭaka country, and this was identical in application (and probably in etymology) with the Canara country (q.v.) of the older Portuguese writers. The Karṇāṭaka became extended, especially in connection with the rule of the Nabobs of Arcot, who partially occupied the Vijayanagara territory, and were known as Nawābs of the Karṇāṭaka, to the country below the Ghats, on the eastern side of the Peninsula, just as the other form Canara had become extended to the country below the Western Ghats; and eventually among the English the term Carnatic came to be understood in a sense more or less restricted to the eastern low country, though never quite so absolutely as Canara has become restricted to the western low country. The term Carnatic is now obsolete.

c. A.D. 550.—In the Brhat-Saṃhitā of Varāhamihira, in the enumeration of peoples and regions of the south, we have in Kern's translation (J. R. As. Soc. N.S. v. 63) Karnatic; the original form, which is not given by Kern, is Karṇāṭa.

c. A.D. 1100.—In the later Sanskrit literature this name often occurs, e.g. in the Kathasarasagara, or 'Ocean of Rivers of Stories,' a collection of tales (in verse) of the beginning of the 12th century, by Somadeva, of Kashmir; but it is not possible to attach any very precise meaning to the word as there used. [See refs. in Tawney, tr. ii. 651.]

A.D. 1400.—The word also occurs in the inscriptions of the Vijayanagara dynasty, e.g. in one of A.D. 1400.—(Elem. of S. Indian Palaeography, 2nd ed. pl. xxx.)

1608.—"In the land of Karṇāṭa and Vidyānagara was the King Mahendra."—Taranatha's H. of Buddhism, by Schiefner, p. 267.

c. 1610.—"The Zamindars of Singaldip (Ceylon) and Karṇāṭak came up with their forces and expelled Sheo Rai, the ruler of the Dakhin."—Firishta, in Elliot, vi. 549.

1614.—See quotation from Couto under CANARA.

c. 1652.—"Gandiot is one of the strongest Cities in the Kingdom of Carnatic."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 98; [ed. Bell, i. 284].

c. 1660.—"The Rāis of the Karṇāṭik, Mahratta (country), and Telingana, were subject to the Rāi of Bidar."—Amal-i-Sālik, in Elliot vii. 126.

1673.—"I received this information from the natives, that the Canatick country reaches from Gongola to the Zamerhin's Country of the Malabars along the Sea, and inland up to the Pepper Mountains of Senda . . . Badmure, four Days Journey hence, is the Capital City."—Fryer, 162, in Letter IV., A Relation of the Canatick Country.—Here he identifies the "Canatick" with Canara below the Ghats.

So also the coast of Canara seems meant in the following:—

c. 1760.—"Though the navigation from the Carnatic coast to Bombay is of a very short run, of not above six or seven degrees. . . ."—(Grose, i. 232.)

"The Carnatic or province of Arcot . . . its limits now are greatly inferior to those which bounded the ancient Carnatic; for the Nabobs of Arcot have never extended their authority beyond the river Gondegama to the north; the great chain of mountains to the west; and the branches of the Kingdom of Trichinopoly, Tanjore, and Maissore to the south; the sea bounds it on the east."—Ibid. II. vii.

1762.—"Sivaoe Madhoo Rao . . . with this immense force . . . made an incursion into the Karnatic Balaghaut."—Hussein Ali Khan, History of Hydur Naik, 148.

1792.—"I hope that our acquisitions by this peace will give so much additional strength and compactness to the frontier of our possessions, both in the Carnatic, and on the coast of Malabar, as to render it difficult for any power above the Ghauts to invade us."—Lord Cornwallis's Despatch from Seringapatam, in Seton-Karr, ii. 96.

1826.—"Camp near Chillumbrum (Carnatic), March 21st." This date of a letter of Bp. Heber's is probably one of the latest instances of the use of the term in a natural way.

(1). CARRACK, n.p. An island in the upper part of the Persian Gulf, which has been more than once in British occupation. Properly Khārak. It is so written in Jaubert's Edrisi (i. 364, 372). But Dr. Badger gives the modern Arabic as el-Khārij, which would represent old P. Khārig.

c. 830.—"Kharek . . . cette isle qui a un farsakh en long et en large, produit du blé, des palmiers, et des vignes."—Ibn Khurdādhba, in J. As. ser. vi. tom. v. 283.

c. 1563.—"Partendosi da Basora si passa 200 miglia di Golfo co'l mare a banda destra sino che si giunge nell' isola di Carichi . . ."—C. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 386v.

1727.—"The Islands of Carrick ly, about West North West, 12 Leagues from Bowchier."—A. Hamilton, i. 90.

1758.—"The Baron . . . immediately sailed for the little island of Karec, where he safely landed; having attentively surveyed the spot he at that time laid the plan, which he afterwards executed with so much success."—Ives, 212.

(2). CARRACK, s. A kind of vessel of burden from the Middle Ages down to the end of the 17th century. The character of the earlier carrack cannot be precisely defined. But the larger cargo-ships of the Portuguese in the trade of the 16th century were generally so styled, and these were sometimes of enormous tonnage, with 3 or 4 decks. Charnock (Marine Architecture, ii. p. 9) has a plate of a Genoese carrack of 1542. He also quotes the description of a Portuguese carrack taken by Sir John Barrough in 1592. It was of 1,600 tons burden, whereof 900 merchandize; carried 32 brass pieces and between 600 and 700 passengers (?); was built with 7 decks. The word (L. Lat.)

carraca is regarded by Skeat as properly carrica, from carricare, It. caricare, 'to lade, to charge.' This is possible; but it would be well to examine if it be not from the Ar. ḥardakah, a word which the dictionaries explain as 'fire-ship'; though this is certainly not always the meaning. Dozy is inclined to derive carraca (which is old in Sp. he says) from karakir, the pl. of kurkūr or kurkūra (see CARACOA). And kurkūra itself he thinks may have come from carricare, which already occurs in St. Jerome. So that Mr. Skeat's origin is possibly correct. [The N.E.D. refers to carraca, of which the origin is said to be uncertain.] Ibn Batuta uses the word twice at least for a state barge or something of that kind (see Cathay p. 499, and Ibn Bat. ii. 116; iv. 289). The like use occurs several times in Makrizi (e.g. I. i. 143; I. ii. 66; and II. i. 24). Quatremère at the place first quoted observes that the ḥardakah was not a fire ship in our sense, but a vessel with a high deck from which fire could be thrown; but that it could also be used as a transport vessel, and was so used on sea and land.

1383.—"Eodem tempore venit in magnā tempestate ad Sandevici portum navis quam dicunt carika (mirae) magnitudinis, plena divitiis, quae facile inopiam totius terrae relevare potuisset, si incolarum invidia permisisset."—T. Walsingham, Hist. Anglic., by H. T. Riley, 1864, ii. 83-84.

1403.—"The prayer being concluded, and the storm still going on, a light like a candle appeared in the cage at the mast-head of the carraca, and another light on the spar that they call bowsprit (bauprés) which is fixed in the forecastle; and another light like a candle in una vara de espinelo (?) over the poop, and these lights were seen by as many as were in the carrack, and were called up to see them, and they lasted awhile and then disappeared, and all this while the storm did not cease, and by-and-by all went to sleep except the steersman and certain sailors of the watch."—Clavijs, § xiii. Comp. Markham, p. 13.

1552.—"Ils avaient 4 barques, grandes comme des karraḳa. . ."—Sidi 'Alī, p. 87.

1566-68.—“. . . about the middle of the month of Ramazan, in the year 974, the inhabitants of Funan and Fandreeah [i.e. Ponany and Pandarāni, q.v.], having sailed out of the former of these ports in a fleet of 12 grabs, captured a caracca belonging to the Franks, which had arrived from Bengal, and which was laden with rice and sugar . . . in the year 976 another party . . . in a fleet of 17 grabs . . . made capture off Shaleeat (see CHALIA) of a large caracca, which had sailed from Cochin, having on board nearly 1,000 Franks. . . .”—Tokfut-ul-Mujahideen, p. 159.

1596.—“It comes as farre short as . . . a cocke-boate of a Carrick.”—T. Nash, Have with you to Saffron Walden, repr. by J. P. Collier, p. 72.

1613.—“They are made like carracks, only strength and storage.”—Beaum. & Flet., The Coxcomb, i. 3.

1615.—“After we had given her chase for about 5 hours, her colours and bulk discovered her to be a very great Portugal carrack bound for Goa.”—Terry, in Purchas; [ed. 1777, p. 34].

1620.—“The harbor at Nangasaque is the best in all Japon, wheare there may be 1000 seale of shippes ride landlockt, and the greatest shippes or carickes in the world . . . ride before the towne within a cable's length of the shore in 7 or 8 fathom water at least.”—Cocks, Letter to Batavia, ii. 313.

c. 1620.—“Il faut attendre là des Pilotes du lieu, que les Gouverneurs de Bombaim et de Marsagão ont soin d'envoyer tout à l'heure, pour conduire le Vaisseau à Turumba [i.e. Trombay] où les Caraques ont coutume d'hiverner.”—Routier . . . des Indes Or., by Aleixo da Motta, in Thevenot.

c. 1635.—
“The bigger Whale, like some huge carrack lay Which wanted Sea room for her foes to play. . . .”

Waller, Battle of the Summer Islands.

1653.—“. . . pour moy il me vouloit loger en son Palais, et que si i'auois la volonté de retourner a Lisbonne par mer, il me feroit embarquer sur les premieres Karaques. . . .”—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 213.

1660.—“And further, That every Merchant Denizen who shall hereafter ship any Goods or Merchandize in any Carrack or Galley shall pay to your Majesty all manner of Customs, and all the Subsidies aforesaid, as any Alien born out of the Realm.”—Act 12 Car. II. cap. iv. s. iv. (Tonnage and Poundage).

c. 1680.—“To this City of the floating . . . which foreigners, with a little variation from carroços, call carracas.”—Vieira, quoted by Bluteau.

1684.—“. . . there was a Carack of Portugal cast away upon the Reef having on board at that Time 4,000,000 of Guilders in Gold . . . a present from the King of Siam to the King of Portugal.”—Conoley, 32, in Dampier's Voyages, iv.

CARRAWAY, s. This word for the seed of Carum carui, L., is (probably through Sp. alcaravea) from the Arabic karawiyd. It is curious that the English form is thus closer to the Arabic than either the Spanish, or the French and Italian carvi, which last has passed into Scotch as carry. But the Arabic itself is a corruption [not immediately, N.E.D.] of Lat. careum, or Gr. κάρου (Dozy).

CARTMEEL, s. This is, at least in the Punjab, the ordinary form that ‘mail-cart’ takes among the natives. Such inversions are not uncommon. Thus Sir David Ochterlony was always called by the Sepoys Loni-okhtar. In our memory an officer named Holroyd was always called by the Sepoys Roydāl, [and Brownlow, Lobrūn. By another curious corruption Mackintosh becomes Makkhani-tosh, ‘battered toast’!]

CARTOOCE, s. A cartridge; kārtūs, Sepoy H.; [comp. TOSTDAUN].

CARYOTA, s. This is the botanical name (Caryota urens, L.) of a magnificent palm growing in the moister forest regions, as in the Western Ghauts and in Eastern Bengal, in Ceylon, and in Burma. A conspicuous character is presented by its enormous bipinnate leaves, somewhat resembling colossal bracken-fronds, 15 to 25 feet long, 10 to 12 in width; also by the huge pendent clusters of its inflorescence and seeds, the latter like masses of rosaries 10 feet long and upwards. It affords much Toddy (q.v.) made into spirit and sugar, and is the tree chiefly affording these products in Ceylon, where it is called Kitul. It also affords a kind of sago, and a woolly substance found at the foot of the leaf-stalks is sometimes used for caulking, and forms a good tinder. The sp. name urens is derived from the acrid, burning taste of the fruit. It is called, according to Brandis, the Mhār-palm in Western India. We know of no Hindustani or familiar Anglo-Indian name. [Watt, (Econ. Dict. ii. 206) says that it is known in Bombay as the Hill or Sago palm. It has penetrated in Upper India as far as Chunār.] The name Caryota seems taken from Pliny, but his application is to a kind of date-palm; his statement that it afforded the best wine the East probably suggested the transfer.

c. A.D. 70.—“Ab his caryotae maxime celebrantur, et cibo quidem et suco uberimae, ex quibus praecipua vina orienti, iniqua capiti, unde pomo nomen.”—Pliny, xiii. § 9.

1681.—“The next tree is the Kettule. It groweth straight, but not so tall or big as a Coker-Nut-Tree; the inside nothing but a white pith, as the former. It yieldeth a sort of Liquor . . . very sweet and pleasing to the Pallate. . . . The which Liquor they boyl and make a kind of brown sugar called Jaggory [see JAGGERY], &c.”—Knox, p. 15.

1777.—“The Caryota urens, called the Sager tree, grew between Salatiga and Kopping, and was said to be the real tree from which sago is made.”—Thunberg, E. T. iv. 149. A mistake, however.

1861.—See quotation under PEEPUL.

CASH, s. A name applied by Europeans to sundry coins of low value in various parts of the Indies. The word in its original form is of extreme antiquity, “Skt. karsha . . . a weight of silver or gold equal to $\frac{1}{100}$ of a Tula” (Williams, Skt. Dict.; and see also a Note on the Kārsha, or rather kārshāpana, as a copper coin of great antiquity, in E. Thomas's Pathān Kings of Delhi, 361-362). From the Tam. form kāsu, or perhaps from some Konkani form which we have not traced, the Portuguese seem to have made caixa, whence the English cash. In Singalese also kāsi is used for ‘coin’ in general. The English term was appropriated in the monetary system which prevailed in S. India up to 1818; thus there was a copper coin for use in Madras struck in England in 1803, which bears on the reverse, “XX Cash.” A figure of this coin is given in Ruding. Under this system 80 cash = 1 fanam, 42 fanams = 1 star pagoda. But from an early date the Portuguese had applied caixa to the small money of foreign systems, such as those of the Malay Islands, and especially to that of the Chinese. In China the word cash is used, by Europeans and their hangers-on, as the synonym of the Chinese le and tsien, which are those coins made of an alloy of copper and lead with a square hole in the middle, which in former days ran 1000 to the liang or tael (q.v.), and which are strung in certain numbers on cords. [This type of money, as was recently pointed out by Lord Avebury, is a survival of the primitive currency, which was in the shape of an axe.] Rouleaux of coin thus strung are represented on the surviving bank-notes of the Ming dynasty (A.D. 1368 onwards), and probably were also on the notes of their Mongol predecessors.

The existence of the distinct English word cash may probably have affected the form of the corruption before us. This word had a European origin from It. cassa, French caisse, ‘the money-chest’: this word in book-keeping having given name to the heading of account under which actual disbursements of coin were entered (see Wedgwood and N.E.D. s.v.). In Minshew (2nd ed. 1627) the present sense of the word is not attained. He only gives “a tradesman’s Cash, or Counter to keepe money in.”

1510.—“They have also another coin called cas, 16 of which go to a tare of silver.”—Varthema, 130.

” “In this country (Calicut) a great number of apes are produced, one of which is worth 4 cas, and one cas is worth a quattrino.”—Ibid. 172. (Why a monkey should be worth 4 cas is obscure.)

1598.—“You must understand that in Sunda there is also no other kind of money than certaine copper mynt called Caixa, of the bignes of a Hollādes doite, but not half so thicke, in the middle whereof is a hole to hang it on a string, for that commonlie they put two hundreth or a thousand vpon one string.”—Lincolten, 34; [Hak. Soc. i. 113].

1600.—“Those (coins) of Lead are called casas, whereof 1600 make one mas.”—John Davis, in Purchas, i. 117.

1609.—“Ils (les Chinois) apportent la monnoye qui a le cours en toute l’isle de Iava, et Isles circonvoisines, laquelle en l’igue Malaique est appellee Cas. . . . Cette monnoye est jettée en moule en Chine, a la Ville de Chincheu.”—Houtman, in Nav. des Hollandois, i. 306.

[1621.—“In many places they throw abroad Cashes (or brasse money) in great quantety.”—Cocks, Diary, ii. 202.]

1711.—“Doodoos and Cash are Copper Coins, eight of the former make one Fanham, and ten of the latter one Doodoo.”—Lockyer, 8. [Doodoo is the Tel. duddu, Skt. dvi, ‘two’; a more modern scale is: 2 dongguunis = 1 doody: 3 doodies = 1 anna.—Mad. Gloss. s.v.]

1718.—“Cass (a very small coin, eighty whereof make one Fano).”—Propagation of the Gospel in the East, ii. 52.

1727.—“At Atcheen they have a small coin of leaden Money called Cash, from Several of the old Arabian geographers write the name with the guttural k, but this is not so used in modern times.

c. 630.—“The Kingdom of Kia-shi-mi-lo (Kāsmīra) has about 7000 li of circuit. On all sides its frontiers are surrounded by mountains; these are of prodigious height; and although there are paths affording access to it, these are extremely narrow.”—Huen Tsang (Pél. Bouddh.) ii. 167.

c. 940.—“Kashmir . . . is a mountainous country, forming a large kingdom, containing not less than 60,000 or 70,000 towns or villages. It is inaccessible except on one side, and can only be entered by one gate.”—Mas'ūdi, i. 373.

1275.—“Kashmir, a province of India, adjoining the Turks; and its people of mixt Turk and Indian blood excel all others in beauty.”—Zakariya Kāzīni, in Gildemeister, 210.

1298.—“Keshimur also is a province inhabited by a people who are idolaters and have a language of their own . . . this country is the very source from which idolatry has spread abroad.”—Marco Polo, i. 175.

1552.—“The Mogols hold especially towards the N.E. the region Sogdiana, which they now call Queximir, and also Mount Caucasus which divides India from the other Provinces.”—Barros, IV. vi. 1.

1615.—“Chishmeere, the chiefs (it is called Sirinakar.”—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1467; [so in Roe's Map, vol. ii. Hak. Soc. ed.; Chismer in Foster, Letters, iii. 283].

1664.—“From all that hath been said, one may easily conjecture, that I am somewhat charmed with Kachemire, and that I pretend there is nothing in the world like it for so small a kingdom.”—Bernier, E. T. 128; [ed. Unstable, 400].

1676.—

“A trial of your kindness I must make;
Though not for mine, so much as virtue's sake,

The Queen of Cassimere . . .”

Dryden's Aurungzebe, iii. 1.

1814.—“The shawls of Cassimer and the silks of Iran.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 177; [2nd ed. ii. 232]. (See KERSEYMERE.)

CASIS, CAXIS, CACIZ, &c., s. This Spanish and Portuguese word, though Dozy gives it only as prêtre chrétien, is frequently employed by old travellers, and writers on Eastern subjects, to denote Mahomedan divines (mullas and the like). It may be suspected to have arisen from a confusion of two Arabic terms—kādi (see CAZEE) and kashish or kasis, ‘a Christian Presbyter’ (from a Syriac root signifying seniut). Indeed we sometimes find the precise word kashish (Caxic) used by Christian writers as if it were the special title of a Mahomedan theologian, instead of being, as it really is, the special and technical title of a Christian priest (a fact which gives Mount Athos its common Turkish name of Kashish Dağh). In the first of the following quotations the word appears to be applied by the Mussulman historian to pagan priests, and the word for churches to pagan temples. In the others, except that from Major Millingen, it is applied by Christian writers to Mahomedan divines, which is indeed its recognised signification in Spanish and Portuguese. In Jarric's Thesaurus (Jesuit Missions, 1606) the word Cacizius is constantly used in this sense.

c. 1310.—“There are 700 churches (kulista) resembling fortresses, and every one of them overflowing with presbyters (kashishān) without faith, and monks without religion.”—Description of the Chinese City of Khanzai (Hangchau) in Wadlf's History (see also Marco Polo, ii. 196).

1404.—“The town was inhabited by Moorish hermits called Caxices; and many people came to them on pilgrimage, and they healed many diseases.”—Markham's Clavijo, 79.

1514.—“And so, from one to another, the message passed through four or five hands, till it came to a Gaxizi, whom we should call a bishop or prelate, who stood at the King's feet. . . .”—Letter of Gior. de Empoli, in Archic. Stor. Ital. Append. p. 56.

1538.—“Just as the Cryer was offering to deliver me unto whomsoever would buy me, in comes that very Cacis Moulana, whom they held for a Saint, with 10 or 11 other Cacis his Inferiors, all Priests like himself of their wicked sect.”—F. M. Pinto (tr. by H. C.), p. 8.

1552.—Caciz in the same sense used by Barros, II. ii. 1.

[1553.—See quotation from Barros under LAR.

[1554.—“Who was a Caciz of the Moors, which means in Portuguese an ecclesiastic.”—Castañeda, Bk. I. ch. 7.]

1567.—“. . . The Holy Synod declares it necessary to remove from the territories of His Highness all the infidels whose office it is to maintain their false religion, such as are the cacizes of the Moors, and the preachers of the Gentoo, jogues, sorcerers, (feiticeiros), jousis, grous (i.e. joshis or astrologers, and gurūs), and whatsoever others make a business of religion among the infidels, and so also the bramans and society. He calls these divisions in Narsinga and Malabar so many leis de gentios, i.e. 'laws' of the heathen, in the sense of sectarian rules of life. But he uses the word casta in a less technical way, which shows how it should easily have passed into the technical sense. Thus, speaking of the King of Calicut: "This King keeps 1000 women, to whom he gives regular maintenance, and they always go to his court to act as the sweepers of his palaces . . . these are ladies, and of good family" (estas suas fidalgas e de boa casta.—In Coll. of Lisbon Academy, ii. 316). So also Castanheda: "There fled a knight who was called Fernão Lopez, homem de boa casta" (iii. 239). In the quotations from Barros, Correa, and Garcia de Orta, we have the word in what we may call the technical sense.

c. 1444.—"Whence I conclude that this race (casta) of men is the most agile and dexterous that there is in the world."—Adamasto, Navegação, i. 14.

1552.—"The Admiral . . . received these Naires with honour and joy, showing great contentment with the King for sending his message by such persons, saying that he expected this coming of theirs to prosper, as there did not enter into the business any man of the caste of the Moors."—Barros, I. vi. 5.

1561.—"Some of them asserted that they were of the caste (casta) of the Christians."—Correa, Lendas, i. 2, 685.

1563.—"One thing is to be noted . . . that no one changes from his father's trade, and all those of the same caste (casta) of shoemakers are the same."—Garcia, f. 213b.

1567.—"In some parts of this Province (of Goa) the Gentoos divide themselves into distinct races or castes (castas) of greater or less dignity, holding the Christians as of lower degree, and keep these so superstitiously that no one of a higher caste can eat or drink with those of a lower. . . ."—Decree 2nd of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 4.

"Dous modos ha de gento; porque a nobre Nairas chamados são, e a menos dina Poleas tem por nome, a quem obriga A lei não misturar a casta antiga."—

Cumões, vii. 37.

By Burton:

"Two modes of men are known; the nobles know the name of Nayrs, who call the lower Caste Poléas, whom their haughty laws contain from intermingling with the higher strain."

1612.—"As regards the castes (castas) the great impediment to the conversion of the Gentoos is the superstition which they maintain in relation to their castes, and which prevents them from touching, communicating, or mingling with others, whether superior or inferior; those of one observance with those of another."—(Outo, Dec. V. vi. 4. See also as regards the Portuguese use of the word, Gouvea, ff. 103, 104, 105, 106b, 129b; Synodo, 18b, &c.

1630.—"The common Brumane hath eighty two Casts or Tribes, assuming to themselves the name of that tribe. . . ."—Lord's Display of the Banians, p. 72.

1673.—"The mixture of Casts or Tribes of all India are distinguished by the different modes of binding their Turbats."—Fryer, 115.

c. 1760.—"The distinction of the Gentoos into their tribes or Casts, forms another considerable object of their religion."—Grose, i. 201.

1763.—"The Casts or tribes into which the Indians are divided, are reckoned by travellers to be eighty-four."—Orme (ed. 1803), i. 4.

[1820.—"The Kayasthas (pronounced Kaists, hence the word caste) follow next."—W. Hamilton, Descr. of Hindostan, i. 109.]

1878.—"There are thousands and thousands of these so-called Castes; no man knows their number, no man can know it; for the conception is a very flexible one, and moreover new castes continually spring up and pass away."—F. Jagor, Ost-Indische Handwerk und Gewerbe, 13.

Castes are, according to Indian social views, either high or low.

1876.—"Low-caste Hindoos in their own land are, to all ordinary apprehension, slovenly, dirty, ungraceful, generally unacceptable in person and surroundings. . . . Yet offensive as is the low-caste Indian, were I estate-owner, or colonial governor, I had rather see the lowest Pariahs of the low, than a single trim, smooth-faced, smooth-wayed, clever high-caste Hindoo, on my lands or in my colony."—W. G. Palgrave, in Fortnightly Rev., cx. 226.

In the Madras Pres. castes are also 'Right-hand' and 'Left-hand.' This distinction represents the agricultural classes on the one hand, and the artizans, &c., on the other, as was pointed out by F. W. Ellis. In the old days of Ft. St. George, faction-fights between the two were very common, and the terms right-hand and left-hand castes occur early in the old records of that settlement, and frequently in Mr. Talboys Wheeler's extracts from them. They are mentioned by Couto. [See Nelson, Madura, Pt. ii. p. 4; Oppert. Orig. Inhab. p. 57.]

Sir Walter Elliot considers this feud to be "nothing else than the occasional outbreak of the smouldering antagonism between Brahmanism and Buddhism, although in the lapse of ages both parties have lost sight of the fact. The points on which they split now are mere trifles, such as parading on horse-back or in a palankeen in procession, erecting a pandal or marriage-shed on a given number of pillars, and claiming to carry certain flags, &c. The right-hand party is headed by the Brahmans, and includes the Parias, who assume the van, beating their tom-toms when they come to blows. The chief of the left-hand are the Panchalars [i.e. the Five Classes, workers in metal and stone, &c.], followed by the Pallars and workers in leather, who sound their long trumpets and engage the Parias." (In Journ. Ethnol. Soc. N.S. 1869, p. 112.)

1612.—"From these four castes are derived 196; and those again are divided into two parties, which they call Valanga and Elanga [Tam. valangai, idangai], which is as much as to say 'the right hand' and 'the left hand. . .'"—Couto, u. s.

The word is current in French :

1842.—"Il est clair que les castes n'ont jamais pu exister solidement sans une véritable conservation religieuse."—Comte, Cours de Phil. Positive, vi. 505.

1877.—"Nous avons aboli les castes et les privilèges, nous avons inscrit partout le principe de l'égalité devant la loi, nous avons donné le suffrage à tous, mais voilà qu'on réclame maintenant l'égalité des conditions."—E. de Laveleye, De la Propriété, p. iv.

Caste is also applied to breeds of animals, as 'a high-caste Arab.' In such cases the usage may possibly have come directly from the Port. alta casta, casta baixa, in the sense of breed or strain.

CASTEES, s. Obsolete. The Indo-Portuguese formed from casta the word castiço, which they used to denote children born in India of Portuguese parents; much as creole was used in the W. Indies.

1599.—"Liberi vero nati in Indiâ, utroque parente Lusitano, castisos vocantur, in omnibus fere Lusitanis similes, colore tamen modicum differunt, ut qui ad gilvum non nihil deflectant. Ex castisis deinde nati magis magisque gilvi fiunt, a parentibus et mesticis magis deflectentes; porro et mesticis nati per omnia indigenis respondent, ita ut in tertiâ generatione Lusitani reliquis Indis sunt simillimi."—De Bry, ii. 76; (Linschoten [Hak. Soc. i. 184]).

1661.—"Die Stadt (Negapatam) ist ziemlich volkreich, doch mehrentheils von Mastycen Castycen, und Portugesichen Christen."—Walter Schulze, 108.

1699.—"Castees wives at Fort St. George."—Census of English on the Coast, in Wheeler, i. 356.

1701-2.—In the MS. Returns of Persons in the Service of the Rt. Honble. the E. I. Company, in the India Office, for this year, we find, "4th (in Council) Matt. Empson, Sea Customer, marry'd Castees," and under 1702, "13. Charles Bugden . . . marry'd Castees."

1726.—". . . or the offspring of the same by native women, to wit Mistices and Castices, or blacks . . . and Moors."—Valentijn, v. 3.

CASUARINA, s. A tree (Casuarina muricata, Roxb.—N. O. Casuarineae) indigenous on the coast of Chittagong and the Burmese provinces, and southward as far as Queensland. It was introduced into Bengal by Dr. F. Buchanan, and has been largely adopted as an ornamental tree both in Bengal and in Southern India. The tree has a considerable superficial resemblance to a larch or other finely-feathered conifer, making a very acceptable variety in the hot plains, where real pines will not grow. [The name, according to Mr. Scott, appears to be based on a Malayan name associating the tree with the Cassowary, as Mr. Skeat suggests from the resemblance of its needles to the quills of the bird.]

1867.—"Our road lay chiefly by the sea-coast, along the white sands, which were fringed for miles by one grand continuous line or border of casuarina trees."—Lt.-Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 362.

1879.—"It was lovely in the white moonlight, with the curving shadows of palms on the dewy grass, the grace of the drooping casuarinas, the shining water, and the long drift of surf. . . ."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 275.

CATHAY.

be equivalent to coll de chat—named in India billi ke ankh."—Royle's Hindu Medicine, p. 103.

a. A weight used in China, and by the Chinese introduced into the Archipelago. The Chinese name is kin or chin. The word kati or kati is Malayo-Javanese. It is equal to 16 taels, i.e. 1½ lb. avoird. or 625 grammes. This is the weight fixed by treaty; but in Chinese trade it varies from 4 oz. to 28 oz.; the lowest value being used by tea-vendors at Peking, the highest by coal-merchants in Honan.

1598.—"Everie Catte is as much as 20 Portingall ounces."—Linshoten, 34; [Hak. Soc. i. 113].

1604.—"Their pound they call a Cate which is one and twentie of our ounces."—Capt. John Davis, in Purchas, i. 123.

1609.—"Offering to enact among them the penaltie of death to such as would sel one cattie of spice to the Hollanders."—Kelling, ibid. i. 199.

1610.—"And (I prayse God) I have aboard one hundred thirtie nine Tunnes, six Cathayes, one quarterne two pound of nutmegs and sixe hundred two and twenty suckottes of Mace, which maketh thirtie sixe Tunnes, fiftene Cathayes one quarterne, one and twentie pound."—David Middleton, ibid. i. 217. In this passage, however, Cathayes seems to be a strange blunder of Purchas or his copyist for Cat. Suckotte is probably Malay sukat, "a measure, a stated quantity." [The word appears as suckell in a letter of 1615 (Foster, iii. 175). Mr. Skeat suggests that it is a misreading for Pecul. Sukat, he says, means 'to measure anything' (indefinitely), but is never used for a definite measure.]

b. The word catty occurs in another sense in the following passage. A note says that "Catty or more literally Kuttoo is a Tamil word signifying batta" (q.v.). But may it not rather be a clerical error for batty?

1659.—"If we should detain them longer we are to give them catty."—Letter in Wheeler, i. 162.

CATUR, s. A light rowing vessel used on the coast of Malabar in the early days of the Portuguese. We have not been able to trace the name to any Indian source, [unless possibly Skt. chatura, 'swift']. Is it not probably the origin of our 'cutter'? We see that Sir R. Burton in his Commentary on Camoens (vol. iv. 39) says: "Catur is the Arab. kutireh, small craft, our 'cutter'." [This view is rejected by the N.E.D., which regards it as an English word from 'cut.']. We cannot say when cutter was introduced in marine use. We cannot find it in Dampier, nor in Robinson Crusoe; the first instance we have found is that quoted below from Anson's Voyage. [The N.E.D. has nothing earlier than 1745.]

Bluteau gives catur as an Indian term indicating a small war vessel which in a calm can be aided by oars. Jal (Archéologie Navale, ii. 25) quotes Witsen as saying that the Caturi or Almadias were Calicut vessels, having a length of 12 to 14 paces (60 to 65 feet), sharp at both ends, and curving back, using both sails and oars. But there was a larger kind, 80 feet long, with only 7 or 8 feet beam.

1510.—"There is also another kind of vessel. . . . These are all made of one piece of wood, sharp at both ends. These ships are called Chaturi, and go either with a sail or oars more swiftly than any galley, frigate, or brigantine."—Varthema, 151.

1541.—". . . navigium majus quod vocant caturem."—Sci. Franc. Xar. Epistolae, 12.

1549.—"Naves item duas (quas Incatures vocant) summâ celeritate armatas jussit, ut oram maritimam legentes, hostes comineatu prohiberent."—Groës, de Beccanica, 1331.

1552.—"And this winter the Governour sent to have built in Cochin thirty Cature which are vessels with oars, but smaller than brigantines."—Castanheda, iii. 271.

1588.—"Cambaicam oram Jacobus Laurentius duobus caturibus tueri jussus. . . ."—Magli, lib. xiii. ed. 1752, p. 283.

1601.—"Biremes, seu Cathuris quas plurimae conduntur in Lassaon, Javae ciuitate. . . ."—De Bry, iii. 109 (where there is a plate, iii. No. xxxvii.).

1688.—"No man was so bold to contradict the man of God; and they all went to the Arsenal. There they found a good and sufficient bark of those they call Catur besides seven old foysts."—Dryden, Life of Xacier, in Works, 1821, xvi. 200.

1742.—". . . to prevent even the possibility of the galleons escaping us in the night the two Cutters belonging to the Centurie and the Gloucester were both manned and sent in shore. . . ."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. 1756, p. 251. Cutter also occurs pp. 1129, 150, and other places.

CAUVERY, n.p. The great river of S. India. Properly Tam. Kāviri, or rather Kāveri, and Sanscritized Kāvērī. The earliest mention is that of Ptolemy, who writes the name (after the Skt. form) Χάβηρος (sc. ποταμός). The Καμάρα of the Periplus (c. A.D. 80-90) probably, however, represents the same name, the Χαβηρίς ἐμποριόν of Ptolemy. The meaning of the name has been much debated, and several plausible but unsatisfactory explanations have been given. Thus the Skt. form Kāvērī has been explained from that language by kāvēra 'saffron.' A river in the Tamil country is, however, hardly likely to have a non-mythological Skt. name. The Cauvery in flood, like other S. Indian rivers, assumes a reddish hue. And the form Kāvērī has been explained by Bp. Caldwell as possibly from the Dravidian kāvi, 'red ochre,' or kā (kā-va), 'a grove,' and ēr-u, Tel. 'a river,' ēr-i, Tam. 'a sheet of water'; thus either 'red river' or 'grove river.' [The Madras Admin. Gloss. takes it from kā, Tam. 'grove,' and ēri, Tam. 'tank,' from its original source in a garden tank.] Kā-viri, however, the form found in inscriptions, affords a more satisfactory Tamil interpretation, viz. Kā-viri, 'grove-extender,' or developer. Any one who has travelled along the river will have noticed the thick groves all along the banks, which form a remarkable feature of the stream.

Χαβηρίς ἐμποριόν.”—Ptolemy, lib. vii. 1.

The last was probably represented by Kaveripatan.

c. 545.—“Then there is Sieldēba, i.e. Taprobane . . . and then again on the Continent, and further back, is Marallo, which exports conch-shells; Kaber, which exports alabandinum.”—Cosmas, Topog. Christ. in Cathay, &c. clxxviii.

1310-11.—“After traversing the passes, they arrived at night on the banks of the river Kānobarī, and bivouacked on the sands.”—Amīr Khusrū, in Elliot, ii. 90.

The Cauvery appears to be ignored in the older European account and maps.

CAVALLY, s. This is mentioned as a fish of Ceylon by Ives, 1775 (p. 57). It is no doubt the same that is described in the quotation from Pyrard [see Gray's note, Hak. Soc.

i. 388]. It may represent the genus Equula, of which 12 spp. are described by Day (Fishes of India, pp. 237-242), two being named by different zoologists E. caballa. But Dr. Day hesitates to identify the fish now in question. The fish mentioned in the fourth and fifth quotations may be the same species; but that in the fifth seems doubtful. Many of the spp. are extensively sun-dried, and eaten by the poor.

c. 1610.—“Ces Moucois pescheurs prennent entr'autres grande quantité d'une sorte de petit poisson, qui n'est pas plus grande que la main et large comme un petit breteau. Les Portugais l'appellent Pesche cauallo. Il est le plus commun de toute ceste coste, et c'est de quoy ils font le plus grand trafic; car ils le fendent par la moitié, ils le salent, et le font secher au soleil.”—Pyrard de Laval, i. 278; see also 309; [Hak. Soc. i. 427; ii. 127, 294, 299].

1626.—“The Ile inricht us with many good things; Buffols, . . . oysters, Breams, Cavalloes, and store of other fish.”—Sir T. Herbert, 281.

1652.—“There is another very small fish vulgarly called Cavalle, which is good enough to eat, but not very wholesome.”—Philippus a Sanct. Trinitate, in Fr. Tr. 383.

1796.—“The ayla, called in Portuguese cavala, has a good taste when fresh, but when salted becomes like the herring.”—Fra Paolini, E. T., p. 240.

1875.—“Caranx denter (Bl. Schn.). This fish of wide range from the Mediterranean to the coast of Brazil, at St. Helena is known as the Cavalley, and is one of the best table fish, being indeed the salmon of St. Helena. It is taken in considerable numbers, chiefly during the summer months, around the coast, in not very deep water: it varies in length from nine inches up to two or three feet.”—St. Helena, by J. C. Melliss, p. 106.

CAWNEY, CAWNY, s. Tam. kūni, 'property,' hence 'land,' [from Tam. kan, 'to see,' what is known and recognised,] and so a measure of land used in the Madras Presidency. It varies, of course, but the standard Cawny is considered to be = 24 manai or Grounds (q.v.), of 2,400 sq. f. each, hence 57,600 sq. f. or ac. 1.322. This is the only sense in which the word is used in the Madras dialect of the Anglo-Indian tongue. The 'Indian Vocabulary' of 1788 has the word in the form Connys, but with an unintelligible explanation.

1807.—“The land measure of the Jaghire is as follows: 24 Adies square=1 Culy; 100 Curies=1 Canay. Out of what is called charity however the Culy is in fact a Bamboo 28 Adies or 22 feet 8 inches in length . . . the Ady or Malabar foot is therefore 10 $\frac{4}{10}$ inches nearly; and the customary canay contains 51,375 sq. feet, or 1 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres nearly; while the proper canay would only contain 43,778 feet."—F. Buchanan, Mysore, dv. i. 6.

CAWNPORE, n.p. The correct name is Kānnpur, 'the town of Kānh, Kanhaiya or Krishna.' The city of the Domb so called, having in 1891 a population of 188,712, has grown up entirely under British rule, at first as the bazar and dependence of the cantonment established here under a treaty made with the Nabob of Oudh in 1766, and afterwards as a great mart of trade.

CAYMAN, s. This is not used in India. It is an American name for an alligator; from the Carib acayuman (Littre). But it appears formerly to have been in general use among the Dutch in the East. [It is one of those words "which the Portuguese or Spaniards very early caught up in one part of the world, and naturalised in another." (N.E.D.)].

1530.—"The country is extravagantly hot; and the rivers are full of Caimans, which are certain water-lizards (lagarti)."—Nunno de Guzman, in Ramusio, iii. 339.

1598.—"In this river (Zaire or Congo) there are living divers kinds of creatures, and in particular, mighty great crocodiles, which the country people there call Caiman."—Piquetta, in Harleian Coll. of Voyages, ii. 533.

This is an instance of the way in which we so often see a word belonging to a different quarter of the world undoubtedly ascribed to Africa or Asia, as the case may be. In the next quotation we find it ascribed to India.

1631.—"Lib. v. cap. iii. De Crocodilo qui per totam Indian cayman audit."—Bontius, Hist. Nat. et Med.

1672.—"The figures so represented in Adam's footsteps were . . . 41. The King of the Caimans or Crocodiles."—Baldanus (Germ. ed.), 148.

1692.—"Anno 1692 there were 3 newly arrived soldiers . . . near a certain gibbet that stood by the river outside the boom, so sharply pursued by a Kaieman that they were obliged to climb the gibbet for safety whilst the creature standing up on his hind feet reached with his snout to the very top of the gibbet."—Valentijn, iv. 231.

M

CAYOLAQUE, s. Kayu = 'wood,' in Malay. Laka is given in Crawford's Malay Dict. as "name of a red wood used as incense, Myristica iners." In his Descr. Dict. he calls it the "Tanarius major; a tree with a red-coloured wood, a native of Sumatra, used in dyeing and in pharmacy. It is an article of considerable native trade, and is chiefly exported to China" (p. 204). [The word, according to Mr. Skeat, is probably kayu, 'wood,' lakh, 'red dye' (see LAC), but the combined form is not in Klinkert, nor are these trees in Ridley's plant list. He gives Laka-laka or Malaka as the name of the phyllanthus emblica.]

1510.—"There also grows here a very great quantity of lacca for making red colour, and the tree of this is formed like our trees which produce walnuts."—Varthema, p. 238.

c. 1560.—"I being in Canton there was a rich (bed) made wrought with luorie, and of a sweet wood which they call Cayolaque, and of Sandalum, that was prized at 1500 Crowns."—Gaspard Da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 177.

1585.—"Euerie morning and euening they do offer vnto their idolles frankensence, benjamin, wood of aguila, and cayolaque, the which is maruelous sweeto. . . ."—Mendoza's China, i. 58.

CAZEE, KAJEE, &c., s. Arab. kādi, 'a judge,' the letter zaid with which it is spelt being always pronounced in India like a z. The form Cadi, familiar from its use in the old version of the Arabian Nights, comes to us from the Levant. The word with the article, al-kādi, becomes in Spanish alcade; * not alcaide, which is from kā'id, 'a chief'; nor alquacil, which is from razār. So Dozy and Engelmann, no doubt correctly. But in Pinto, cap. 8, we find "ao quazil da justica q̄ em elles he como corregedor entre nos"; where quazil seems to stand for kāzī.

It is not easy to give an accurate account of the position of the Kāzī in British India, which has gone through variations of which a distinct record cannot be found. But the following outline is believed to be substantially correct.

* Dr. R. Rost observes to us that the Arabic letter zaid is pronounced by the Malays like ll (see also Crawford's Malay Grammar, p. 7). And it is curious to find a transfer of the same letter into Spanish as ll. In Malay kādi becomes kāll.

Under Adawlut I have given a brief sketch of the history of the judiciary under the Company in the Bengal Presidency. Down to 1790 the greater part of the administration of criminal justice was still in the hands of native judges, and other native officials of various kinds, though under European supervision in varying forms. But the native judiciary, except in positions of a quite subordinate character, then ceased. It was, however, still in substance Mahommedan law that was administered in criminal cases, and also in civil cases between Mahommedans as affecting succession, &c. And a Kāzī and a Muftī were retained in the Provincial Courts of Appeal and Circuit as the exponents of Mahommedan law, and the deliverers of a formal Futwa. There was also a Kāzī-al-Kozāt, or chief Kāzī of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, attached to the Sudder Courts of Dewanny and Nizamut, assisted by two Muftis, and these also gave written futwas on references from the District Courts.

The style of Kāzī and Muftī presumably continued in formal existence in connection with the Sudder Courts till the abolition of these in 1862; but with the earlier abolition of the Provincial Courts in 1829-31 it had quite ceased, in this sense, to be familiar. In the District Courts the corresponding exponents were in English officially designated Law-officers, and, I believe, in official vernacular, as well as commonly among Anglo-Indians, Moolvees (q.v.).

Under the article LAW-OFFICER, it will be seen that certain trivial cases were, at the discretion of the magistrate, referred for disposal by the Law-officer of the district. And the latter, from this fact, as well as, perhaps, from the tradition of the elders, was in some parts of Bengal popularly known as 'the Kāzī.' "In the Magistrate's office," writes my friend Mr. Seton-Karr, "it was quite common to speak of this case as referred to the joint magistrate, and that to the Chhotā Sahib (the Assistant), and that again to the Kāzī."

But the duties of the Kāzī popularly so styled and officially recognised, had, almost from the beginning of the century, become limited to certain notarial functions, to the performance and registration of Mahommedan marriages, and some other matters connected with the social life of their co-religionists. To these functions must also be added as regards the 18th century and the earlier years of the 19th, duties in connection with distraint for rent on behalf of Zemin-dars. There were such Kāzīs nominated by Government in towns and pergunnas, with great variation in the area of the localities over which they officiated. The Act XI. of 1864, which repealed the laws relating to law-officers, put an end also to the appointment by Government of Kāzīs. But this seems to have led to inconveniences which were complained of by Mahommedans in some parts of India, and it was enacted in 1880 (Act XII., styled "The Kāzīs Act") that with reference to any particular locality, and after consultation with the chief Musulman residents therein, the Local Government might select and nominate a Kāzī or Kāzīs for that local area (see FUTWA, LAW-OFFICER, MUFTY).

1338.—"They treated me civilly and set me in front of their mosque during their Easter; at which mosque, on account of its being their Easter, there were assembled from divers quarters a number of their Cadini, i.e. of their bishops."—Letter of Friar Pascal, in Cathay, &c., 235.

1673.—"Their Law-Disputes, they are soon ended; the Governor hearing; and the Cadi or Judge determining every Morning."—Fryer, 32.

"The Casy or Judge . . . marries them."—Ibid. 94.

1683.—". . . more than that 3000 pc men gathered together, complaining w full mouths of his exaction and injur towards them: some demanding Rupees 10, others Rupees 20 per man, which Bulchund very generously paid them in the Cazee's presence. . . .”—Hedges, Nov. 5; [Hak. Soc. i. 134; Cazee in i. 85].

1684.—“January 12.—From Cassumbazar 'tis advised ye Merchants and Picars appeal again to yo Cazee for Justice against Mr. Charnock. Ye Cazee cites Mr. Charnock to appear. . . .”—Ibid. i. 147.

1689.—“A Cogee . . . who is a Person skilled in their Law.”—Ocington, 206.

Here there is perhaps a confusion with Coja.

1727.—“When the Man sees his Spouse, and likes her, they agree on the Price and Term of Weeks, Months, or Years, and then appear before the Cadjee or Judge.”—A. Hamilton, i. 52.

1763.—“The Cadi holds court in which are tried all disputes of property.”—Orme, i. 26 (ed. 1803).

1773.—“That they should be mean, weak, ignorant, and corrupt, is not surprising, when the salary of the principal judge, the Casi, does not exceed Rs. 100 per month.”—From Impey's Judgment in the Patna Cause, quoted by Stephen, ii. 176.

1790.—“Regulations for the Court of Circuit.”

“24. That each of the Courts of Circuit be superintended by two covenanted civil servants of the Company, to be denominated Judges of the Courts of Circuit . . . assisted by a Kazi and a Mufti.”—Regns. for the Adm. of Justice in the Foujdarry or Criminal Courts in Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa. Passed by the G.-G. in C., Dec. 3, 1790.

“32. . . . The charge against the prisoner, his confession, which is always to be received with circumspection and tenderness . . . &c. . . . being all heard and gone through in his presence and that of the Kazi and Mufti of the Court, the Kazi and Mufti are then to write at the bottom of the record of the proceedings held in the trial, the futwa or law as applicable to the circumstances of the case. . . . The Judges of the Court shall attentively consider such futwa, &c.”—Ibid.

1791.—“The Judges of the Courts of Circuit shall refer to the Kazi and Mufti of their respective Courts all questions on points of law . . . regarding which they may not have been furnished with specific instructions from the G.-G. in C. or the Nizamut Adaulat. . . .”—Regn. No. XXXV.

1792.—Revenue Regulation of July 20, No. lxxv., empowers Landholders and Farmers of Land to distrain for Arrears of Rent, or Revenue. The “Kazi of the Pegunnah” is the official under the Collector, repeatedly referred to as regulating and carrying out the distraint. So, again, in Regn. XVII. of 1793.

1793.—“lxvi. The Nizamut Adaulat shall continue to be held at Calcutta.

“lxvii. The Court shall consist of the Governor-General, and the members of the Supreme Council, assisted by the head Cauzy of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, and two Muftis.” (This was already in the Regulations of 1791.)—Regn. IX. of 1793. See also quotation under MUFTY.

1793.—“I. Cauzies are stationed at the Cities of Patna, Dacca, and Moorshedabad, and the principal towns, and in the pergunnahs, for the purpose of preparing and attesting deeds of transfer, and other law papers, celebrating marriages, and performing such religious duties or ceremonies prescribed by the Mahomedan law, as have been hitherto discharged by them under the British Government.”—Reg. XXXIX. of 1793.

1803.—Regulation XLVI. regulates the appointment of Cauzy in towns and pergunnahs, “for the purpose of preparing and attesting deeds of transfer, and other law papers, celebrating marriages,” &c., but makes no allusion to judicial duties.

1824.—“Have you not learned this common saying—‘Every one's teeth are blunted by acids except the cadi's, which are by sweets.’”—Hajji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 316.

1864.—“Whereas it is unnecessary to continue the offices of Hindoo and Mahomedan Law-Officers, and is inexpedient that the appointment of Cazee-ool-Cozaat, or of City, Town, or Pergunnah Cazees should be made by Government, it is enacted as follows:—

“II. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed so as to prevent a Cazee-ool-Cozaat or other Cazee from performing, when required to do so, any duties or ceremonies prescribed by the Mahomedan Law.”—Act No. XI. of 1864.

1880.—“ . . . whereas by the usage of the Muhammadan community in some parts of India the presence of Kazis appointed by the Government is required at the celebration of marriages. . . .”—Bill introduced into the Council of Gov.-Gen., January 30, 1880.

“An Act for the appointment of persons to the office of Kazi.

“Whereas by the preamble to Act No. XI. of 1864 . . . it was (among other things declared inexpedient, &c.) . . . and whereas by the usage of the Muhammadan community in some parts of India the presence of Kazis appointed by the Government is required at the celebration of marriages and the performance of certain other rites and ceremonies, and it is therefore expedient that the Government should again be empowered to appoint such persons to the office of Kazi: It is hereby enacted . . .”—Act No. XII. of 1880.

1885.—“To come to something more specific. ‘There were instances in which men of the most venerable dignity, persecuted without a cause by extortioners, died of rage and shame in the gripe of the vile alguazils of Impey’ [Macaulay's Essay on Hastings].

"Here we see one Cazi turned into an indefinite number of 'men of the most venerable dignity'; a man found guilty by legal process of corruptly oppressing a helpless widow into 'men of the most venerable dignity' persecuted by extortioners without a cause; and a guard of sepoy, with which the Supreme Court had nothing to do, into 'vile alguazils of Impey.'"—Stephen, Story of Nuncomar, ii. 250-251.

Cazee also is a title used in Nepal for Ministers of State.

1848.—"Kajees, Counsellors, and mitred Lamas were there, to the number of twenty, all planted with their backs to the wall, mute and motionless as statues."—Hooker's Himalayan Journals, ed. 1855, i. 286.

1868.—"The Durbar (of Nepal) have written to the four Kajees of Thibet enquiring the reason."—Letter from Col. R. Lawrence, dated 1st April, regarding persecution of R. C. Missions in Tibet.

1873.—

"Ho, lamas, get ye ready,

Ho, Kaxis, clear the way;

The chief will ride in all his pride

To the Rungeet Stream to-day."

Wilfrid Heeley, A Lay of Modern Darjeeling.

CEDED DISTRICTS, n.p. A name applied familiarly at the beginning of the last century to the territory south of the Tungabhadra river, which was ceded to the Company by the Nizam in 1800, after the defeat and death of Tippoo Sultan. This territory embraced the present districts of Bellary, Cuddapah, and Karnúl, with the Palnād, which is now a subdivision of the Kistna District. The name perhaps became best known in England from Gleig's Life of Sir Thomas Munro, that great man having administered these provinces for 7 years.

1878.—"We regret to announce the death of Lieut.-General Sir Hector Jones, G.C.B., at the advanced age of 86. The gallant officer now deceased belonged to the Madras Establishment of the E. I. Co.'s forces, and bore a distinguished part in many of the great achievements of that army, including the celebrated march into the Ceded Districts under the Collector of Canara, and the campaign against the Zemindar of Madura."—The True Reformer, p. 7 ("wrot serkes-tick").

CELÉBES, n.p. According to Crawfurd this name is unknown to the natives, not only of the great island itself, but of the Archipelago generally, and must have arisen from some Portuguese misunderstanding or corruption. There appears to be no general name for the island in the Malay language, unless Tanah Bugis, 'the Land of the Bugis people' [see BUGIS]. It seems sometimes to have been called the Isle of Macassar. In form Celebes is apparently a Portuguese plural, and several of their early writers speak of Celebes as a group of islands. Crawfurd makes a suggestion, but not very confidently, that Pulo sālābih, 'the islands over and above,' might have been vaguely spoken of by the Malays, and understood by the Portuguese as a name. [Mr. Skeat doubts the correctness of this explanation: "The standard Malay form would be Pulau Sālēbih, which in some dialects might be Sā-lēbis, and this may have been a variant of Si-Lēbih, a man's name, the si corresponding to the def. art. in the Germ. phrase 'der Hans.' Numerous Malay place-names are derived from those of people."] 1516.—"Having passed these islands of Maluco . . . at a distance of 130 leagues, there are other islands to the west, from which sometimes there come white people, naked from the waist upwards. . . . These people eat human flesh, and if the King of Maluco has any person to execute, they beg for him to eat him, just as one would ask for a pig, and the islands from which they come are called Celebe."—Barbosa, 202-3.

c. 1544.—"In this street (of Pegu) there were six and thirty thousand strangers of two and forty different Nations, namely. . . Papuaas, Selebres, Mindanaos . . . and many others whose names I know not."—F. M. Pinto, in Cogan's tr., p. 200.

1552.—"In the previous November (1529) arrived at Ternate D. Jorge de Castro who came from Malaca by way of Borneo in a junk . . . and going astray passed along the Isle of Macaçar. . ."—Barros, Dec. IV. i. 18.

"The first thing that the Samarao did in this was to make Tristão de Taide believe that in the Isles of the Celebes, and of the Macaçares and in that of Mindinão there was much gold."—Ibid. vi. 25.

1579.—"The 16 Day (December) we had sight of the Iland Celebes or Silebis."—Drake, World Encompassed (Hak. Soc.), p. 150.

1610.—"At the same time there were a Ternate certain ambassadors from the Isle of the Macaças (which are to the west of those of Maluco—the nearest of them about 60 leagues). . . . These islands are many, and joined together, and appear in the sea-chart thrown into one very big island, extending as the sailors say, North and South, and having near 100 leagues of compass. A this island imitates the shape of a big locust, the head of which (stretching to the south to $5\frac{1}{2}$ degrees) is formed by the Cellebes (also as Celibes), which have a King over them. . . . These islands are ruled by many Kings, differing in language, in laws, and customs. . . .”—Couto, Dec. V. vii. 2.

1662.—“There is a kind of worm which the Portuguese call um centopè, and the Dutch also ‘thousand-legs’ (tausend-bein).”—T. Saal, 68.

CERAM, n.p. A large island in the Molucca Sea, the Serang of the Malays. [Klinkert gives the name Seran, which Mr. Skeat thinks more likely to be correct.]

CERAME, CARAME, &c., s. The Malayālim śrāmbi, a gatehouse with a room over the gate, and generally fortified. This is a feature of temples, &c., as well as of private houses, in Malabar [see Logan, i. 82]. The word is also applied to a chamber raised on four posts. [The word, as Mr. Skeat notes, has come into Malay as sarambi or serambi, ‘a house veranda.’]

[1500.—“He was taken to a cerame, which is a one-storied house of wood, which the King had erected for their meeting-place.”—Castañeda, Bk. I. cap. 33, p. 103.]

1551.—“ . . . where stood the çarame of the King, which is his temple. . . .”—Ibid. iii. 2.

1552. — “Pedralvares . . . was carried ashore on men’s shoulders in an andor till he was set among the Gentoo Princes whom the Çamorin had sent to receive him at the beach, whilst the said Çamorin himself was standing within sight in the cerame awaiting his arrival.”—Barrow, I. v. 5.

1557. —The word occurs also in D’Albuquerque’s Commentaries (Ilak. Nov. tr. i. 115), but it is there erroneously rendered “jotty.”

1566. — “Antes de entrar no Cerame vierão receber alguns senhores dos que ficarão com el Rei.”—Dam. de Goes, Chron. 76 (ch. lviii.).

CEYLON, n.p. This name, as applied to the great island which hangs from India like a dependent jewel, becomes usual about the 13th century. But it can be traced much earlier. For it appears undoubtedly to be formed from Sinhala or Sihala, ‘lions’ abode,’ the name adopted in the island itself at an early date. This, with the addition of ‘Island,’ Sihala-dripa, comes down to us in Cosmas as Σιλεδῖβα. There was a Pali form Sihalan, which, at an early date, must have been colloquially shortened to Silan, as appears from the old Tamil name Ilam (the Tamil having no proper sibilant), and probably from this was formed the Sarandip and Sarandib which was long the name in use by mariners of the Persian Gulf.

It has been suggested by Mr. Van der Tuuk, that the name Sailan or Silan was really of Javanese origin, as sela (from Skt. śīla, ‘a rock, a stone’) in Javanese (and in Malay) means ‘a precious stone,’ hence Pulo Selan would be ‘Isle of Gems.’ [“This,” writes Mr. Skeat, “is possible, but it remains to be proved that the gem was not named after the island (i.e. ‘Ceylon stone’). The full phrase in standard Malay is batu Selan, where batu means ‘stone.’ Klinkert merely marks Sailan (Ceylon) as Persian.”] The island was really called anciently Ratnadripa, ‘Isle of Gems,’ and is termed by an Arab historian of the 9th century Jazīrat-al-jakūt, ‘Isle of Rubies.’ So that there is considerable plausibility in Van der Tuuk’s suggestion. But the genealogy of the name from Sihala is so legitimate that the utmost that can be conceded is the possibility that the Malay form Selan may have been shaped by the consideration suggested, and may have influenced the general adoption of the form Sailan, through the predominance of Malay navigation in the Middle Ages.

c. 362.—“Unde nationibus Indicis cortatim cum donis optimates mittentibus ante tempus, ab usque Divis et Serendivis.”—Ammianus Marcellinus, XXI. vii.

c. 430.—“The island of Lanka was called Sihala after the Lion: listen ye to the narration of the island which I (am going to) tell: ‘The daughter of the Vanga King cohabited in the forest with a lion.’”—Dipavansa, IX. i. 2.

c. 545. —“This is the great island in the ocean, lying in the Indian Sea. By the Indians it is called Sieledeiba, but by the Greeks Taprobane.”—Cosmas, Bk. xi.

851. —“Near Sarandib is the pearl-fishery. Sarandib is entirely surrounded by the sea.”—Relation des Voyages, i. p. 5.

c. 940.—“Mas’ūdi proceeds: In the Island Sarandib. I myself witnessed that when the King was dead, he was placed on a chariot with low wheels so that his hair dragged upon the ground."—In Gildemeister, 154.

c. 1020.—"There you enter the country of Lárán, where is Jaimúr, then Malia, then Kánji, then Darúd, where there is a great gulf in which is Sinkaldíp (Sinhala dvīpa), or the island of Sarandíp."—Al Birūnī, as given by Rashiduddīn, in Elliot, i. 66.

1275.—"The island Sailan is a vast island between China and India, 80 parasangs in circuit. . . . It produces wonderful things, sandal-wood, spikenard, cinnamon, cloves, brazil, and various spices. . . ."—Kazvīnī, in Gildemeister, 203.

1298.—"You come to the island of Seilan, which is in good sooth the best island of its size in the world."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 14.

c. 1300.—"There are two courses . . . from this place (Ma'bar); one leads by sea to Chín and Máchín, passing by the island of Silán."—Rashiduddīn, in Elliot, i. 70.

1330.—"There is another island called Sillan. . . . In this . . . there is an exceeding great mountain, of which the folk relate that it was upon it that Adam mourned for his son one hundred years."—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, i. 98.

c. 1337.—"I met in this city (Brussa) the pious sheikh 'Abd-Allah-al-Misrī, the Traveller. He was a worthy man. He made the circuit of the earth, except he never entered China, nor the island of Sarandīb, nor Andalusia, nor the Sūdān. I have excelled him, for I have visited those regions."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 321.

c. 1350.—". . . I proceeded to sea by Seyllan, a glorious mountain opposite to Paradise. . . . 'Tis said the sound of the waters falling from the fountain of Paradise is heard there."—Marignolli, in Cathay, ii. 346.

c. 1420.—"In the middle of the Gulf there is a very noble island called Zeilam, which is 3000 miles in circumference, and on which they find by digging, rubies, sappires, garnets, and those stones which are called cats'-eyes."—N. Conti, in India in the XVth Century, 7.

1516.—"Leaving these islands of Mahal-diva . . . there is a very large and beautiful island which the Moors, Arabs, and Persians call Ceylam, and the Indians call it Ylinarim."—Barbosa, 166.

1586.—"This Ceylon is a brave Iland, very fruitful and fair."—Hakl. ii. 397.

1682.—". . . having run 35 miles North without seeing Zeilon."—Hedges, Diary, July 7; [Hak. Soc. i. 28].

1727.—A. Hamilton writes Zeloan (i. 340, &c.), and as late as 1780, in Dunn's Naval Directory, we find Zeloan throughout.

1781.—"We explored the whole coast of Zelone, from Pt. Pedro to the Little Basses, looked into every port and spoke to every vessel we saw, without hearing of French vessels."—Price's Letter to Ph. Francis, in Tracts, i. 9.

1830.—

"For dearer to him are the shells that sleep
By his own sweet native stream,
Than all the pearls of Serendeeep,
Or the Ava ruby's gleam!
Home! Home! Friends—health—repose,
What are Golconda's gems to those?"

Bengal Annual.

CHABEE, s. H. chābī, chābhī, 'a key,' from Port. chave. In Bengali it becomes sābī, and in Tam. sāvī. In Sea-H. 'a fid.'

CHABOOTRA, s. H. chabūtrā and chābūtara, a paved or plastered platform, often attached to a house, or in a garden.

c. 1810.—"It was a burning evening in June, when, after sunset, I accompanied Mr. Sherwood to Mr. Martin's bungalow. . . . We were conducted to the Cherbuter. . . this Cherbuter was many feet square, and chairs were set for the guests."—Autobiog. of Mrs. Sherwood, 345.

1811.—". . . the Chabootah or Terrace."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 114.

1827.—"The splendid procession, having entered the royal gardens, approached through a long avenue of lofty trees, a chabootra or platform of white marble canopied by arches of the same material."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiv.

1834.—"We rode up to the Chabootra, which has a large enclosed court before it, and the Darogha received us with the respect which my showy escort claimed."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 133.

CHACKUR, s. P.—H. chākar, 'a servant.' The word is hardly ever now used in Anglo-Indian households except as a sort of rhyming amplification to Naukar (see NOKUR): "Naukar-chākar," the whole following. But in a past generation there was a distinction made between naukar, the superior servant, such as a munshī, a gomāshā, a chobdar, a khānāma, &c., and chākar, a menial servant. Williamson gives a curious list of both classes, showing what a large Calcutta household embraced at the beginning of last century (V. M. i. 185-187).

1810.—“Such is the superiority claimed by the noters, that to ask one of them ‘whose chāker he is!’ would be considered a gross insult.”—Williamson, i. 187.

CHALIA, CHALÉ, n.p. Chālyam, Chāliyam, or Chālayam; an old port of Malabar, on the south side of the Beypur [see BEYPOOR] R., and opposite Beypur. The terminal station of the Madras Railway is in fact where Chālyam was. A plate is given in the Lendas of Correa, which makes this plain. The place is incorrectly alluded to as Kalyān in Imp. Gazetteer, ii. 49; more correctly on next page as Chālium. [See Lojan, Malabar, i. 75.]

c. 1330.—See in Abulfeda, “Shāliyāt, a city of Malabar.”—Gildemeister, 185.

c. 1344.—“I went then to Shāliyāt, a very pretty town, where they make the stuffs that bear its name [see SHALEE]. . . . Thence I returned to Kalikut.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 109.

1516.—“Beyond this city (Calicut) towards the south there is another city called Chalyani, where there are numerous Moors, natives of the country, and much shipping.”—Barbosa, 153.

c. 1570.—“And it was during the reign of this prince that the Franks erected their fort at Shaleeat . . . it thus commanded the trade between Arabia and Calicut, since between the last city and Shaleeat the distance was scarcely 2 parasangs.”—Tahfut-ul-Mujahideen, p. 129.

1572.—

“A Sampaio feroz succederá
Cunha, que longo tempo tem o leme:
De Chale as torres altas erguerá Em quanto Dio illustre delle treme.”

Camões, x. 61.

By Burton:

“Then shall succeed to fierce Sampaio's powers Cunha, and hold the helm for many a year, building of Chale-town the lofty towers, while quakes illustrious Diu his name to hear.”

[c. 1610.—“. . . crossed the river which separates the Calicut kingdom from that of a king named Chaly.”—Pyrrard de Lacul, Hak. Soc. i. 368.]

1672.—“Passammo Cinacotta situata alla bocca del fiume Ciali, douo li Portughesi hebbero altre volte Fortezza.”—P. Vincenzo Maria, 129.

CHAMPA, n.p. The name of a kingdom at one time of great power and importance in Indo-China, occupying the extreme S.E. of that region. A limited portion of its soil is still known by that name, but otherwise as the Binh-Thuân province of Cochin China. The race inhabiting this portion, Chams or Tiams, are traditionally said to have occupied the whole breadth of that peninsula to the Gulf of Siam, before the arrival of the Khmer or Kambojan people. It is not clear whether the people in question took their name from Champa, or Champa from the people; but in any case the form of Champa is Sanskrit, and probably it was adopted from India like Kamboja itself and so many other Indo-Chinese names. The original Champā was a city and kingdom on the Ganges, near the modern Bhāgalpur. And we find the Indo-Chinese Champa in the 7th century called Mahā-champā, as if to distinguish it. It is probable that the Zāpa or Zāpai of Ptolemy represents the name of this ancient kingdom; and it is certainly the Sanf or Chanf of the Arab navigators 600 years later; this form representing Champ as nearly as is possible to the Arabic alphabet.

c. A.D. 640.—“. . . plus loin à l'est, le royaume de Mo-ho-tchen-po” (Mahāchampā).—Hsüen Tsang, in Pèlerinage Bouddh. iii. 83.

851.—“Ships then proceed to the place called Sanf (or Chanf) . . . there fresh water is procured; from this place is exported the aloes-wood called Chanf. This is a kingdom.”—Relation des Voyages, &c., i. 18.

1298.—“You come to a country called Chamba, a very rich region, having a King of its own. The people are idolaters, and pay a yearly tribute to the Great Kaan . . . there are a very great number of Elephants in this Kingdom, and they have lign-aloës in great abundance.”—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 5.

c. 1300.—“Passing on from this, you come to a continent called Jampa, also subject to the Kaan. . . .”—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 71.

c. 1328.—“There is also a certain part of India called Champa. There, in place of horses, mules, asses, and camels, they make use of elephants for all their work.”—Friar Jordanus, 37.

1516.—“Having passed this island (Borneo) . . . towards the country of Ansiam and China, there is another great island of Gentiles called Champa; which has a King and language of its own, and many elephants. . . . There also grows in it aloës-wood.”—Barbosa, 204.

“Ves, corre a costa, que Champa se chama Cuja mata he do pao cheiroso ornada.”

Camões, x. 129.

By Burton :

“Here courseth, see, the callèd Champa
shore, with woods of odorous wood 'tis deckt and dight.”

1608.—“. . . thence (from Assam) eastward on the side of the northern mountains are the Nangata [i.e. Nāga] lands, the Land of Pukham lying on the ocean, Balgu [Baigu? i.e. Pegu], the land Rakhang, Hamsavati, and the rest of the realm of Munyang; beyond these Champa, Kamboja, etc. All these are in general named Koki.”—Taranatha (Tibetan) Hist. of Buddhism, by Schiefner, p. 262. The preceding passage is of great interest as showing a fair general knowledge of the kingdoms of Indo-China on the part of a Tibetan priest, and also as showing that Indo-China was recognised under a general name, viz. Koki.

1696.—“Mr. Bowyear says the Prince of Champa whom he met at the Cochin Chinese Court was very polite to him, and strenuously exhorted him to introduce the English to the dominions of Champa.”—In Dalrymple's Or. Repert. i. 67.

CHAMPANA, s. A kind of small vessel. (See SAMPAN.)

CHANDAUL, s. H. Chandāl, an outcaste, ‘used generally for a man of the lowest and most despised of the mixt tribes’ (Williams); ‘properly one sprung from a Sudra father and Brahman mother’ (Wilson). [The last is the definition of the Āin (ed. Jarrett, iii. 116). Dr. Wilson identifies them with the Kandali or Gondali of Ptolemy (Ind. Caste, i. 57).]

712.—“You have joined those Chandāls and coweaters, and have become one of them.”—Chach-Nāmāh, in Elliot, i. 193.

[1810.—“Chandela,” see quotation under HALALCORE.]

CHANDERNAGORE, n.p. The name of the French settlement on the Hoogly, 24 miles by river above Calcutta, originally occupied in 1673. The name is alleged by Hunter to be properly Chandan(a)-nagara, ‘Sandalwood City,’ but the usual form points rather to Chandra-nagara, ‘Moon City.’

[Natives prefer to call it Farash-danga, or ‘The gathering together of Frenchmen.’]

1727.—“He forced the Ostenders to quit their Factory, and seek protection from the French at Charnagur. . . . They have a few private Families dwelling near the Factory, and a pretty little Church to hear Mass in, which is the chief Business of the French in Bengal.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 18.

[1753.—“Shandernagor.” See quotation under CALCUTTA.]

CHANK, CHUNK, s. H. sankh, Skt. sankha, a large kind of shell (Turbinella rapa), prized by the Hindus, and used by them for offering libations, as a horn to blow at the temples, and for cutting into armlets and other ornaments. It is found especially in the Gulf of Manaar, and the Chank fishery was formerly, like that of the pearl-oysters, a Government monopoly (see Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 556, and the references). The abnormal chank, with its spiral opening to the right, is of exceptional value, and has been sometimes priced, it is said, at a lakh of rupees!

c. 545.—“Then there is Sieldiba, i.e. Taprobane . . . and then again on the continent, and further back is Marallo, which exports conch-shells (κοχλῖους).”—Cosmas, in Cathay, I. clxxviii.

851.—“They find on its shores (of Ceylon) the pearl, and the shank, a name by which they designate the great shell which serves for a trumpet, and which is much sought after.”—Reinaud, Relations, i. 6.

1563.—“. . . And this chanco is a ware for the Bengal trade, and formerly it produced more profit than now. . . . And there was formerly a custom in Bengal that no virgin in honour and esteem could be corrupted unless it were by placing bracelets of chanco on her arms; but since the Patans came in this usage has more or less ceased; and so the chanco is rated lower now. . . .”—Garcia, f. 141.

1644.—“What they chiefly bring (from Tuticorin) are cloths called *cachas . . . a large quantity of Chanquo; these are large shells which they fish in that sea, and which supply Bengal, where the blacks make of them bracelets for the arm; also the biggest and best fowls in all these Eastern parts.”—Bocarro, MS. 316.

1672.—“Garroude flew in all haste to Brahma, and brought to Kisna the chianko, or kinkhorn, twisted to the right.”—Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 521.

* These are probably the same as Milburn, under Tuticorin, calls ketchies. We do not know the proper name. [See Putton Ketchies, under PIECE-GOODS.]

1673.—“There are others they call chanquo; the shells of which are the Mother of Pearl.”—Fryer, 322.

1727.—“It admits of some Trade, and produces Cotton, Corn, coars Cloth, and Chonk, a Shell-fish in shape of a Periwinkle, but as large as a Man's Arm above the Elbow. In Bengal they are saw'd into Rings for Ornaments to Women's Arms.”—A. Hamilton, i. 131.

1734.—“Expended towards digging a foundation, where chanks were buried with accustomed ceremonies.”—In Wheeler, iii. 147.

1770.—“Upon the same coast is found a shell-fish called xanxus, of which the Indians at Bengal make bracelets.”—Raynal (tr. 1777) i. 216.

1813.—“A chank opening to the right hand is highly valued . . . always sells for its weight in gold.”—Milburn, i. 357.

Table of Customs Duties on Imports into British India up to 1875.

CHARPOY, s. H. chārpāī, from P. chihār-pāī (i.e. four-feet), the common Indian bedstead, sometimes of very rude materials, but in other cases handsomely wrought and painted. It is correctly described in the quotation from Ibn Batuta.

c. 1350.—“The beds in India are very light. A single man can carry one, and every traveller should have his own bed, which his slave carries about on his head. The bed consists of four conical legs, on which four staves are laid; between they plait a sort of ribbon of silk or cotton. When you lie on it you need nothing else to render the bed sufficiently elastic.”—iii. 380.

c. 1540.—“Husain Khan Tashtdār was sent on some business from Bengal. He went on travelling night and day. Whenever sleep came over him he placed himself on a bed (chahār-pāī) and the villagers carried him along on their shoulders.”—MS. quoted in Elliot, iv. 418.

1662.—“Turbans, long coats, trowsers, shoes, and sleeping on charpāis, are quite unusual.”—H. of Mir Jumla's Invasion of Assam, transl. by Blochmann, J.A.S.B. xli. pt. i. 80.

1876.—“A syce at Mozuffernuggar, lying asleep on a charpoy . . . was killed by a tame buck goring him in the side . . . it was supposed in play.”—Baldwin, Large and Small Game of Bengal, 195.

1883.—“After a gallop across country, he would rest on a charpoy, or country bed, and hold an impromptu levee of all the village folk.”—C. Raikes, in L. of L. Lawrence, i. 57.

CHATTA, s. An umbrella; H. chhattā, chhatr; Skt. chhatra.

c. 900.—“He is clothed in a waist-cloth, and holds in his hand a thing called a Jatra; this is an umbrella made of peacock's feathers.”—Reinard, Relations, &c. 154.

c. 1340.—“They hoist upon these elephants as many chatras, or umbrellas of silk, mounted with many precious stones, and with handles of pure gold.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 228.

c. 1354.—“But as all the Indians commonly go naked, they are in the habit of carrying a thing like a little tent-roof on a cane handle, which they open out at will as a protection against sun and rain. This they call a chatyr. I brought one home to Florence with me. . . .”—John Marignolli, in Cathay, &c. p. 381.

1673.—“Thus the chief Naik with his loud Musick . . . an Ensign of Red, Swallow-tailed, several Chitories, little but rich Kitsolls (which are the Names of several Countries for Umbrelloes). . . .”—Fryer, 160.

[1826.—“Another as my chitree-burdar or umbrella-carrier.”—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 28.]

CHATTY, s. An earthen pot, spheroidal in shape. It is a S. Indian word, but is tolerably familiar in the Anglo-Indian parlance of N. India also, though the H. Ghurra (ghard) is more commonly used there. The word is Tam. shāti, shatti, Tel. chatti, which appears in Pali as chāḍi.

1781.—“In honour of His Majesty's birthday we had for dinner fowl cutlets and a flour pudding, and drank his health in a chatty of sherbet.”—Narr. of an Officer of Baillie's Detachment, quoted in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 285.

1829.—“The chatties in which the women carry water are globular earthen vessels, with a bell-mouth at top.”—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 97.

CHAW, s. For chā, i.e. Tea (q.v.).

1616.—“I sent . . . a silver chaw pot and a fan to Capt. China wife.”—Cocks's Diary, i. 215.

CHAWBUCK, s. and v. A whip; to whip. An obsolete vulgarism from P. chābuk, ‘alert’; in H. ‘a horse-whip.’ It seems to be the same as the sjambok in use at the Cape, and apparently carried from India (see the quotation from Van Twist). [M]

CHEENAR, s. P. chīndr, the Oriental Plane (Platanus orientalis) and platanus of the ancients; native from Greece to Persia. It is often by English travellers in Persia miscalled sycamore from confusion with the common British tree (Acer pseudo-platanus), which English people also habitually miscall sycamore, and Scotch people miscall plane-tree! Our quotations show how old the confusion is. The tree is not a native of India, though there are fine chīndrs in Kashmere, and a few in old native gardens in the Punjab, introduced in the days of the Moghul emperors. The tree is the Arbre Sec of Marco Polo (see 2nd ed. vol. i. 131, 132). Chīndrs of especial vastness and beauty are described by Herodotus and Pliny, by Chardin and others. At Buyukdereh near Constantinople, is still shown the Plane under which Godfrey of Boulogne is said to have encamped. At Tejrīsh, N. of Teheran, Sir H. Rawlinson tells us that he measured a great chīndr which has a girth of 108 feet at 5 feet from the ground.

“We in our Return cannot but take notice of the famous Walk between the two Cities of Jelfa and Ispahan; it is planted with two rows of Sycamores (which is the tall Maple, not the Sycamore of Alkair).”—Ibid. 286.

1682.—“At the elegant villa and garden at Mr. Bohun's at Lee. He shewed me the Zinnar tree or platanus, and told me that since they had planted this kind of tree about the City of Ispahan . . . the plague . . . had exceedingly abated of its mortal effects.”— Evelyn's Diary, Sept. 16.

1783.—“This tree, which in most parts of Asia is called the Chinaur, grows to the size of an oak, and has a taper straight trunk, with a silver-coloured bark, and its leaf, not unlike an expanded hand, is of a pale green.”—J. Forster's Journey, ii. 17.

Chīndr is alleged to be in Badakhshān applied to a species of poplar.

1810.—“The superior kind (of raw sugar) which may often be had nearly white . . . and sharp-grained, under the name of cheeny.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 134.

CHEESE, s. This word is well known to be used in modern English slang for “anything good, first-rate in quality, genuine, pleasant, or advantageous” (Slang Dict.). And the most probable source of the term is P. and H. chīz, ‘thing.’ For the expression used to be common among Anglo-Indians, e.g., “My new Arab is the real chīz”; “These cheroots are the real chīz,” i.e. the real thing. The word may have been an Anglo-Indian importation, and it is difficult otherwise to account for it. [This view is accepted by the N.E.D.; for other explanations see 1 ser. N. & Q. viii. 89; 3 ser. vii. 465, 505.]

CHEETA, s. H. chītā, the Felis jubata, Schreber, [Cynaelurus jubatus, Blanford], or ‘Hunting Leopard,’ so called from its being commonly trained to use in the chase. From Skt. chitraka, or chitrakūya, lit. ‘having a speckled body.’

1563.—“. . . and when they wish to pay him much honour they call him Rāo; as for example Chita-Rāo, whom I am acquainted with; and this is a proud name, for Chita signifies ‘Ounce’ (or panther) and this Chita-Rāo means ‘King as strong as a Panther.’”—Garcia, f. 36.

c. 1596.—“Once a leopard (chīta) had been caught, and without previous training, on a mere hint by His Majesty, it brought in the prey, like trained leopards.”—Āin-i-Akbarī, ed. Blochmann, i. 286.

CHIAMAY, n.p. The name of an imaginary lake, which in the maps of the 16th century, followed by most of those of the 17th, is made the source of most of the great rivers of Further India, including the Brahmaputra, the Irawadi, the Salwen, and the Menam. Lake Chiamay was the counterpart of the African lake of the same period which is made the source of all the great rivers of Africa, but it is less easy to suggest what gave rise to this idea of it. The actual name seems taken from the State of Zimmé (see JANGOMAY) or Chiang-mai.

Heylin's Cosmographie*, ii. 238.

CHICANE, CHICANERY, ss.

These English words, signifying pettifoggery, captious contention, taking every possible advantage in a contest, have been referred to Spanish chico, ‘little,’ and to Fr. chic, chicquet, ‘a little bit,’ as by Mr. Wedgwood in his Dict. of Eng. Etymology. See also quotation from Saturday Review below. But there can be little doubt that the words are really traceable to the game of chanyān, or horse-golf. This game is now well known in England under the name of Polo (q.v.). But the recent introduction under that name is its second importation into Western Europe. For in the Middle Ages it came from Persia to Byzantium, where it was popular under a modification of its Persian name (verb τῆκανιζεῖν, playing ground τῆκανιστήριον), and from Byzantium it passed, as a pedestrian game, to Languedoc, where it was called, by a further modification, chicane (see Ducange, Dissertation sur l'Histoire de St. Louis, viii., and his Glossarium Graecitatis, s.v. τῆς καλῆς; also Ouseley's Travels, i. 345). The analogy of certain periods of the game of golf suggests how the figurative meaning of chicaner might arise in taking advantage of the petty accidents of the surface. And this is the strict meaning of chicaner, as used by military writers.

Ducange's idea was that the Greeks had borrowed both the game and the name from France, but this is evidently erroneous. He was not aware of the Persian chaugān. But he explains well how the tactics of the game would have led to the application of its name to "those tortuous proceedings of pleaders which we old practitioners call barres." The indication of the Persian origin of both the Greek and French words is due to W. Ouseley and to Quatremère. The latter has an interesting note, full of his usual wealth of Oriental reading, in his translation of Makrizi's Mameluke Sultans, tom. i. pt. i. pp. 121 seqq.

The preceding etymology was put forward again in Notes upon Mr. Wedgwood's Dictionary published by one of the present writers in Ocean Highways, Sept. 1872, p. 186. The same etymology has since been given by Littré (s.v.), who says: "Dès lors, la série des sens est: jeu de mail, puis action de disputer la partie, et enfin manœuvres processives"; [and is accepted by the N.E.D. with the reservation that "evidence actually connecting the French with the Greek word appears not to be known"].

The P. forms of the name are chaugān and chauigān; but according to the Bahārī 'Ajam (a great Persian dictionary compiled in India, 1768) the primitive form of the word is chulgān from chāl, 'bent,' which (as to the form) is corroborated by the Arabic sawljān. On the other hand, a probable origin of chaugān would be an Indian (Prakrit) word, meaning 'four corners' [Platts gives chaugāna, 'four-fold'], viz. as a name for the polo-ground. The chulgān is possibly a 'striving after meaning.' The meanings are according to Vüllers (1) any stick with a crook; (2) such a stick used as a drumstick; (3) a crook from which a steel ball is suspended, which was one of the royal insignia, otherwise called kaukaba [see Blochmann, Āin, vol. i. plate ix. No. 2.];

(4) (The golf-stick, and) the game of horse-golf.

The game is now quite extinct in Persia and Western Asia, surviving only in certain regions adjoining India, as is specified under POLO. But for many centuries it was the game of kings and courts over all Mahommedan Asia. The earliest Mahommedan historians represent the game of chaugān as familiar to the Sassanian kings; Ferdusi puts the chaugān-stick into the hands of Siāwūsh, the father of Kai Khusrū or Cyrus; many famous kings were devoted to the game, among whom may be mentioned Nūriddīn the Just, Atābek of Syria and the great enemy of the Crusaders. He was so fond of the game that he used (like Akbar in after days) to play it by lamp-light, and was severely rebuked by a devout Mussulman for being so devoted to a mere amusement. Other zealous chaugān-players were the great Saladin, Jalāluddīn Mankbarni of Khwārizm, and Malik Bībars, Marco Polo's "Bendocquedar Soldan of Babylon," who was said more than once to have played chaugān at Damascus and at Cairo within the same week. Many illustrious persons also are mentioned in Asiatic history as having met their death by accidents in the maidān, as the chaugān-field was especially called; e.g. Kutbuddīn Ibak of Delhi, who was killed by such a fall at Lahore in (or about) 1207. In Makrizi (I. i. 121) we read of an Amīr at the Mameluke Court called Husāmuddīn Lajīn 'Azīzī the Jukāndār (or Lord High Polo-stick).

It is not known when the game was conveyed to Constantinople, but it must have been not later than the beginning of the 8th century.* The fullest description of the game as played there is given by Johannes Cinnamus (c. 1190), who does not however give the barbarian name:

"The winter now being over and the gloom cleared away, he (the Emperor Manuel Comnenus) devoted himself to a certain sober exercise which from the first had been the custom of the Emperors and their sons to practise. This is the manner thereof. A party of young men divide into two equal bands, and in a flat space which has been measured out purposely they cast a leather ball in size somewhat like an apple; and setting this in the middle as if it were a prize to be contended for they rush into the contest at full speed, each grasping in his right hand a stick of moderate length which comes suddenly to a broad rounded end, the middle of which is closed by a network of dried catgut. Then each party strives who shall first send the ball beyond the goal planted conspicuously on the opposite side, for whenever the ball is struck by the netted sticks through the goal at either side, that gives the victory to the other side. This is the kind of game, evidently a slippery and dangerous one. For a player must be continually throwing himself right back, or bending to one side or the other, as he turns his horse short, or suddenly dashes off at speed, with such strokes and twists as are needed to follow up the ball. . . . And thus as the Emperor was rushing round in furious fashion in this game, it so happened that the horse which he rode came violently to the ground. He was prostrate below the horse, and as he struggled vainly to extricate himself from its incumbent weight his thigh and hand were crushed beneath the saddle and much injured. . . .”—In Bonn ed. pp. 263-264.

We see from this passage that at Byzantium the game was played with a kind of racket, and not with a polo-stick.

We have not been able to find an instance of the medieval French chicane in this sense, nor does Littré's Dictionary give any. But Ducange states positively that in his time the word in this sense survived in Languedoc, and there could be no better evidence. From Henschel's Ducange also we borrow a quotation which shows chuca, used for some game of ball, in French-Latin, surely a form of chaugān or chicane.

The game of chaugān, the ball (gū or gavī) and the playing-ground (maidān) afford constant metaphors in Persian literature.

c. 820.—“If a man dream that he is on horseback along with the King himself, or some great personage, and that he strikes the ball home, or wins the chukān (ἡτοι τζυκανίζει) he shall find grace and favour thereupon, conformable to the success of his ball and the dexterity of his horse.” Again: “If the King dream that he has won in the chukān (ὅτι ἐτζυκανίσειν) he shall find things prosper with him.”—The Dream Judgments of Achmet Ibn Seirim, from a MS. Greek version quoted by Ducange in Gloss. Graecitatis.

c. 940. — Constantine Porphyrogenitus, speaking of the rapids of the Danapris or Dnieper, says: “ὁ δὲ τοῦτο φραγμὸς τοσοῦ-

c. 1030-40.—“Whenever you march . . . you must take these people with you, and you must . . . not allow them to drink wine or to play at chaughān.”—Baihaki, in Elliot, ii. 120.

1560.—“They (the Arabs) are such great riders that they play tennis on horseback” (que jogão a choca a cavallo).—Tenreiro, Itinerario, ed. 1762, p. 359.

c. 1590.—“His Majesty also plays at chaugān in dark nights. . . the balls which are used at night are set on fire. . . . For the sake of adding splendour to the games . . . His Majesty has knobs of gold and silver fixed to the tops of the chaugān sticks. If one of them breaks, any player that gets hold of the pieces may keep them.”—Āin-i-Akbarī, i. 298; [ii. 303].

1837.—“The game of choughan mentioned by Baher is still played everywhere in Tibet; it is nothing but ‘hockey on horseback,’ and is excellent fun.”—Vigne, in J. A. S. Bengal, vi. 774.

In the following I would say, in justice to the great man whose words are quoted, that chicane is used in the quasi-military sense of taking every possible advantage of the ground in a contest :

1761.—“I do suspect that some of the great Ones have had hopes given to them that the Dutch may be induced to join us in this war against the Spaniards,—if such an Event should take place I fear some sacrifices will be made in the East Indies—I pray God my suspicions may be without foundation. I think Delays and Chicanery is allowable against those who take Advantage of the times, our Distresses, and situation.” — Unpublished Holograph Letter from Lord Clive, in India Office Records. Dated Berkeley Square, and indorsed 27th Decr. 1761.

1881.—“One would at first sight be inclined to derive the French chic from the English ‘cheek’; but it appears that the English is itself the derived word, chic being an old Romance word signifying fineness, or subtlety, and forming the root of our own word chicanery.” — Sat. Rev., Sept. 10, p. 326 (Essay on French Slang).

a. H.—P. chik; a kind of screen-blind made of finely-split bamboo, laced with twine, and often painted on the outer side. It is hung or framed in doorways or windows, both in houses and in tents. The thing [which is described by Roe,] may possibly have come in with the Mongols, for we find in Kovalefski’s Mongol Dict. (2174) “Tchik = Natte.” The Āin (i. 226) has chigh. Chicks are now made in London, as well as imported from China and Japan. Chicks are described by Clavijo in the tents of Timour’s chief wife :

1404.—“And this tent had two doors, one in front of the other, and the first doors were of certain thin coloured wands, joined one to another like in a hurdle, and covered on the outside with a texture of rose-coloured silk, and finely woven; and these doors were made in this fashion, in order that when shut the air might yet enter, whilst those within could see those outside, but those outside could not see those who were within.” — § cxxvi.

[1616.—His wives “whose Curiositye made them breake little holes in a grate of reede that hung before it to gaze on mee.” — Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 321.]

1673.—“Glass is dear, and scarcely purchaseable . . . therefore their Windows are usually folding doors, screened with Cheeks or latises.” — Fryer, 92.

The pron. check is still not uncommon among English people:—“The Coach where the Women were was covered with cheeks, a sort of hanging Curtain, made with Bents variously coloured with Lacker, and Chequered with Packthred so artificially that you see all without, and yourself within unperceived.” — Fryer, 83.

1810.—“Cheeks or Screens to keep out the glare.” — Williamson, V. M. ii. 43.

1825.—“The check of the tent prevents effectually any person from seeing what passes within. . . .” — Heber (ed. 1844), i. 192.

b. Short for chicken, a sum of four rupees. This is the Venetian zecchino, cechino, or sequin, a gold coin long current on the shores of India, and which still frequently turns up in treasure-trove, and in hoards. In the early part of the 15th century Nicolo Conti mentions that in some parts of India, Venetian ducats, i.e. sequins, were current (p. 30). And recently, in fact in our own day, chick was a term in frequent Anglo-Indian use, e.g. “I’ll bet you a chick.”

The word zecchino is from the Zecca, or Mint at Venice, and that name is of Arabic origin, from sikka, ‘a coining die.’ The double history of this word is curious. We have just seen how in one form, and by what circuitous secular journey, through Egypt, Venice, India, it has gained a place in the Anglo-Indian Vocabulary. By a directer route it has also found a distinct place in the same repository under the form Sicca (q.v.), and in this shape it still retains a ghostly kind of existence at the India Office. It is remarkable how first the spread of Saracenic power and civilisation, then the spread of Venetian commerce and coinage, and lastly the spread of English commerce and power, should thus have brought together two words identical in origin, after so widely divergent a career.

The sequin is sometimes called in the South shūnārcash, because the Doge with his sceptre is taken for the Shūnār, or toddy-drawer climbing the palm-tree! [See Burnell, Linschoten, i. 243.] (See also VENETIAN.)

We apprehend that the gambling phrases ‘chicken-stakes’ and ‘chicken-nazard’ originate in the same word.

1583.—“Chickinos which be pieces of Golde woorth seven shillings a piece sterling.” — Caesar Frederici, in Hakl. ii. 343.

1608.—“When I was there (at Venice) a chiquiney was worth eleven livers and twelve sols.” — Coryat’s Crudities, ii. 68.

1609.—“Three or four thousand chequins were as pretty a proportion to live quietly in Europe by the name of the Greek Partridge."—Elphinstone's Caubool, ed. 1839, i. 192; ["the same bird which is called Chicore by the natives and fire-eater by the English in Bengal."—Ibid. ii. 95].

c. 1815.—"One day in the fort he found a hill-partridge enclosed in a wicker basket. . . . This bird is called the chuckoor, and is said to eat fire."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog., 440.

1850.—"A flight of birds attracted my attention; I imagine them to be a species of bustard or grouse—black beneath and with much white about the wings—they were beyond our reach; the people called them Chukore."—K. Abbott, Notes during a Journey in Persia, in J. R. Geog. Soc. xxv. 41.

CHILAW, n.p. A place on the west coast of Ceylon, an old seat of the pearl-fishery. The name is a corruption of the Tam. salābham, 'the diving'; in Singhalese it is Haluwatta. The name was commonly applied by the Portuguese to the whole aggregation of shoals (Baixos de Chilao) in the Gulf of Manaar, between Ceylon and the coast of Madura and Tinnevely.

1610.—"La pesqueria de Chilao . . . por hazerse antiguamente in un puerto del mismo nombre en la isla de Seylan . . . llamado así por ista causa; por que chilao, en lengua Chengala, . . . quiere dezir pesqueria."—Teixeira, Pt. ii. 29.

CHILLUM, s. H. chilam; "the part of the hukka (see HOOKA) which contains the tobacco and charcoal balls, whence it is sometimes loosely used for the pipe itself, or the act of smoking it" (Wilson). It is also applied to the replenishment of the bowl, in the same way as a man asks for "another glass." The tobacco, as used by the masses in the hubble-bubble, is cut small and kneaded into a pulp with goor, i.e. molasses, and a little water. Hence actual contact with glowing charcoal is needed to keep it alight.

1781.—"Dressing a hubble-bubble, per week at 3 chillums a day.

fan 0, dubs 3, cash 0."

—Prison Experiences in Captivity of Hon. J. Lindsay, in Lives of Lindsays, iii.

1811.—"They have not the same scruples for the Chillum as for the rest of the Hooka, and it is often lent . . . whereas the very proposition for the Hooka gives rise frequently to the most ridiculous quarrels."—Solvyns, iii.

1828.—"Every sound was hushed but the noise of that wind . . . and the occasional bubbling of my hookah, which had just been furnished with another chillum."—The Kuzsilbash, i. 2.

1829.—"Tugging away at your hookah, find no smoke; a thief having purloined your silver chelam and surpoose."—Johanna Shipp, ii. 159.

1848.—"Jos however . . . could not think of moving till his baggage was cleared, or of travelling until he could do so with his chillum."—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. xxiii.

CHILLUMBRUM, n.p. A town in S. Arcot, which is the site of a famous temple of Siva, properly Shidamburam. Etym. obscure. [Garstin (Man. S. Arcot, 400) gives the name as Chedambaram, or more correctly Chittambalam, 'the atmosphere of wisdom.'] 1755.—"Scheringham (Seringam), Schalembron, et (Jengy m'offroient également la retraite après laquelle je soupirois."—Anquetil du Perron, Zendav. Disc. Prelim. xxviii.

CHILLUMCHEE, s. H. chilamchī, also silfchī, and silpchī, of which chilamchī is probably a corruption. A basin of brass (as in Bengal), or tinned copper (as usually in the West and South) for washing hands. The form of the word seems Turkish, but we cannot trace it.

1715.—"We prepared for our first present, viz., 1000 gold mohurs . . . the unicorn's horn . . . the astoa (?) and chelumgie of Manilla work. . . ."—In Wheeler, ii. 246.

1833.—"Our supper was a peelaw . . . when it was removed a chillumchee and goblet of warm water was handed round, and each washed his hands and mouth."—P. Gordon, Fragment of the Journal of a Tour, &c.

1851.—"When a chillumchee of water sans soap was provided, 'Have you no soap?' Sir C. Napier asked—"—Mawson, Indian Command of Sir C. Napier.

1857.—"I went alone to the Fort Adjutant, to report my arrival, and inquire to what regiment of the Bengal army I was likely to be posted.

"Army!—regiment!" was the reply. 'There is no Bengal Army; it is all in revolt. . . . Provide yourself with a camp-bedstead, and a chillumchee, and wait for orders.'

"I saluted and left the presence of my superior officer, deeply pondering as to the possible nature and qualities of a chillumchee, but not venturing to enquire further."—Lt.-Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 3.

There is an Anglo-Indian tradition, which we would not vouch for, that one of the orators on the great Hastings trial depicted the oppressor on some occasion, as "grasping his chillum in one hand and his chillumchee in the other."

The latter word is used chiefly by Anglo-Indians of the Bengal Presidency and their servants. In Bombay the article has another name. And it is told of a gallant veteran of the old Bengal Artillery, who was full of "Presidential" prejudices, that on hearing the Bombay army commended by a brother officer, he broke out in just wrath: "The Bombay Army! Don't talk to me of the Bombay Army! They call a chillumchee a gindy!—THE BEASTS!"

CHILLY, s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of the pod of red pepper (Capicum frutescens and C. annuum, Nat. Ord. Solanaceae). There can be little doubt that the name, as stated by Bontius in the quotation, was taken from Chili in S. America, whence the plant was carried to the Indian Archipelago, and thence to India.

[1604.—"Indian pepper. . . . In the language of Cusco, it is called Vchu, and in that of Mexico, chilli."—Grimston, tr. D'Acosta, H. W. Indies, I. Bk. iv. 239 (Sharp, Dict.)]

1631.—". . . eos addere fructum Ricini Americani, quod iada Chilli Malaii vocant, quasi dicas Piper e Chille, Brasiliæ contramina regione."—Jac. Bontii, Dial. V. p. 10.

Again (lib. vi. cap. 40, p. 131) Bontius calls it 'piper Chilensis,' and also 'Ricinus Brasiliensis.' But his commentator, Piso, observes that Ricinus is quite improper; "vera Piperis sive Capsici Brasiliensis species apparet." Bontius says it was a common custom of natives, and even of certain Dutchmen, to keep a piece of chilly continually chewed, but he found it intolerable.

1848.—"Try a chilly with it, Miss Sharp," said Joseph, really interested. 'A chilly?' said Rebecca, gasping. 'Oh yes!' . . . 'How fresh and green they look,' she said, and put one into her mouth. It was hotter than the curry; flesh and blood could bear it no longer."—Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

CHIMNEY-GLASS, s. Gardener's name, on the Bombay side of India, for the flower and plant Allamanda cathartica (Sir G. Birdwood).

A, n.p. The European knows this name in the form Thinner as goes back nearly to the . . . era. The famous mention kinim by the prophet Isaiah rry us much further back, but he possibility of that referring inese must be abandoned, as likewise, perhaps, the similar on of the name Chinas in Sanskrit works. The most origin of the name—which ally a name applied by to the country—as yet sug-; that put forward by Baron ichthofen, that it comes from an old name of Tongking, at in Jih-nan lay the only port is open for foreign trade with the beginning of our era, and , province was then included ratively within the limits of oper (see Reichthofen, China, i. the same author's papers in s. of the Berlin Geog. Soc. for id a paper by one of the present Proc. R. Geog. Soc., November er theory has been suggested iend M. Terrien de la Couperie borate note, of which we can e the general gist. Whilst accepts the suggestion that or Tongking, anciently called as the Kattigara of Ptolemy's , he denies that Jih-nan can n the origin of Sinae. This on two chief grounds: (1) -nan was not Kiao-chi, but a a good deal further south, ding to the modern province Vghé Ane, in the map of M. de Rhina, the capital of about 2° 17' in lat. S. of This is distinctly stated in al Geography of Annam. An of the twelve provinces of hina proper till 1820-41, when, o others, it was transferred king. Also, in the Chinese l Atlas, Jih-nan lies in Chen-ia. Cochin-China. (2) That nt pronunciation of Jih-nan, ted by the Chinese authorities lan period, was Nit-nam. It ounced in Sinico-Annamite st archaic of the Chinese Nhut-nam, and in Cantonese . M. Terrien further points the export of Chinese goods, traffic with the south and west, was for several centuries B.C. monopolised by the State of Tsen (now pronounced in Sinico-Annamite Chen, and in Mandarin Tien), which corresponded to the centre and west of modern Yun-nan. The She-ki of Sze-ma Tsien (B.C. 91), and the Annals of the Han Dynasty afford interesting information on this subject. When the Emperor Wu-ti, in consequence of Chang-Kien's information brought back from Bactria, sent envoys to find the route followed by the traders of Shuh (i.e. Sze-chuen) to India, these envoys were detained by Tang-Kiang, King of Tsen, who objected to their exploring trade-routes through his territory, saying haughtily: "Has the Han a greater dominion than ours?"

M. Terrien conceives that as the only communication of this Tsen State with the Sea would be by the Song-Koi R., the emporium of sea-trade with that State would be at its mouth, viz. at Kiaoti or Kattigara. Thus, he considers, the name of Tsen, this powerful and arrogant State, the monopoliser of trade-routes, is in all probability that which spread far and wide the name of Chin, Sin, Sinae, Thinae, and preserved its predominance in the mouths of foreigners, even when, as in the 2nd century of our era, the great Empire of the Han has extended over the Delta of the Song-Koi.

This theory needs more consideration than we can now give it. But it will doubtless have discussion elsewhere, and it does not disturb Richthofen's identification of Kattigara.

[Prof. Giles regards the suggestions of Richthofen and T. de la Couperie as mere guesses. From a recent reconsideration of the subject he has come to the conclusion that the name may possibly be derived from the name of a dynasty, Ch'in or Tsin, which flourished B.C. 255-207, and became widely known in India, Persia, and other Asiatic countries, the final a being added by the Portuguese.]

c. A.D. 80-89.—"Behind this country (Chryse) the sea comes to a termination somewhere in Thin, and in the interior of that country, quite to the north, there is a very great city called Thinae, from which raw silk and silk thread and silk stuffs are brought overland through Bactria to Barygaza, as they are on the other hand by the Ganges River to Limyricē. It is not easy, however, to get to this Thin, and few and far between are those who come from it. . . . —Periplus Maris Erythraei; see Müller, Geogr. Gr. Min. i. 303.

c. 150—"The inhabited part of our earth is bounded on the east by the Unknown Land which lies along the region occupied by the easternmost races of Asia Minor, the Sinae and the natives of Sericē. . . ."—Claudius Ptolemy, Bk. vii. ch. 5.

c. 545.—"The country of silk, I may mention, is the remotest of all the Indies, lying towards the left when you enter the Indian Sea, but a vast distance further off than the Persian Gulf or that island which the Indians call Selediba, and the Greeks Taprobane. Tzinitza (elsewhere Tzinista) is the name of the Country, and the Ocean compasses it round to the left, just as the same Ocean compasses Barbari (i.e. the Somali Country) round to the right. And the Indian philosophers called Brachmans tell you that if you were to stretch a straight cord from Tzinitza through Persia to the Roman territory, you would just divide the world in halves."—Cosmas, Topog. Christ., Bk. II.

c. 641.—"In 641 the King of Magadha (Behar, &c.) sent an ambassador with a letter to the Chinese Court. The emperor . . . in return directed one of his officers to go to the King . . . and to invite his submission. The King Shiloyto (Siladitya) was all astonishment. 'Since time immemorial,' he asked his officer, 'did ever an ambassador come from Mohochintan?' . . . The Chinese author remarks that in the tongue of the barbarians the Middle Kingdom is called Mohochintan (Mahā-Chīna-sthāna)."—From Cathay, &c. lxviii.

781.—"Adam Priest and Bishop and Pope of Tzinesthan. . . . The preachings of our Fathers to the King of Tzinia."—Syriac Par. of the Inscription of Singanfu.

11th Century.—The "King of China" (Shinattarashan) appears in the list of provinces and monarchies in the great Inscription of the Tanjore Pagoda.

1128.—"China and Mahachina appear in a list of places producing silk and other cloths in the Abhilashitārthachintāmani of the Chālukya King."—*Somesvaradiva (M.S.) Bk. III. ch. 6.

1298.—"You must know the Sea in which lie the Islands of those parts is called the Sea of Chin. . . . For, in the language in those Isles, when they say Chin, 'tis Manzan they mean."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. iv.

* It may be well to append here the whole list which I find on a scrap of paper in Dr. Burnell's handwriting (Y):

Pohālapura.	Anitavāta (Anhīlvād).
Chīnavallī.	Sunāpura.
Avantikshetra (Ujjain).	Mūlasthāna (Multan).

Thānaka (Thana ?)	Vaṅgadeśa (Bengal).

c. 1300.—“Large ships, called in the language of Chin ‘junks,’ bring various sorts of choice merchandize and cloths. . . .”—Rashīduddīn, in Elliot, i. 69.

1516.—“ . . . there is the Kingdom of China, which they say is a very extensive dominion, both along the coast of the sea, and in the interior. . . .”—Barbosa, 204.

1563.—“R. Then Ruelius and Mathiolus of Siena say that the best camphor is from China, and that the best of all Camphors is that purified by a certain barbarian King whom they call King (of) China.

“O. Then you may tell Ruelius and Mathiolus of Siena that though they are so well acquainted with Greek and Latin, there’s no need to make such a show of it as to call every body ‘barbarians’ who is not of their own race, and that besides this they are quite wrong in the fact . . . that the King of China does not occupy himself with making camphor, and is in fact one of the greatest Kings known in the world.”—Garcia De Orta, f. 45b.

c. 1590.—“Near to this is Pegu, which former writers called Cheen, accounting this to be the capital city.”—Ayeen, ed. 1800, ii. 4; [tr. Jarrett, ii. 119]. (See MACHEEN.)

CHINA, s. In the sense of porcelain this word (Chīnī, &c.) is used in Asiatic languages as well as in English. In English it does not occur in Minshew (2nd ed. 1627), though it does in some earlier publications. [The earliest quotation in N.E.D. is from Cogan’s Pinto, 1653.] The phrase China-dishes as occurring in Drake and in Shakspeare, shows how the word took the sense of porcelain in our own and other languages. The phrase China-dishes as first used was analogous to *Turkey-carpet*s. But in the latter we have never lost the geographical sense of the adjective. In the word turquoises, again, the phrase was no doubt originally pierres turquoises, or the like, and here, as in china dishes, the specific has superseded the generic sense. The use of arab in India for an Arab horse is analogous to china. The word is used in the sense of a china dish in Lane’s Arabian Nights, iii. 492; [Burton, I. 375].

851.—“There is in China a very fine clay with which they make vases transparent like bottles; water can be seen inside of them. These vases are made of clay.”—Reinaud, Relations, i. 34.

c. 1350.—“China-ware (al-fakhkhār al-Sīnī) is not made except in the cities of Zaitūn and of Sīn Kalān. . . .”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 256.

c. 1530.—“I was passing one day along a street in Damascus, when I saw a slave-boy let fall from his hands a great China dish (ṣahfat min al-bakkhār al-Sīnī) which they call in that country sahn. It broke, and a crowd gathered round the little Mameluke.”—Ibn Batuta, i. 238.

c. 1567.—“Le mercantie ch’andauano ogn’ anno da Goa a Bezeneger erano molti caualli Arabi . . . e anche pezze di China, zafaran, e scarlatti.”—Cesare de’ Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 389.

1579.—“ . . . we met with one ship more loaden with linnen, China silke, and China dishes. . . .”—Drake, World Encompassed, in Hak. Soc. 112.

c. 1580.—“Usus vasorum aureorum et argenteorum Aegyptii rejecerunt, ubi murrhina vasa adinvenere; quae ex India afferuntur, et ex ea regione quam Sini vocant, ubi conficiuntur ex variis lapidibus, praecipueque ex jaspide.”—Prosp. Alpinus, Pt. I. p. 55.

c. 1590.—“The gold and silver dishes are tied up in red cloths, and those in Copper and China (chīnī) in white ones.”—Āīn, i. 58.

c. 1603.—“ . . . as it were in a fruit-dish, a dish of some threepence, your honours have seen such dishes; they are not China dishes, but very good dishes.”—Measure for Measure, ii. 1.

1608-9.—“A faire China dish (which cost ninetie Rupias, or forty-five Reals of eight) was broken.”—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 220.

1609.—“He has a lodging in the Strand for the purpose, or to watch when ladies are gone to the China-house, or the Exchange, that he may meet them by chance and give them presents. . . .”

“Ay, sir: his wife was the rich China-woman, that the courtiers visited so often.”—Ben Jonson, Silent Woman, i. 1.

1615.—

“ . . . Oh had I now my Wishes, Sure you should learn to make their China Dishes.”

Doggrel prefixed to Coryat’s Crudities.

c. 1690.—Kaempfer in his account of the Persian Court mentions that the department where porcelain and plate dishes, &c., were kept and cleaned was called Chīn-khāna, ‘the China-closet’; and those servants who carried in the dishes were called Chīnikash.—Amoen. Exot., p. 125.

1711.—“Purselaine, or China-ware is so tender a Commodity that good Instructions are as necessary for Package as Purchase.”—Lockyer, 126.

1747.—“The Art of Cookery made Plain and Easy; which far Exceeds any Thing of the Kind yet Published. By a Lady. London. Printed for the Author, and Sold by Mrs. Asburn a China Shop Woman, Corner of Fleet Ditch, MDCCXLVII.” This the title of the original edition of Mrs. Glass’s Cookery, as given by G. A. Sala, in Illd. News, May 12, 1883.

and resisted all solicitation to advance to chairs that had been prepared for them, until I should first be seated; in this dilemma, Dr. Buchanan, who had visited China, advised me what was to be done; I immediately seized on the foremost, whilst the Doctor himself grappled with the second; thus we soon fixed them in their seats, both parties during the struggle, repeating Chin Chin, Chin Chin, the Chinese term of salutation."—Symes, Embassy to Am., 295.

1829.—"One of the Chinese servants came to me and said, 'Mr. Talbot chin-chin you come down.'"—The Fankow at Canton, p. 20.

1880.—"But far from thinking it any shame to deface our beautiful language, the English seem to glory in its distortion, and will often ask one another to come to 'chow-chow' instead of dinner; and send their 'chin-chin,' even in letters, rather than their compliments; most of them ignorant of the fact that 'chow-chow' is no more Chinese than it is Hebrew; that 'chin-chin,' though an expression used by the Chinese, does not in its true meaning come near to the 'good-bye, old fellow,' for which it is often used, or the compliments for which it is frequently substituted."—W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 156; [ed. 1883, p. 41].

CHINSURA, n.p. A town on the Hoogly River, 26 miles above Calcutta, on the west bank, which was the seat of a Dutch settlement and factory down to 1824, when it was ceded to us by the Treaty of London, under which the Dutch gave up Malacca and their settlements in continental India, whilst we withdrew from Sumatra. [The place gave its name to a kind of cloth, Chinechuras (see PIECE-GOODS).]

1684.—"This day between 3 and 6 o'clock in the Afternoon, Capt. Richardson and his Sergeant, came to my house in ye Chinchera, and brought me this following message from ye President. . . ."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 166.

1705.—"La Loge appelée Chamdernagor est une très-belle Maison située sur le bord d'un des bras du fleuve de Gange. . . . À une lieue de la Loge il y a une grande Ville appelée Chinchurat. . . ."—Luillier, 64-65.

1726.—"The place where our Lodge (or Factory) is is properly called Sinternu [i.e. Chinsura] and not Hoogly (which is the name of the village)."—Valentijn, v. 162.

1727.—"Chinchura, where the Dutch Emporium stands . . . the Factors have a great many good Houses standing pleasantly on the River-Side; and all of them have pretty Gardens."—A. Hamilton, ii. 20; ed. 1744, ii. 18.

[1753. — "Shinshura." See quotation under CALCUTTA.]

CHINTS, CHINCH, s. A bug. This word is now quite obsolete both in India and in England. It is a corruption of the Portuguese chinche, which again is from cimex. Mrs. Trollope, in her once famous book on the Domestic Manners of the Americans, made much of a supposed instance of affected squeamishness in American ladies, who used the word chintzes instead of bugs. But she was ignorant of the fact that chints was an old and proper name for the objectionable exotic insect, 'bug' being originally but a figurative (and perhaps a polite) term, 'an object of disgust and horror' (Wedgwood). Thus the case was exactly the opposite of what she chose to imagine; chints was the real name, bug the more or less affected euphonism.

1616.—"In the night we were likewise very much disquieted with another sort, called Musquetoes, like our Gnats, but some-what less; and in that season we were very much troubled with Chinches, another sort of little troublesome and offensive creatures, like little Ticks: and these annoyed us two ways: as first by their biting and stinging, and then by their stink."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 372; [ed. 1777, p. 117].

1645.—". . . for the most part the bedsteads in Italy are of forged iron gilded, since it is impossible to keepe the wooden ones from the chimices."—K Evelyn's Diary, Sept. 29.

1673.—". . . Our Bodies broke out into small fiery Pimples . . . augmented by Muskoetoe-Bites, and Chinches raising Blisters on us."—Fryer, 35.

"Chints are venomous, and if squeezed leave a most Poysonous Stench."—Ibid. 189.

CHINTZ, s. A printed or spotted cotton cloth; Port. chita; Mahr. chit, and H. chint. The word in this last form occurs (c. 1590) in the Āin-i-Akbari (i. 95). It comes apparently from the Skt. chitra, 'variegated, speckled.' The best chintzes were bought on the Madras coast, at Masulipatam and Sadras. The French form of the word is chite, which has suggested the possibility of our sheet being of the same origin. But chite is apparently of Indian origin, through the Portuguese, whilst sheet is much older than the Portuguese communication with India. Thus (1450) in Sir T. Cumberworth's will he directs his "wreched body to be beryd in a chitte with owte any kyste" (Academy, Sept. 27, 1879, p. 230).

The resemblance to the Indian forms in this is very curious.

1614.—“... chintz and chadors. . . .”—Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

[1616.—“3 per Chint bramport.”—Cocks's Diary, i. 171.

1653.—“Chites en Indou signifie des toilles imprimeés.”—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1647, p. 536.

c. 1666.—“Le principal trafic des Hollandois à Amedabad, est de chites, qui sont de toiles peintes.”—Thevenot, v. 35. In the English version (1687) this is written schites (iv. ch. v.).

1676.—“Chites or Painted Calicuts, which they call Calمندار, that is done with a pencil, are made in the Kingdom of Golconda, and particularly about Masulipatam.”—Tavernier, E.T., p. 126; [ed. Ball, ii. 4].

1725.—“The returns that are injurious to our manufactures, or growth of our own country, are printed calicoes, chintz, wrought silks, stuffs, of herba, and barks.”—Defoe, New Voyage round the World. Works, Oxford, 1840, p. 161.

1726.—“The Warehouse Keeper reported to the Board, that the chintzes, being brought from painting, had been examined at the sorting godown, and that it was the general opinion that both the cloth and the paintings were worse than the musters.”—In Wheeler, ii. 407.

c. 1733.—

“No, let a charming chintz and Brussels lace Wrap my cold limbs, and shade my lifeless face.”

Pope, Moral Essays, i. 248.

“And, when she sees her friend in deep despair, Observes how much a Chintz exceeds Mohair. . . .”

Ibid. ii. 170.

1817.—“Blue cloths, and chintzes in particular, have always formed an extensive article of import from Western India.”—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 86; [2nd ed. i. 95, and comp. i. 190].

In the earlier books about India some kind of chintz is often termed pintado (q.v.). See the phraseology in the quotation from Wheeler above.

This export from India to Europe has long ceased. When one of the present writers was Sub-Collector of the Madras District (1866-67), chintzes were still figured by an old man at Sadras, who had been taught by the Dutch, the cambric being furnished to him by a Madras Chetty (q.v.). He is now dead, and the business has ceased; in fact the colours for the process are no longer to be had.* The former chintz manufactures of Pulicat are mentioned by Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, p. 567. Havart (1693) mentions the manufacture at Sadras (i. 92), and gives a good description of the process of painting these cloths, which he calls chitsen (iii. 13). There is also a very complete account in the Lettres Édifiantes, xiv. 116 seqq.

In Java and Sumatra chintzes of a very peculiar kind of marbled pattern are still manufactured by women, under the name of bdtik.

CHIPE, s. In Portuguese use, from Tamil shippi, ‘an oyster.’ The pearl-oysters taken in the pearl-fisheries of Tuticorin and Manār.

[1602.—“And the fishers on that coast gave him as tribute one day’s oysters (hum dia de chipo), that is the result of one day’s pearl fishing.”—Couto, Dec. 7, Bk. VIII. ch. ii.]

1685.—“The chipe, for so they call those

* I leave this passage as Dr. Burnell wrote it. But though limited to a specific locality, of which I doubt not it was true, it conveys an idea of the entire extinction of the ancient chintz production which I find is not justified by the facts, as shown in a most interesting letter from Mr. Purdon Clarke, C.S.L., of the India Museum. One kind is still made at Masulipatam, under the superintendence of Persian merchants, to supply the Ispahan market and the “Moghul” traders at Bombay. At Pulicat very peculiar chintzes are made, which are entirely Kalam Kārī work, or hand-painted (apparently the word now used instead of the Calمندār of Tavernier,—see above, and under CALAMANDER). This is a work of infinite labour, as the ground has to be stopped off with wax almost as many times as there are colours used. At Combaconum Sarongs (q.v.) are printed for the Straits. Very bold printing is done at Wālājāpet in N. Arcot, for sale to the Moslem at Hyderabad and Bangalore.

An anecdote is told me by Mr. Clarke which indicates a caution as to more things than chintz printing. One particular kind of chintz met with in S. India, he was assured by the vendor, was printed at W—; but he did not recognize the locality. Shortly afterwards, visiting for the second time the city of X. (we will call it), where he had already been assured by the collector’s native aids that there was no such manufacture, and showing the stuff, with the statement of its being made at W—, ‘Why,’ said the collector, ‘that is where I live!’ Immediately behind his bungalow was a small bazar, and in this the work was found going on, though on a small scale.

Just so we shall often find persons “who have been in India, and on the spot”—asseverating that at such and such a place there are no missions or no converts; whilst those who have cared to know, know better.—(H. Y.)

CHITTAGONG.

1598.—“From this River Eastward 50 miles lyeth the towne of Chatigan, which is the chief towne of Bengala.”—Linschoten, ch. xvi.; [Hak. Soc. i. 94].*

c. 1610.—Pyrard de la Val has Chartican, i. 234; [Hak. Soc. i. 326].

1727.—“Chittagoung, or, as the Portuguese call it, Xatigam, about 50 Leagues below Dacca.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 24; ed. 1744, ii. 22.

17.—“Chittigan” in Orme (reprint), ii. 14.

1786.—“The province of Chatigan (vulgarly Chittagong) is a noble field for a naturalist. It is so called, I believe, from the chatag,† which is the most beautiful little bird I ever saw.”—Sir W. Jones, ii. 101.

Elsewhere (p. 81) he calls it a “Montpelier.” The derivation given by this illustrious scholar is more than questionable. The name seems to be really a form of the Sanskrit Chaturgrāma (= Tetrapolis), [or according to others of Saptagrāma, ‘seven villages’], and it is curious that near this position Ptolemy has a Pentapolis, very probably the same place. Chaturgrāma is still the name of a town in Ceylon, lat. 6°, long. 81°.

CHITTLEDROOG, n.p. A fort S.W. of Bellary; properly Chitra Durgam, Red Hill (or Hill-Fort, or [‘picturesque fort’]) called by the Mahomedans Chitaldurg (C. P. B.).

CHITTORE, n.p. Chitor, or Chitorgarh, a very ancient and famous rock fortress in the Rajput State of Mewār. It is almost certainly the Tidroupa of Ptolemy (vii. 1).

1533.—“Badour (i.e. Bahādur Shāh) . . . in Champanel . . . sent to carry off a quantity of powder and shot and stores for the attack on Chitor, which occasioned some delay because the distance was so great.”—Correa, iii. 506.

1615.—“The two and twentieth (Dec.), Master Edwards met me, accompanied with Thomas Coryat, who had passed into India on foote, five course to Cytor, an ancient Citie ruined on a hill, but so that it appeares a Tombe (Towne?) of wonderfull magnificence. . . .”—Sir Thomas Roe, in Purchas, i. 540; [Hak. Soc. i. 102; “Cetor” in i. 111, “Chytor” in ii. 540].

[1813.—“ . . . a tribute . . . imposed by Muhadajee Seendhiya for the restitution of Chuetohrgurh, which he had conquered from the Rana.”—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 175.]

CHOB DAR, s. H. from P. chobdar, ‘a stick-bearer.’ A frequent attendant of Indian nobles, and in former days of Anglo-Indian officials of rank. They are still a part of the state of the Viceroy, Governors, and Judges of the High Courts. The chobdars carry a staff overlaid with silver.

1442.—“At the end of the hall stand tchobdars . . . drawn up in line.”—Abdur-Razzak, in India in the XV. Cent. 25.

1673.—“If he (the President) move out of his Chamber, the Silver Staves wait on him.”—Fryer, 68.

1701.—“ . . . Yesterday, of his own accord, he told our Linguists that he had sent four Chobdars and 25 men, as a safeguard.”—In Wheeler, i. 371.

1788.—“Chubdar . . . Among the Nabobs he proclaims their praises aloud, as he runs before their palankeens.”—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale’s).

1793.—“They said a Chubdar, with a silverstick, one of the Sultan’s messengers of justice, had taken them from the place, where they were confined, to the public Bazar, where their hands were cut off.”—Dirom, Narrative, 235.

1798.—“The chief’s Chobedar . . . also endeavoured to impress me with an ill opinion of these messengers.”—G. Forster’s Travels, i. 222.

1810.—“While we were seated at breakfast, we were surprised by the entrance of a Choabdar, that is, a servant who attends on persons of consequence, runs before them with a silver stick, and keeps silence at the doors of their apartments, from which last office he derives his name.”—Maria Graham, 57.

This usually accurate lady has been here misled, as if the word were chup-dār, ‘silence-keeper,’ a hardly possible hybrid.

CHOBWA, s. Burmese Tsaubwa, Siamese Chao, ‘prince, king,’ also Chaohpa (compounded with hpa, ‘heaven’), and in Cushing’s Shan Dicty. and cacography, sow, ‘lord, master,’ sowhpa, a ‘hereditary prince.’ The word chu-hu, for ‘chief,’ is found applied among tribes of Kwang-si, akin to the Shans, in A.D. 1150 (Prof. T. de la Couperie). The designation of the princes of the Shan States on the east of Burma, many of whom are (or were till lately) tributary to Ava.

* There is no reason to suppose that Linschoten had himself been to Chittagong. My friend, Dr. Burnell, in his (posthumous) edition of Linschoten for the Hakluyt Society has confounded Chātigam in this passage with Satgaon—see Porto Piqueno (H. Y.).

† The chātak which figures in Hindu poetry, is, according to the dictionaries, Cuculus melanoleucos, which must be the pied cuckoo, Coccyzus melanoleucos, Gm., in Jerdon; but this surely cannot be Sir William’s “most beautiful little bird he ever saw”?

1795.—“After them came the Chobwaas, or petty tributary princes: these are personages who, before the Birmans had extended their conquests over the vast territories which they now possess, had held small independent sovereignties which they were able to maintain so long as the balance of power continued doubtful between the Birmans, Peguans, and Siamese.”—Symes, 366.

1819.—“All that tract of land . . . is inhabited by a numerous nation called Sciam, who are the same as the Laos. Their kingdom is divided into small districts under different chiefs called Zaboa, or petty princes.”—Sangermano, 34.

1855.—“The Tsaubwas of all these principalities, even where most absolutely under Ava, retain all the forms and appurtenances of royalty.”—Fule, Mission to Ava, 303.

[1890.—“The succession to the throne primarily depends upon the person chosen by the court and people being of princely descent—all such are called chow or prince.”—Hallet, A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, p. 32.]

CHOGA, s. Turki chogha. A long sleeved garment, like a dressing-gown (a purpose for which Europeans often make use of it). It is properly an Afghan form of dress, and is generally made of some soft woollen material, and embroidered on the sleeves and shoulders. In Bokhara the word is used for a furred robe. [“In Tibetan ch’uba; in Turki juba. It is variously pronounced chuba, juba or chogha in Asia, and shuba or shubka in Russia” (J.R.A.S., N.S. XXIII. 122)].

1883.—“We do not hear of ‘shirt-sleeves’ in connection with Henry (Lawrence), so often as in John’s case; we believe his favourite dishabille was an Afghan choga, which like charity covered a multitude of sins.”—Qu. Review, No. 310, on Life of Lord Lawrence, p. 303.

CHOKIDAR, s. A watchman. Derivative in Persian form from Choky. The word is usually applied to a private watchman; in some parts of India he is generally of a thieving tribe, and his employment may be regarded as a sort of blackmail to ensure one’s property. [In N. India the village Chaukidār is the rural policeman, and he is also employed for watch and ward in the smaller towns.]

1689.—“And the Day following the Chocadars, or Souldiers were remov’d from before our Gates.”—Orington, 416.

1810.—“The chokey-dar attends during the day, often performing many little offices, . . . at night parading about with his spear, shield, and sword, and assuming a most terrific aspect, until all the family are asleep; when HE GOES TO SLEEP TOO.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 295.

c. 1817.—“The birds were scarcely beginning to move in the branches of the trees, and there was not a servant excepting the chokedars, stirring about any house in the neighbourhood, it was so early.”—Mrs. Shercoot’s Stories, &c. (ed. 1873), 243.

1837.—“Every village is under a potail, and there is a purau or priest, and chou-keednop (sic!) or watchman.”—Phillips, Million of Facts, 320.

1864.—The church book at Peshawar records the death there of “The Revd. I—L—l, who on the night of the —th —, 1864, when walking in his veranda was shot by his own chokidar”—to which record the hand of an injudicious friend has added: “Well done, thou good and faithful servant!” (The exact words will now be found in the late Mr. E. B. Eastwick’s Panjab Handbook, p. 279).

CHOKRA, s. Hind. chhokra, ‘a boy, a youngster’; and hence, more specifically, a boy employed about a household, or a regiment. Its chief use in S. India is with the latter. (See CHUCKAROO.)

[1875.—“He was dubbed ‘the chokra,’ or simply ‘boy.’”—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 136.]

CHOKY, s. H. chauki, which in all its senses is probably connected with Skt. chatur, ‘four’; whence chatushka, ‘of four,’ ‘four-sided,’ &c.

a. (Perhaps first a shed resting on four posts); a station of police; a lock-up; also a station of palankin bearers, horses, &c., when a post is laid; a customs or toll-station, and hence, as in the first quotation, the dues levied at such a place; the act of watching or guarding.

[1535.—“They only pay the choqueis coming in ships from the Moluccas to Malacca, which amounts to 3 parts in 10 for the owner of the ship for choque, which is freight; that which belongs to His Highness pays nothing when it comes in ships. This choque is as far as Malacca, from thence to India is another freight as arranged between the parties. Thus when cloves are brought in His Highness’s ships, paying the third and the choques, there goes from every 30 bahars 16 to the King, our Lord.”—Arrangement made by Nuno da Cunha, quoted in Botelho Tombo, p. 113. On this Mr. Whiteway remarks: “By this arrangement the King of Portugal did not ship any cloves of his own at the Moluccas, but he took one-third of every shipment free, and on the balance he took one-third as Choky, which is, I imagine, in lieu of customs."]

c. 1590.—"Mounting guard is called in Hindi Chauki."—Āin, i. 257.

1608.—"The Kings Custome called Chukey, is eight bagges upon the hundred bagges."—Saris, in Purchas, i. 391.

1664.—"Near this Tent there is another great one, which is called Tchaukykane, because it is the place where the Omrahs keep guard, every one in his turn, once a week twenty-four hours together."—Bernier, E.T., 117; [ed. Constable, 363].

1673.—"We went out of the Walls by Broach Gate . . . where, as at every gate, stands a Chocky, or Watch to receive Toll for the Emperor. . . ."—Fryer, 100.

"And when they must rest, if they have no Tents, they must shelter themselves under Trees . . . unless they happen on a Chowkie, i.e., a Shed where the Customer keeps a Watch to take Custom."—Ibid. 410.

1682.—"About 12 o'clock Noon we got to ye Chowkee, where after we had shown our Dustick and given our present, we were dismissed immediately."—Hedges, Diary, Dec. 17; [Hak. Soc. i. 58].

1774.—"Il più difficile per viaggiare nell' Indostan sono certi posti di guardie chiamate Cioki . . . questi Cioki sono insolentissimi."—Della Tomba, 33.

1810.—". . . Chokies, or patrol stations."—Williamson, V. M., i. 297.

This word has passed into the English slang vocabulary in the sense of 'prison.'

b. A chair. This use is almost peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. Dr. John Muir [Orig. Skt. Texts, ii. 5] cites it in this sense, as a Hindi word which has no resemblance to any Skt. vocable. Mr. Growse, however, connects it with chatur, 'four' (Ind. Antiq., i. 105). See also beginning of this article. Chau is the common form of 'four' in composition, e.g. chaubandi, (i.e. 'four fastening') the complete shoeing of a horse; chaupahra ('four watches') all night long; chaupār, 'a quadruped'; chaukat and chaukhat ('four timber'), a frame (of a door, &c.). So chauki seems to have been used for a square-framed stool, and thence a chair.

1772.—"Don't throw yourself back in your burra chokey, and tell me it won't do. . . ."—W. Hastings to G. Vansittart, in Gleig, i. 238.

c. 1782.—"As soon as morning appeared he (Haidar) sat down on his chair (chauki) and washed his face."—H. of Hydr Naik, 505.

CHOLERA, and CHOLERA MORBUS, s. The Disease. The term 'cholera,' though employed by the old medical writers, no doubt came, as regards its familiar use, from India. Littré alleges that it is a mistake to suppose that the word cholera (χολέρα) is a derivative from χολή, 'bile,' and that it really means 'a gutter,' the disease being so called from the symptoms. This should, however, rather be ἀπὸ τῶν χολάδων, the latter word being anciently used for the intestines (the etym. given by the medical writer, Alex. Trallianus). But there is a discussion on the subject in the modern ed. of Stephani Thesaurus, which indicates a conclusion that the derivation from χολή is probably right; it is that of Celsus (see below). [The N.E.D. takes the same view, but admits that there is some doubt.] For quotations and some particulars in reference to the history of this terrible disease, see under MORT-DE-CHIEN.

c. A.D. 20.—"Primoque facienda mentio est cholerae; quia commune id stomachi atque intestinorum vitium videri potest . . . intestina torquentur, bilis supra infraque erumpit, primum aquae similis: deinde ut in ea recens caro tota esse videatur, interdum alba, nonnunquam nigra vel varia. Ergo eo nomine morbum hunc χολέραν Graeci nominarunt. . . ." &c.—A. C. Celsi Med. Libri VIII. iv. xi.

c. A.D. 100.—"ΠΕΡΙ ΧΟΛΕΡΗΣ . . . θάνατος ἐπὶ δυνος καὶ οὐκιστος σπασμὸς καὶ πνιγὶ καὶ ἐμέσῳ κενῷ."—Aretaeus, De Causis et signis acutorum morborum, ii. 5.

Also Θεραπεία Χολερῆς, in De Curatione Morb. Ac. ii. 4.

1563.—"R. Is this disease the one which kills so quickly, and from which so few recover? Tell me how it is called among us, and among them, and its symptoms, and the treatment of it in use?"

"O. Among us it is called Collerica passio. . . ."—Garcia, f. 74v.

1673.—"The Diseases reign according to the Seasons. . . . In the extreme Heats, Cholera Morbus."—Fryer, 113-114.

1832.—"Le Choléra Morbus, dont vous me parlez, n'est pas inconnu à Cachemire."—Jacquemont, Corresp. ii. 109.

CHOLERA HORN. See COLLERY.

CHOOOLA, s. H. chūlhā, chūlhī, chūlā, fr. Skt. chulli. The extemporized cooking-place of clay which a native of India makes on the ground to prepare his own food; or to cook that of his master.

1814.—“A marble corridor filled up with choolas, or cooking-places, composed of mud, cowdung, and unburnt bricks.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 120; [2nd ed. ii. 193].

CHOOLIA, s. Chūliā is a name given in Ceylon and in Malabar to a particular class of Mahommedans, and sometimes to Mahommedans generally. There is much obscurity about the origin and proper application of the term. [The word is by some derived from Skt. chūḍa, the top-knot which every Hindu must wear, and which is cut off on conversion to Islam. In the same way in the Punjab, chotikat, ‘he that has had his top-knot cut off,’ is a common form of abuse used by Hindus to Musulman converts; see Ibbetson, Panjab Ethnog. p. 240.] According to Sonnerat (i. 109), the Chulias are of Arab descent and of Shīa profession. [The Madras Gloss. takes the word to be from the kingdom of Chola and to mean a person of S. India.]

c. 1345.—“... the city of Kaulam, which is one of the finest of Malibār. Its bazars are splendid, and its merchants are known by the name of Sūlia (i.e. Chūliā).”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 99.

1754.—“Chowlies are esteemed learned men, and in general are merchants.”—Ives, 25.

1782.—“We had found . . . less of that foolish timidity, and much more disposition to intercourse in the Chollars of the country, who are Mahommedans and quite distinct in their manners. . . .”—Hugh Boyd, Journal of a Journey of an Embassy to Candy, in Misc. Works (1800), i. 155.

1783.—“During Mr. Saunders’s government I have known Chulia (Moors) vessels carry coco-nuts from the Nicobar Islands to Madras.”—Forrest, Voyage to Mergui, p. v.

“Chulias and Malabars (the appellations are I believe synonymous).”—Ibid. 24.

1836.—“Mr. Boyd . . . describes the Moors under the name of Cholias, and Sir Alexander Johnston designates them by the appellation Lubbies (see LUBBYE). These epithets are, however, not admissible, for the former is only confined to a particular sect among them, who are rather of an inferior grade; and the latter to the priests who officiate.”—Casie Chitty, in J. R. A. Soc. iii. 338.

1879.—“There are over 15,000 Klings, Chullahs, and other natives of India.”—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 254.

CHOP, s. Properly a seal-impression, stamp, or brand; H. chhap;

the verb (chhapna) being that which is now used in Hindustani to express the art of printing (books).

The word chhap seems not to have been traced back with any accuracy beyond the modern vernaculars. It has been thought possible (at least till the history should be more accurately traced) that it might be of Portuguese origin. For there is a Port. word chapa, ‘a thin plate of metal,’ which is no doubt the original of the Old English chape for the metal plate on the sheath of a sword or dagger.* The word in this sense is not in the Portuguese Dictionaries; but we find ‘homem chapado,’ explained as ‘a man of notable worth or excellence,’ and Bluteau considers this a metaphor ‘taken from the chapas or plates of metal on which the kings of India caused their letters patent to be engraved.’ Thus he would seem to have regarded, though perhaps erroneously, the chhap and the Portuguese chapa as identical. On the other hand, Mr. Beames entertains no doubt that the word is genuine Hindi, and connects it with a variety of other words signifying striking, or pressing. And Thompson in his Hindi Dictionary says that chhapna is a technical term used by the Vaishnavas to denote the sectarian marks (lotus, trident, &c.), which they delineate on their bodies. Fallon gives the same meaning, and quotes a Hindi verse, using it in this sense. We may add that while chhap is used all over the N.W.P. and Punjab for printed cloths, Drummond (1808) gives chhapdāniya, chhapdārā, as word for ‘Stampers or Printers of Cloth’ in Guzerati, and that the passage quoted below from a Treaty made with an ambassador from Guzerat by the Portuguese in 1537, uses the word chapada for struck or coined, exactly as the modern Hindi verb chhapna might be used.† Chop, in writer

* Thus, in Shakspeare, “This is Monsieur Parolles, the gallant militarist . . . that had the whole theorie of war in the knot of his scarf, the practice in the chape of his dagger.”—All’s Well that Ends Well, iv. 8. And, in the Scottish Rites and Valuations, under 1612:

Jaarige Reize . . . door Jacob de Bucquoy, Haarlem, 1757.

1727.—“On my Arrival (at Acheen) I took the Chap at the great River's Mouth, according to Custom. This Chap is a Piece of Silver about 8 ounces Weight, made in Form of a Cross, but the cross Part is very short, that we . . . put to our Fore-head, and declare to the Officer that brings the Chap, that we come on an honest Design to trade.”—*A. 1771.—“. . . with Tiapp or passports.”—Osebeck, i. 181.

1782.—“. . . le Pilote . . . apporte avec lui leur chappe, ensuite il adore et consulte son Poussa, puis il fait lever l'ancre.”—Sonnerat, ii. 233.

1783.—“The bales (at Acheen) are immediately opened; 12 in the hundred are taken for the king's duty, and the remainder being marked with a certain mark (chapp) may be carried where the owner pleases.”—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 41.

1785.—“The only pretended original produced was a manifest forgery, for it had not the chop or smaller seal, on which is engraved the name of the Mogul.”—Carraccioli's Clive, i. 214.

1817.—“. . . and so great reluctance did he (the Nabob) show to the ratification of the Treaty, that Mr. Pigot is said to have seized his chop, or seal, and applied it to the paper.”—Mill's Hist. iii. 340.

1876.—“‘First chop! tremendously pretty too,’ said the elegant Grecian, who had been paying her assiduous attention.”—Daniel Deronda, Bk. I. ch. x.

1882.—“On the edge of the river facing the ‘Pow-shan’ and the Creek Honga, were Chop houses, or branches of the Hoppo's department, whose duty it was to prevent smuggling, but whose interest it was to aid and facilitate the shipping of silks . . . at a considerable reduction on the Imperial tariff.”—The Fankwaie at Canton, p. 25.

The writer last quoted, and others before him, have imagined a Chinese origin for chop, e.g., as “from chah, ‘an official note from a superior,’ or chah, ‘a contract, a diploma, &c.,’ both having at Canton the sound cháp, and between them covering most of the ‘pigeon’ uses of chop” (Note by Bishop Moule). But few of the words used by Europeans in Chinese trade are really Chinese, and we think it has been made clear that chop comes from India.

CHOP-CHOP. Pigeon-English (or -Chinese) for ‘Make haste! look sharp!’ This is supposed to be from the Cantonese, pron. káp-káp, of what is in the Mandarin dialect kip-kip. In the Northern dialects kwai-kwai,

1780.—“About 20 Days ago a Villian was detected here setting fire to Houses by throwing the *Tickeu of his Hooka on the Choppers, and was immediately committed to the Phonxdar's Prison. . . . On his tryal . . . it appering that he had more than once before committed the same Nefarious and abominable Crime, he was sentenced to have his left Hand, and right Foot cut off. . . . It is needless to expatiate on the Efficacy such exemplary Punishments would be of to the Publick in general, if adopted on all similar occasions. . . .”—Letter from Moorshedabad, in Hicky's Bengal Gazette, May 6.

1782.—“With Mr. Francis came the Judges of the Supreme Court, the Laws of England, partial oppression, and licentious liberty. The common felons were cast loose, . . . the merchants of the place told that they need not pay duties . . . and the natives were made to know that they might erect their chappor huts in what part of the town they pleased.”—Price, Some Observations, 61.

1810.—“Chuppers, or grass thatches.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 510.

CHOPSTICKS, s. The sticks used in pairs by the Chinese in feeding themselves. The Chinese name of the article is 'kwai-tsz,' 'speedy-ones.' "Possibly the inventor of the present word, hearing that the Chinese name had this meaning, and accustomed to the phrase chop-chop for 'speedily,' used chop as a translation" (Bishop Moule). [Prof. Giles writes: "The N.E.D. gives incorrectly kwai-tze, i.e. 'nimble boys,' 'nimble ones.' Even Sir H. Yule is not without blemish. He leaves the aspirate out of kwai, of which the official orthography is now k'uai-k'uai-tzũ, 'hastenings,' the termination -ers bringing out the value of tzũ, an enclitic particle, better than 'ones.' Bishop Moule's suggestion is on the right track. I think, however, that chopstick came from a Chinaman, who of course knew the meaning of k'uai and applied it accordingly, using the 'pidgin' word chop as the, to him, natural equivalent."]

c. 1540.—". . . his young daughters, with their brother, did nothing but laugh to see us feed ourselves with our hands, for that is contrary to the custome which is observed throughout the whole empire of China, where the Inhabitants at their meat carry it to their mouthes with two little sticks made like a pair of Cizers" (this is the translator's folly; it is really com duos paos feitos como fusos—"like spindles").—Pinto, orig. cap. lxxxiii., in Cogan, p. 103.

1876.—"Before each there will be found a pair of chopsticks, a wine-cup, a small saucer for soy . . . and a pile of small pieces of paper for cleaning these articles as required."—Giles, Chinese Sketches, 153-4.

CHOTA-HAZRY, s. H. chhoti hāzrī, vulg. hāzrī, 'little breakfast'; refreshment taken in the early morning, before or after the morning exercise. The term (see HAZREE) was originally peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. In Madras the meal is called 'early tea.' Among the Dutch in Java, this meal consists (or did consist in 1860) of a large cup of tea, and a large piece of cheese, presented by the servant who calls one in the morning.

1853.—"After a bath, and hasty ante-breakfast (which is called in India 'a little breakfast') at the Euston Hotel, he proceeded to the private residence of a man of law."—Outfield, ii. 179.

1866.—"There is one small meal . . . it is that commonly known in India by the Hindustani name of chota-hāzrī, and in our English colonies as 'Early Tea.' . . ."—Waring, Tropical Resident, 172.

1875.—"We took early tea with him this morning."—The Dilemma, ch. iii.

CHOUL, CHAUL, n.p. A seaport of the Concan, famous for many centuries under various forms of this name, Cherwal properly, and pronounced in Konkani Tsemwal (Sinclair, Ind. Ant. iv. 283). It may be regarded as almost certain that this was the Σιμυλλα of Ptolemy's Tables, called by the natives, as he says, Τιμουλα. It may be fairly conjectured that the true reading of this was Τιμουλα, or Τιέμουλα. We find the sound ch of Indian names apparently represented in Ptolemy by τi (as it is in Dutch by tj). Thus Τιδτουρα = Chitor, Τιδστανης = Chashtana; here Τιμουλα = Cherwal; while Τιδγουρα and Τιαύσα probably stand for names like Chagara and Chauspa. Still more confidently Cherwal may be identified with the Saimur (Chaimur) or Jaimur of the old Arab. Geographers, a port at the extreme end of Lār or Guzerat. At Choul itself there is a tradition that its antiquity goes back beyond that of Suali (see SWALLY), Bassein, or Bombay. There were memorable sieges of Choul in 1570-71, and again in 1594, in which the Portuguese successfully resisted Mahomedan attempts to capture the place. Dr. Burgess identifies the ancient Σήμυλλα rather with a place called Chembur, on the island of Trombay, which lies immediately east of the island of Bombay; but till more evidence is adduced we see no reason to adopt this.* Choul seems now to be known as Revadanda. Even the name is not to be found in the Imperial Gazetteer. Rewadanda has a place in that work, but without a word to indicate its connection with this ancient and famous port. Mr. Gerson d'Acunha has published in the J. Bo. Br. As. Soc., vol. xii., Notes on the H. and Ant. of Chaul.

1510.—“Departing from the said city of Combeia, I travelled on until I arrived at another city named Cevul (Chevul) which is distant from the above-mentioned city 12 days' journey, and the country between the one and the other of these cities is called Guzerati.”—Varthema, 113.

1546.—Under this year D'Acunha quotes from Freire d'Andrada a story that when the Viceroy required 20,000 pardaos (q.v.) to send for the defence of Diu, offering in pledge a wisp of his mustachio, the women of Choul sent all their earrings and other jewellery, to be applied to this particular service.

CHOULTRY, s. Peculiar to S. India, and of doubtful etymology; Malayāl. chāwatī, Tel. chāwadi, [tsāvadi, chau, Skt. chatur, ‘four,’ vāta, ‘road,’ a place where four roads meet]. In W. India the form used is choicry or choivree (Dakh. chdorī). A hall, a shed, or a simple loggia, used by travellers as a resting-place, and also intended for the transaction of public business. In the old Madras Archives there is frequent mention of the “Justices of the Choultry.” A building of this kind seems to have formed the early Court-house.

1673.—“Here (at Swally near Surat) we were welcomed by the Deputy President . . . who took care for my Entertainment, which here was rude, the place admitting of little better Tenements than Booths stiled by the name of Choultries.”—Fryer, 82.

CHOULTRY PLAIN, n.p. This was the name given to the open country formerly existing to the S.W. of Madras. Choultry Plain was also the old designation of the Hd. Quarters of the Madras Army; equivalent to “Horse Guards” in Westminster (C. P. B. MS.).

1780.—“Every gentleman now possessing a house in the fort, was happy in accommodating the family of his friend, who before had resided in Choultry Plain. Note. The country near Madras is a perfect flat, on which is built, at a small distance from the fort, a small choultry.”—Hodges, Travels, 7.

CHOUSE, s. and v. This word is originally Turk. chdush, in former days a sergeant-at-arms, herald, or the like. [Vambéry (Sketches, 17) speaks of the Tchaush as the leader of a party of pilgrims.] Its meaning as ‘a cheat,’ or ‘to swindle’ is, apparently beyond doubt, derived from the anecdote thus related in a note of W. Gifford’s upon the passage in Ben Jonson’s Alchemist, which is quoted below. “In 1609 Sir Robert Shirley sent a messenger or chiaus (as our old writers call him) to this country, as his agent, from the Grand Signor and the Sophy, to transact some preparatory business. Sir Robert followed him, at his leisure, as ambassador from both these princes; but before he reached England, his agent had chiused the Turkish and Persian merchants here of 4000*l.*, and taken his flight, unconscious perhaps that he had enriched the language with a word of which the etymology would mislead Upton and puzzle Dr. Johnson.”—Ed. of Ben Jonson, iv. 27. “In Kattywar, where the native chiefs employ Arab mercenaries, the Chaus still flourishes as an officer of a company. When I joined the Political Agency in that Province, there was a company of Arabs attached to the Residency under a Chaus.” (M.-Gen. Keatinge). [The N.E.D. thinks that “Gifford’s note must be taken with reserve.” The Stanf. Dict. adds that Gifford’s note asserts that two other *Chiaus*es arrived in 1618-1625. One of the above quotations proves his accuracy as to 1618. Perhaps, however, the particular fraud had little to do with the modern use of the word. As Jonson suggests, chiaus may have been used for ‘Turk’ in the sense of ‘cheat’; just as Cataian stood for ‘thief’ or ‘rogue.’ For a further discussion of the word see N. & Q., 7 ser. vi. 387; 8 ser. iv. 129.]

1560.—“Cum vero me taederet inclusionis in eodem diversorio, ago cum meo Chiauso (genus id est, ut tibi scripsi alias, multiplicis apud Turcas officii, quod etiam ad oratorum custodiam extenditur) ut mihi liceat aere meo domum conducere. . . .”—Busbey. Epist. iii. p. 149.

CHOW-CHOW, s. A common application of the Pigeon-English term in China is to mixed preserves; but, as the quotation shows, it has many uses;

the idea of mixture seems to prevail.
It is the name given to a book by Viscountess Falkland, whose husband was Governor of Bombay. There it seems to mean 'a medley of trifles.'
Chow is in 'pigeon' applied to food of any kind. ["From the erroneous impression that dogs form one of the principal items of a Chinaman's diet, the common variety has been dubbed the 'chow dog'" (Hall, Things Chinese,
p. 179).] We find the word chow-chow in Blumentritt's Vocabular of Manilla terms: "Chau-chau, a Tagal dish so called."

1858.—"The word chow-chow is suggestive, especially to the Indian reader, of a mixture of things, 'good, bad, and indifferent,' of sweet little oranges and bits of bamboo stick, slices of sugar-cane and rinds of unripe fruit, all concocted together, and made upon the whole into a very tolerable confection. . . ."

"Lady Falkland, by her happy selection of a name, to a certain extent deprecates and disarms criticism. We cannot complain that her work is without plan, unconnected, and sometimes trashy, for these are exactly the conditions implied in the word chow-chow."—Bombay Quarterly Review, January,
p. 100.

1882.—"The variety of uses to which the compound word 'chow-chow' is put is almost endless. . . . A 'No. 1 chow-chow' thing signifies utterly worthless, but when applied to a breakfast or dinner it means 'unexceptionably good.' A 'chow-chow' cargo is an assorted cargo; a 'general shop' is a 'chow-chow' shop. . . . one (factory) was called the 'chow-chow,' from its being inhabited by divers Parsees, Moormen, or other natives of India."—The Fankwa,
p. 63.

CHOWDRY, s. H. chaudharī, lit.
'a holder of four'; the explanation of which is obscure: [rather Skt. chakra-dharin, 'the bearer of the discus as an ensign of authority']. The usual application of the term is to the headman of a craft in a town, and more particularly to the person who is selected by Government as the agent through whom supplies, workmen, &c., are supplied for public purposes.
[Thus the Chaudharī of carters provides carriage, the Chaudharī of Kahārs bearers, and so on.] Formerly, in places, to the headman of a village; to certain holders of lands; and in Cutlack it was, under native rule, applied to a district Revenue officer.
In a paper of 'Explanations of Terms'

chanwar, chauri; from Skt. chdmara. The bushy tail of the 'ak (q.v.), often set in a costly handle to use as a fly-flapper, form it was one of the m- ancient Asiatic royalty. The also often attached to the spings of native warriors; formed from remote times lard of nations and nomad Central Asia. The Yak-tails r uses are mentioned by nd by Cosmas (see under .usions to the chdmara, as royalty, are frequent in Skt. inscriptions, e.g. in the Post (see transl. by Dr. Mill in

J. As. Soc. Beng. i. 342; the Amarakosha, ii. 7, 31, &c.). The common Anglo-Indian expression in the 18th century appears to have been "Cow-tails" (q.v.). And hence Bogle in his Journal, as published by Mr. Markham, calls Yaks by the absurd name of "cow-tailed cows," though "horse-tailed cows" would have been more germane!

1827.—"A black female slave, richly dressed, stood behind him with a chowry, or cow's tail, having a silver handle, which she used to keep off the flies."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. x.

CHOWRYBURDAR, s. The servant who carries the Chowry. H. P. chauṇrī-bardār.

1774.—"The Deb-Rajah on horseback . . . a chowra-burdar on each side of him."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 24.

[1838.—". . . the old king was sitting in the garden with a chowrybadar waving the flies from him."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 138.]

CHOWT, CHOUT, s. Mahr. chauth, 'one fourth part.' The blackmail levied by the Mahrattas from the provincial governors as compensation for leaving their districts in immunity from plunder. The term is also applied to some other exactions of like ratio (see Wilson).

[1559.—Mr. Whiteway refers to Cow (Dec. VII. bk. 6, ch. 6), where this word is used in reference to payments made in 1559 in the time of D. Constantine de Bragança, and in papers of the early part of the 17th century the King of the Chouteas is frequently mentioned.]

1644.—"This King holds in our lands of Daman a certain payment which they call Chouto, which was paid him long before they belonged to the Portuguese, and after they came under our power the payment continued to be made, and about these exactions and payments there have risen great disputes and contentions on one side and another."—Bocarro (MS.).

1674.—"Messengers were sent to Bassa demanding the chout of all the Portuguese territory in these parts. The chout means the fourth part of the revenue, and this is the earliest mention we find of the claim."—Orme's Fragments, p. 45.

1763-78.—"They (the English) were . . . not a little surprised to find in the letter now received from Balajerow and his agents to themselves, and in stronger terms to the Nabob, a peremptory demand of the Chout or tribute due to the King of the Moratto from the Nabobship of Arcot."—Orme, ii. 228-9.

1803.—"The Peshwah . . . cannot have a right to two choutes, any more than to two revenues from any village in the same year."—Wellington Desp. (ed. 1837), ii. 175.

1858.—". . . They (the Mahrattas) were accustomed to demand of the provinces threatened with devastation a certain portion of the public revenue, generally the fourth part; and this, under the name of the chout, became the recognized Mahratta tribute, the price of the absence of the plundering hordes."—Whitney, Oriental and Ling. Studies, ii. 20-21.

CHOYA, CHAYA, CHEY, s. root, [generally known as chayroot (Hedyotis umbellata, Lam., Oldenlandia umb., L.) of the Nat. Ord. Cinchonaceae, affording a red dye, sometimes called 'India Madder,' ['Dye Root,' 'Rameshwaram Root']; from Tamil shāyaver, Malayāl. chāyaver (chāy 'colour,' ver 'root'). It is exported from S. India, and was so also at an early time from Ceylon. There is a figure of the plant in Lettres Edif. xiv. 164.

c. 1566.—"Also from S. Tome they lay a great store of red yarne, of bombast dyed with a roote which they call sala, as afor sayd, which colour will never out."—Caes. Frederike, in Hakl. [ii. 354].

1583.—“Ne vien anchora di detta sala da un altro luogo detto Petopoli, e se ne tingono parimente in S. Thomè.”—Balbi, f. 107.

1672.—“Here groweth very good Zaye.”—Baldaeus, Ceylon.

1726.—“Saya (a dye-root that is used on the Coast for painting chintzes).”—Valentijn, Chor. 45.

1727.—“The Islands of Dia (near Masulipatam) produce the famous Dye called Shail. It is a Shrub growing in Grounds that are overflown with the Spring tides.”—A. Hamilton, i. 370; [ed. 1744, i. 374].

1860.—“The other productions that constituted the exports of the Island were sapan-wood to Persia; and choya-roots, a substitute for Madder, collected at Manaar . . . for transmission to Surat.”—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 54-55. See also Chitty's Ceylon Gazetteer (1834), p. 40.

CHUCKAROO, s. English soldier's lingo for Chokra (q.v.)

CHUCKER. From H. chakar, chakkar, chakrā, Skt. chakra, ‘a wheel or circle.’

(a.) s. A quoit for playing the English game; but more properly the sharp quoit or discus which constituted an ancient Hindu missile weapon, and is, or was till recently, carried by the Sikh fanatics called Akālī (see AKALEE), generally encircling their peaked turbans. The thing is described by Tavernier (E. T. ii. 41: [ed. Ball, i. 82]) as carried by a company of Mahomedan Fakīrs whom he met at Sherpūr in Guzerat. See also Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly, &c., p. 47: [Egerton, Handbook, Pl. 15, No. 64].

1516.—“In the Kingdom of Dely . . . they have some steel wheels which they call chacarani, two fingers broad, sharp outside like knives, and without edge inside; and the surface of these is the size of a small plate. And they carry seven or eight of these each, put on the left arm; and they take one and put it on the finger of the right hand, and make it spin round many times, and so they hurl it at their enemies.”—Barbosa, 100-101.

1630.—“In her right hand shee bare a chuckerey, which is an instrument of a round forme, and sharp-edged in the superficies thereof . . . and slung off, in the quickness of his motion, it is able to deliuer or conuey death to a farre remote enemy.”—Lord, Disc. of the Banian Religion, 12.

(b) v. and s. To lunge a horse. H. chakarnd or chakar karnd. Also ‘the lunge.’

1829.—“It was truly tantalizing to see those fellows chückering their horses, not more than a quarter of a mile from our post.”—John Shipp, i. 153.

[(c.) In Polo, a ‘period.’

[1900.—“Two bouts were played to-day . . . In the opening chukker Capt. — carried the ball in.”—Overland Mail, Aug. 13.]

CHUCKERBUTTY, n.p. This vulgarized Bengal Brahman name is, as Wilson points out, a corruption of chakravartī, the title assumed by the most exalted ancient Hindu sovereigns, an universal Emperor, whose chariot-wheels rolled over all (so it is explained by some).

c. 400.—“Then the Bikshuni Uthala began to think thus with herself, ‘To-day the King, ministers, and people are all going to meet Buddha . . . but I—a woman—how can I contrive to get the first sight of him?’ Buddha immediately, by his divine power, changed her into a holy Chakravartti Raja.”—Travels of Fuh-hian, tr. by Beale, p. 63.

c. 460.—“On a certain day (Asoka), having . . . ascertained that the supernaturally gifted . . . Nāga King, whose age extended to a Kappo, had seen the four Buddhas . . . he thus addressed him: ‘Beloved, exhibit to me the person of the omniscient being of infinite wisdom, the Chakkawatti of the doctrine.’”—The Mahawanso, p. 27.

1856.—“The importance attached to the possession of a white elephant is traceable to the Buddhist system. A white elephant of certain wonderful endowments is one of the seven precious things, the possession of which marks the Maha Chakravartti Raja . . . the holy and universal sovereign, a character which appears once in a cycle.”—Mission to the Court of Ava (Major's Phayre's), 1858, p. 154.

CHUCKLAH, s. H. chaklā, [Skt. chakra, ‘a wheel’]. A territorial subdivision under the Mahomedan government, thus defined by Warren Hastings, in the paper quoted under CHOWDREY:

1759.—“The jurisdiction of a Phojdar (see FOUJDAR), who receives the rents from the Zemindars, and accounts for them with the Government.”

1760.—“In the treaty concluded with the Nawāb Meer Mohummud Cāsīm Khān, on the 27th Sept. 1760, it was agreed that . . . the English army should be ready to assist him in the management of all affairs, and that the lands of the chuklahs (districts) of Burdwan, Midnapore and Chittagong, should be assigned for all the charges of the company and the army. . . .”—Harington's Analysis of the Laws and Regulations, vol. i. Calcutta, 1805-1809, p. 5.

CHUCKLER, s. Tam. and Malayāl. shakkili, the name of a very low caste, members of which are tanners or cobblers, like the (Chumars (see CHUMAR) of Upper India. But whilst the latter are reputed to be a very dark caste, the Chucklers are fair (see Elliot's Gloss. by Beames, i. 71, and Caldwell's Gram. 574). [On the other hand the Madras Gloss. (s.v.) says that as a rule they are of “a dark black hue.”] Colloquially in S. India Chuckler is used for a native shoemaker.

c. 1580.—“All the Gentios (Gentios) of those parts, especially those of Bisnaga, have many castes, which take precedence one of another. The lowest are the Chaquivilla, who make shoes, and eat all unclean flesh. . . .”—Primor e Honra, &c., f. 95.

1759.—“Shackelays are shoemakers, and held in the same despicable light on the Coromandel Coast as the Niaddes and Pulies on the Malabar.”—Ives, 26.

c. 1790.—“Aussi n'est-ce que le rebut de la classe méprisée des parrias; savoir les tschakelis ou cordonniers et les rellians ou fossoyeurs, qui s'occupent de l'enterrement et la combustion des morts.”—Haafner, ii. 60.

[1844.—“. . . the chockly, who performs the degrading duty of executioner. . . .”—Society, Manners, &c., of India, ii. 282.]

1869.—“The Komatis or mercantile caste of Madras by long established custom, are required to send an offering of betel to the chucklers, or shoemakers, before contracting their marriages.”—Sir W. Elliot, in J. Ethn. Soc., N. S. vol. i. 102.

CHUCKMUCK, s. H. chakmak. ‘Flint and steel.’ One of the titles conferred on Haidar ‘Ali before he rose to power was ‘Chakmak Jang, ‘Firelock of War’? See H. of Hydur Naik, 112.

CHUCKRUM, s. An ancient coin once generally current in the S. of India, Malayāl. chakram, Tel. chakramu; from Skt. chakra (see under CHUCKER). It is not easy to say what was its value, as the statements are inconsistent: nor do they confirm Wilson's, that it was equal to one-tenth of a pagoda. [According to the Madras Gloss. (s.v.) it bore the same relation to the gold Pagoda that the Anna does to the Rupree, and under it again was the copper Cash which was its sixteenth.] The denomination survives in Travancore [where 28½ go to one rupee. (Ibid.)]

1554.—“And the fanoms of the place are called chocrões, which are coins of inferior gold; they are worth 12½ or 12¼ to the pardao of gold, reckoning the pardao at 36 reis.”—A. Nunes, Livro das Pesas, 36.

1711.—“The Enemy will not come to an agreement unless we consent to pay 30,000 chuckrums, which we take to be 16,600 and odd pagodas.”—In Wheeler, ii. 165.

1813.—Milburn, under Tanjore, gives the chuckrum as a coin equal to 20 Madras or ten gold fanams. 20 Madras fanams would be ½ of a pagoda.

[From the difficulty of handling these coins, which are small and round they are counted on a chuckrum board as in the case of the Fanams (q.v.).]

CHUDDER, s. H. chddar, a sheet or square piece of cloth of any kind the ample sheet commonly worn as a mantle by women in N. India. It is also applied to the cloths spread over Mahomedan tombs. Barbosa (1516) and Linschoten (1598) have chautar chautares, as a kind of cotton piece-goods, but it is certain that this is not the same word. Choutars occur among Bengal piece-goods in Milburn, ii. 22. [The word is chantâr, ‘anything with four threads,’ and it occurs in the list of cotton cloths in the Āin (i. 94). In a letter of 1610 we have “Chautar are white and well requested” (Danvers Letters, i. 75); “Chauters of Agra” (Foster, Letters, ii. 45); “Cocks ha “fine Casho or Chowter” (Diary, i. 86) and in 1615 they are called “Cowter” (Foster, iv. 51).]

1525.—“Chader of Cambaya.”—Lenbrança, 56.

[c. 1610.—“From Bengal comes another sort of hanging, of fine linen painted and ornamented with colours in a very agreeable fashion; these they call iader.”—Pyrrhus de Lalal, Hak. Soc. i. 222.]

1614.—“Pintados, chints and chadors.”—Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

1673.—“The habit of these water nymphs was fine Shudders of lawn embroidered on the neck, wrist, and skirt with a border of several coloured silks and threads of gold.”—Herbert, 3rd ed. 191.

1832.—“Chuddar . . . a large piece of cloth or sheet, of one and a half or two breadths, thrown over the head, so as to cover the whole body. Men usually sleep rolled up in it.”—Herklots, Quasoon-e-Islam, xii. xiii.

1878.—“Two or three women, who had been chattering away till we appeared, but who, on seeing us, drew their ‘chadders’ . . . round their faces, and retired to the further end of the boat.”—Life in the Mofussil, i. 79.

The Rampore Chuddar is a kind of shawl, of the Tibetan shawl-wool, of uniform colour without pattern, made originally at Rampur on the Sutlej; and of late years largely imported into England: [(see the Panjab Mono. on Wool, p. 9). Curiously enough a claim to the derivation of the title from Rampur, in Rohilkhand, N.W.P. is made in the Imperial Gazetteer, 1st ed. (s.v.).]

CHUL! CHULLO! v. in imperative; ‘Go on! Be quick.’ H. chalo! imper. of chalna, to go, go speedily. [Another common use of the word in Anglo-Indian slang is—“It won’t chul,” ‘it won’t answer, succeed.’]

c. 1790.—“Je montai de très-bonne heure dans mon palanquin.—Tschollo (c’est-à-dire, marche), crièrent mes coulis, et aussitôt le voyage commença.”—Hugbner, ii. 5.

[CHUMAR, s. H. Chamdr, Skt. charma-ktra, ‘one who works in leather,’ and thus answering to the Chuckler of S. India; an important caste found all through N. India, whose primary occupation is tanning, but a large number are agriculturists and day labourers of various kinds.

[1823.—“From this abomination, beef-eating . . . they [the Bhoels] only rank above the Choomars, or shoemakers, who feast on dead carcasses, and are in Central India, as elsewhere, deemed so unclean that they are not allowed to dwell within the precincts of the village.”—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. ii. 179.]

CHUMPUK, s. A highly ornamental and sacred tree (Michelia champaca, L., also M. Rheedia), a kind of magnolia, whose odorous yellow blossoms are much prized by Hindus, offered at shrines, and rubbed on the body at marriages, &c. H. champak, Skt. champakā. Drury strangely says that the name is “derived from Champa, an island between Cambogia and Cchin China, where the tree grows.” Champa is not an island, and certainly derives its Sanskrit name from India, and did not give a name to an Indian tree. The tree is found wild in the Himālaya from Nepāl, eastward; also in Pegu and Tenasserim, and along the Ghauts to Travancore. The use of the term champakā extends to the Philippine Islands. [Mr. Skeat notes that it is highly prized by Malay women, who put it in their hair.]

1623.—“Among others they showed me a flower, in size and form not unlike our lily, but of a yellowish white colour, with a sweet and powerful scent, and which they call champh [ciampā].”—P. della Valle, ii. 517; [Hak. Soc. i. 40].

1786.—“The walks are scented with blossoms of the champec and naguar, and the plantations of pepper and coffee are equally new and pleasing.”—Sir W. Jones, in Mem., &c., ii. 81.

1810.—“Some of these (birds) build in the sweet-scented champekā and the mango.”—Maria Graham, 22.

1819.—

“The wandering airs they faint
On the dark, the silent stream;
And the chumpak’s odours fall
Like sweet thoughts in a dream.”
Shelley, Lines to an Indian Air.

1821.—

“Some chumpak flowers proclaim it yet divine.”
Medwin, Sketches in Hindoostan, 73.

CHUNĀM, s. Prepared lime; also specially used for fine polished plaster. Forms of this word occur both in Dravidian languages and Hind. In the latter chūnd is from Skt. chūrṇa, ‘powder’; in the former it is somewhat uncertain whether the word is, or is not, an old derivative from the Sanskrit. In the first of the following quotations the word used seems taken from the Malayāl. chunṇāmba, Tam. shunṇāmbu.

1510.—“And they also eat with the said leaves (betel) a certain lime made from oyster shells, which they call cionama.”—Varihema, 144.

1563.—“ . . . so that all the names you meet with that are not Portuguese are Malabar; such as betre (betel), chuna, which is lime. . . .”—Garcia, f. 37g.

c. 1610.—“ . . . l’un porte son éventail, l’autre la boîte d’argent pleine de betel, l’autre une boîte ou il y a du chunan, qui est de la chaux.”—Pyrrard de Laval, ii. 84; [Hak. Soc. ii. 135].

1614.—“Having burnt the great idol into chunah, he mixed the powdered lime with pa leaves, and gave it to the Rājapūts that they might eat the objects of their worship.”—Firishta, quoted by Quatremère, Not. et Ext., xiv. 510.

1673.—“The Natives chew it (Betel) with Chinam (Lime of calcined Oyster Shells).”—Fryer, 40.

1687.—“That stores of Brick, Iron, Stones, and Chenam be in readiness to make up any breach.”—Madras Consultations, in Wheeler, i. 168.

1689.—“Chinam is Lime made of Cockle-shells, or Lime-stone; and Pawn is the Leaf of a Tree.”—Orington, 123.

1750-60.—“The flooring is generally composed of a kind of loam or stucco, called chunam, being a lime made of burnt shells.”—Grove, i. 52.

1763.—“In the Chuckleh of Silet for the space of five years . . . my phonsdar and the Company's gomastah shall jointly prepare chunam, of which each shall defray all expenses, and half the chunam so made shall be given to the Company, and the other half shall be for my use.”—Treaty of Mir Jafir with the Company, in Carraccioli's L. of Clive, i. 64.

1809.—“The row of chunam pillars which supported each side . . . were of a shining white.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 61.

CHUNĀM, TO, v. To set in mortar; or, more frequently, to plaster over with chunam.

1687.—“ . . . to get what great jars I can, to put wheat in, and chenam them up, and set them round the fort curtain.”—In Wheeler, i. 168.

1809.—“ . . . having one . . . room . . . beautifully chunammed.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 386.

Both noun and verb are used also in the Anglo-Chinese settlements.

CHUNĀRGURH, n.p. A famous rock-fort on the Ganges, above Benares, and on the right bank. The name is believed to be a corr. of Charana-giri, ‘Foot Hill,’ a name probably given from the actual resemblance of the rock, seen in longitudinal profile, to a human foot. [There is a local legend that it represents the foot of Vishnu. A native folk etymology makes it a corr. of Chandālgurh, from some legendary connection with the Bhangi tribe (see CHANDAUL). (See Crooke, Tribes and Castes, i. 263.)]

[1768.—“Sensible of the vast importance of the fort of Chunar to Sujah al Dowlah . . . we have directed Col. Barker to reinforce the garrison. . . .”—Letter to Court of Directors, in Verelst, App. 78.

[1785.—“Chunar, called by the natives Chundalghur. . . .”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 442.]

CHUPATTY, s. H. chapatti, an unleavened cake of bread (generally of coarse wheaten meal), patted flat with the hand, and baked upon a griddle; the usual form of native bread, and the staple food of Upper India. (See HOPPER).

1615.—Parson Terry well describes the thing, but names it not: “The ordinary sort of people eat bread made of a coarse grain, but both toothsome and wholesome and hearty. They make it up in broad cakes, thick like our oaten cakes; and then bake it upon small round iron hearths which they carry with them.”—In Purchas, ii. 1468.

1810.—“Chow-patties, or bannocks.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 348.

1857.—“From village to village brought by one messenger and sent forward by another passed a mysterious token in the shape of one of those flat cakes made from flour and water, and forming the common bread of the people, which in their language, are called chupatties.”—Kaye's Sepoy War, i. 570. [The original account of this by the Correspondent of the ‘Times,’ dated “Bombay, March 3, 1857,” is quoted in 2 ser. N. & Q. iii. 365.]

There is a tradition of a noble and gallant Governor-General who, when compelled to rough it for a day or two, acknowledged that “chuprassies and masaulchies were not such bad diet,” meaning Chupatties and Mussalla.

CHUPKUN, s. H. chapkan. The long frock (or cassock) which is the usual dress in Upper India of nearly all male natives who are not actual labourers or indigent persons. The word is probably of Turki or Mongol origin, and is perhaps identical with the chakman of the Āin (i. 90), a word still used in Turkistan. [Vambéry, (Sketches, 121 seqq.) describes both the Tchapam or upper coat and the Tchekmen or gown.] Hence Beames's connection of chapkan with the idea of chap as meaning compressing or clinging [Platts chapaknā, ‘to be pressed’], “a tightly-fitting coat or cassock,” is a little fanciful. (Comp. Gram. i. 212 seqq.) Still this idea may have shaped the corruption of a foreign word.

1883.—“He was, I was going to say, in his shirt-sleeves, only I am not sure that he wore a shirt in those days—I think he had a chupkun, or native under-garment.”—C. Raikes, in L. of Ld. Lawrence, i. 59.

CHUPRA, n.p. Chaprā, [or perhaps rather Chhaprā, 'a collection of straw huts,' (see CHOPPER),] a town and head-quarter station of the District Sāran in Bahār, on the north bank of the Ganges.

1665.—"The Hollānd Company have a House there (at Patna) by reason of their trade in Salt Peter, which they refine at a great Town called Choupar . . . 10 leagues above Patna."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 53; [ed. Ball, i. 122].

1726.—"Sjoppera (Chupra)."—Valentijn, Chorom., &c., 147.

CHUPRASSY, s. H. chaprasī, the bearer of a chapras, i.e. a badge-plate inscribed with the name of the office to which the bearer is attached. The chaprasī is an office-messenger, or henchman, bearing such a badge on a cloth or leather belt. The term belongs to the Bengal Presidency. In Madras Peon is the usual term; in Bombay Puttywalla, (H. pattīwālā), or "man of the belt." The etymology of chapras is obscure; [the popular account is that it is a corr. of P. chap-orāst, 'left and right']; but see Beames (Comp. Gram. i. 212), who gives buckle as the original meaning.

1865.—"I remember the days when every servant in my house was a chuprassee, with the exception of the Khansaumaun and a Portuguese Ayah."—The Durk Bungalow, p. 389.

c. 1866.—

"The big Sahib's tent has gone from under the Peepul tree, With his horde of hungry chuprassees, and oily sons of the quill—
I paid them the bribe they wanted, and Sheitan will settle the bill."

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

1877.—"One of my chuprassies or messengers . . . was badly wounded."—Meadows Taylor, Life, i. 227.

1880.—"Through this refractory medium the people of India see their rulers. The Chuprassie paints his master in colours drawn from his own black heart. Every lie he tells, every insinuation he throws out, every demand he makes, is endorsed with his master's name. He is the arch-slanderer of our name in India."—Ali Baba, 102-3.

CHURR, s. H. char, Skt. char, 'to move.' "A sand-bank or island in the current of a river, deposited by the water, claims to which were regulated by the Bengal Reg. xi. 1825" (Wilson). A char is new alluvial land deposited by the great rivers as the floods are sinking, and covered with grass, but not necessarily insulated. It is remarkable that Mr. Marsh mentions a very similar word as used for the same thing in Holland. "New sandbank land, covered with grasses, is called in Zeeland schor" (Man and Nature, p. 339). The etymologies are, however, probably quite apart.

1878.—"In the dry season all the various streams . . . are merely silver threads winding among innumerable sandy islands, the soil of which is specially adapted for the growth of Indigo. They are called Churs."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 3 seq.

CHURRUCK, s. A wheel or any rotating machine; particularly applied to simple machines for cleaning cotton. Pers. charkh, 'the celestial sphere,' 'a wheel of any kind,' &c. Beng. charak is apparently a corruption of the Persian word, facilitated by the nearness of the Skt. chakra, &c.

— POOJAH. Beng. charak-pūjā (see POOJA). The Swinging Festival of the Hindus, held on the sun's entrance into Aries. The performer is suspended from a long yard, traversing round on a mast, by hooks passed through the muscle over the blade-bones, and then whirled round so as to fly out centrifugally. The chief seat of this barbarous display is, or latterly was, in Bengal, but it was formerly prevalent in many parts of India. [It is the Shirry (Ca. and Tel. sidi, Tam. shedil, Tel. sidi, 'a hook') of S. India.] There is an old description in Purchas's Pilgrimage, p. 1000; also (in Malabar) in A. Hamilton, i. 270; [at Ikkeri, P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 259]; and (at Calcutta) in Heber's Journal, quoted below.

c. 1430.—"Alii ad ornandos currus perforato latere, fune per corpus immisso se ad currum suspendunt, pendentisque et ipsi exanimati idolum comitantur; id optimum sacrificium putant et acceptissimum deo."—Conti, in Poggins, De Var. Fortunae, iv.

[1754.—See a long account of the Bengal rite in Ives, 27 seq.].

1824.—"The Hindoo Festival of 'Churruck Poojah' commenced to-day, of which, as my wife has given an account in her journal, I shall only add a few particulars."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 57.

CHURRUS, s.

a. H. charas. A simple apparatus worked by oxen for drawing water from a well, and discharging it into irrigation channels by means of pulley ropes, and a large bag of hide (H. charu, Skt. charma). [See the description in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 153. Hence the area irrigated from a well.]

[1829.—“To each Churru, churru, or skin of land, there is attached twenty-five beoghas of irrigated land.”—Tal. Annals (Calcutta repr.), ii. 688.]

b. H. charas, [said to be so called because the drug is collected by men who walk with leather aprons through the field]. The resinous exudation of the hemp-plant (Cannabis Indica), which is the basis of intoxicating preparations (see BANG, GUNJA).

[1842.—“The Moolah sometimes smoked the intoxicating drug called Chira.”—Elphinstone, Caubul, i. 344.]

CHUTKARRY, CHATTAGAR, in S. India, a half-caste; Tam. shutti-kar, ‘one who wears a waistcoat’ (C. P. B.).

CHUTNY, s. H. chatnī. A kind of strong relish, made of a number of condiments and fruits, &c., used in India, and more especially by Mahomedans, and the merits of which are now well known in England. For native chutny recipes, see Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, 2nd ed. xlvii. seqq.

1813.—“The Chatna is sometimes made with cocoa-nut, lime-juice, garlic, and chillies, and with the pickles is placed in deep leaves round the large cover, to the number of 30 or 40.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 50 seq.; [2nd ed. i. 348].

1820.—“Chitnee, Chatnee, some of the hot spices made into a paste, by being bruised with water, the ‘kitchen’ of an Indian peasant.”—Acc. of Township of Loony, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bombay, ii. 194.

CHUTT, s. H. chhat. The proper meaning of the vernacular word is ‘a roof or platform.’ But in modern Anglo-Indian its usual application is to the coarse cotton sheeting, stretched on a frame and whitewashed, which forms the usual ceiling of rooms in thatched or tiled houses; properly chādar-chhat, ‘sheet-ceiling.’

CHUTTANUTTY, n.p. This was one of the three villages purchased for the East India Company in 1686, when the agents found their position in Hugli intolerable, to form the settlement which became the city of Calcutta. The other two villages were Calcutta and Govindpūr. Dr. Hunter spells it Sātānatī, but the old Anglo-Indian orthography indicates Chatānatī as probable. In the letter-books of the Factory Council in the India Office the earlier letters from this establishment are lost, but down to 27th March, 1700, they are dated from “Chuttanutte”; on and after June 8th, from “Calcutta”; and from August 20th in the same year from “Fort William” in Calcutta. [See Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lix.] According to Major Ralph Smyth, Chatānatī occupied “the site of the present native town,” i.e. the northern quarter of the city. Calcutta stood on what is now the European commercial part; and Govindpūr on the present site of Fort William.*

1753.—“The Hoagly Phousdar demanding the payment of the ground rent for 4 months from January, namely:—

Agreed that the President do pay the same out of cash.”—Consul. Ft. William, April 30, in Long, 43.

CHUTTRUM, s. Tam shuttiram, which is a corruption of Skt. sattra, ‘abode.’ In S. India a house where pilgrims and travelling members of the higher castes are entertained and fed gratuitously for a day or two. [See CHOULTRY, DHURMSALLA.]

1807.—“There are two distinct kinds of buildings confounded by Europeans under the name of Choultry. The first is that called by the natives Chaturam, and built for the accommodation of travellers. These . . . have in general pent roofs . . . built in the form of a square enclosing a court. . . . The other kind are properly built for the reception of images, when these are carried in procession. These have flat roofs, and consist of one apartment only, and by the natives are called Mandapam. . . . Besides the Chaturam and the Mandapam, there is another kind of building which by Europeans is called Choultry; in the Tamil language it is called Tany Pandal, or Water Shed . . . small buildings where weary travellers may enjoy a temporary repose in the shade, and obtain a draught of water or milk.”—F. Buchanan, Mysore, i. 11, 15.

* Stat. and Geog. Rep. of the 24 Pergunnahs District, Calcutta, 1857, p. 57.

CINDERELLA'S SLIPPER. A Hindu story on the like theme appears among the Hala Kanara MSS. of the Mackenzie Collection:—

"Suvarnashani having dropped her slipper in a reservoir, it was found by a fisherman of Kannabavari, who sold it to a shopkeeper, by whom it was presented to the King Ugratana. The Prince, on seeing the beauty of the slipper, fell in love with the wearer, and offered large rewards to any person who should find and bring her to him. An old woman undertook the task, and succeeded in tracing the shoe to its owner. . . ."—Mackenzie Collection, by H. H. Wilson, ii. 52. [The tale is not uncommon in Indian folk-lore. See Misa Cui, Cinderella (Folk-lore Soc.) ii. 91, 183, 465, &c.]

CINTRA ORANGES. See ORANGE and SUNOTARA.

CIRCARS, n.p. The territory to the north of the Coromandel Coast, formerly held by the Nizam, and now forming the districts of Kistna, Godavari, Vizagapatam, Ganjam, and a part of Nellore, was long known by the title of "The Circars," or "Northern Circars" (i.e. Governments), now officially obsolete. The Circars of Chicacole (now Vizagapatam Dist.), Rajamandri and Ellore (these two embraced now in Godavari Dist.), with Condapilly (now embraced in Kistna Dist.), were the subject of a grant from the Great Mogul, obtained by Clive in 1765, confirmed by treaty with the Nizam in 1766. Guntur (now also included in Kistna Dist.) devolved eventually by the same treaty (but did not come permanently under British rule till 1803. [For the history see Madras Admin. Man. i. 179.] C. P. Brown says the expression "The Circars" was first used by the French, in the time of Bussy. [Another name for the Northern Circars was the Carling or Carlingo country, apparently a corr. of Kalinga (see KLING), see Pringle, Diary, &c., of Ft. St. George, 1st ser. vol. 2, p. 125. (See SIRCAB.)]

1758.—"Il est à remarquer qu'après mon départ d'Ayder Abad, Solabet Zingus a nommé un Phadar, ou Gouverneur, pour les quatre Cerkars."—Mémoire, by Bussy, in Lettres de MM. de Bussy, de Lally et autres, Paris, 1766, p. 24.

1767.—"Letter from the Chief and Council at Masulipatam . . . that in consequence of orders from the President and Council of "t St. George for securing and sending away all vagrant Europeans that might be met with in the Circars, they have embarked there for this place. . . ."—Fort William Concn., in Long, 478 sq.

1789.—"The most important public transaction . . . is the surrender of the Guntour Circar to the Company, by which it becomes possessed of the whole Coast, from Jagger-naut to Cape Comorin. The Nizam made himself master of that province, soon after Hyder's invasion of the Carnatic, as an equivalent for the arrears of peachuck, due to him by the Company for the other Circars."—Letter of T. Munro, in Lyr by Clive, i. 70.

1823.—"Although the Strikars are our earliest possessions, there are none, perhaps, of which we have so little accurate knowledge in everything that regards the condition of the people."—Sir T. Munro, in Selections, &c., by Sir A. Arbuthnot, i. 204.

We know from the preceding quotation what Munro's spelling of the name was.

1836.—"The district called the Circars, in India, is part of the coast which extends from the Carnatic to Bengal. . . . The domestic economy of the people is singular; they inhabit villages ("), and all labour is performed by public servants paid from the public stock."—Phillips, Million of Facts, 520.

1878.—"General Sir J. C., C.B., K.C.S.I. He entered the Madras Army in 1820, and in 1834, according to official despatches, displayed 'active seal, intrepidity, and judgment' in dealing with the marag tribes (a tribe known as the Circars) (!!!).—Obituary Notice in Homeward Mail, April 27.

CIVILIAN, a. A term which came into use about 1750-1770, as a designation of the covenanted European servants of the E. I. Company, not in military employ. It is not used by Grose, c. 1760, who was himself of such service at Bombay. [The earliest quotation in the N.E.D. is of 1766 from Malcolm's L. of Clive, 54.] In Anglo-Indian parlance it is still appropriated to members of the covenanted Civil Service [see COVENANTED SERVANTS]. The Civil Service is mentioned in Carraccioli's L. of Clive, (c. 1785), iii. 164. From an early date in the Company's history up to 1833, the members of the Civil Service were classified during the first five years as Writers (q.v.), then to the 8th year as Factors (q.v.); in the 9th and 11th as Junior Merchants; and thenceforward as Senior Merchants. These names were relics of the original commercial character of the E. I. Company's transactions, and had long ceased to have any practical meaning at the time of their abolition in 1833, when the Charter Act (3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 85), removed the last traces of the Company's commercial existence.

1848.—(Lady O'Dowd's) "quarrel with Lady Smith, wife of Minos Smith the puisne Judge, is still remembered by some at Madras, when the Colonel's lady snapped her fingers in the Judge's lady's face, and said she'd never walk behind ever a beggarly civilian."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 85.

1872.—"You bloated civilians are never satisfied, retorted the other."—A True Reformer, i. 4.

CLASSY, CLASHY, s. H. khalāsi, usual etym. from Arab khalāṣa. A tent-pitcher; also (because usually taken from that class of servants) a man employed as chain-man or staff-man, &c., by a surveyor; a native sailor; or Matross (q.v.). Khalāṣa is constantly used in Hindustani in the sense of 'liberation'; thus, of a prisoner, a magistrate says 'khalāṣa karo,' 'let him go.' But it is not clear how khalāsi got its ordinary Indian sense. It is also written khalāshī, and Vullers has an old Pers. word khalāsha for 'a ship's rudder.' A learned friend suggests that this may be the real origin of khalāsi in its Indian use. [Khalāṣa also means the 'escape channel of a canal,' and khalāsi may have been originally a person in charge of such a work.]

1785.—"A hundred clashies have been sent to you from the presence."—Tippoo's Letters, 171.

1801.—"The sepoys in a body were to bring up the rear. Our left flank was to be covered by the sea, and our right by Gopie Nath's men. Then the clashies and other armed followers."—Mt. Stewart Elphinstone, in Life, i. 27.

1824.—"If the tents got dry, the clashes (tent-pitchers) allowed that we might proceed in the morning prosperously."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 194.

CLEARING NUT, WATER FILTER NUT, s. The seed of Strychnos potatorum, L.; a tree of S. India; [known in N. India as nirmala, nirmali, 'dirt-cleaner']. It is so called from its property of clearing muddy water, if well rubbed on the inside of the vessel which is to be filled.

CLOVE, s. The flower-bud of Caryophyllum aromaticum, L., a tree of the Moluccas. The modern English name of this spice is a kind of ellipsis from the French clous de girofles, 'Nails of Girofles,' i.e. of garofala, caryophylla, &c., the name by which this spice was known to the ancients; the full old English name was similar, 'clove gillo-floure,' a name which, cut in two like a polypus, has formed two different creatures, the clove (or nail) being assigned to the spice, and the 'gilly-flower' to a familiar clove-smelling flower. The comparison to nails runs through many languages. In Chinese the thing is called ting-hiang, or 'nail-spice'; in Persian mekhak, 'little nails,' or 'nailkins,' like the German Nelken, Nägelchen, and Gewürtz-nagel (spice nail).

[1602-3.—"Also be carefull to gett together all the cloues you can." Birdland, First Letter Book, 36.]

COAST, THE, n.p. This term in books of the 18th century means the 'Madras or Coromandel Coast,' and often 'the Madras Presidency.' It is curious to find Ἡπαλία, "the Shore," applied in a similar specific way, in Ptolemy, to the coast near Cape Comorin. It will be seen that the term "Coast Army," for "Madras Army," occurs quite recently. The Persian rendering of Coast Army by Bandarī below is curious.

1781.—"Just imported from the Coast . . . a very fine assortment of the following cloths."—India Gazette, Sept. 15.

1793.—"Unseduced by novelty, and uninfluenced by example, the belles of the Coast have courage enough to be unfashionable . . . and we still see their charming tresses flow in luxuriant ringlets." Hugh Boyd, 78.

1800. "I have only 1892 Coast and 1200 Bombay sepoys."—Wellington, i. 227.

1802.—"From Hydrabad also, Colonels Roberts and Dalrymple, with 4000 of the Banduri or coast sipahees."—H. of Reign of Tipu Sultan, E. T. by Miles, p. 253.

1879.—"Is it any wonder then, that the Coast Army has lost its ancient renown, and that it is never employed, as an army should be, in fighting the battles of its country, or its employers?"—Pollok, Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 26.

COCHIN-CHINA, n.p. This country was called by the Malays Kuchi, and apparently also, to distinguish it from Kuchi of India (or Cochin), Kuchi-China, a term which the Portuguese adopted as Cauchi-China; the Dutch and English from them. Kuchi occurs in this sense in the Malay traditions called Sijara Malayu (see J. Ind. Archip., v. 729). In its origin this word Kuchi is no doubt a foreigner's form of the Annamite Kuu-chôn (Chin. Kiu-Ching, South Chin. Kau-Chen), which was the ancient name of the province Thanh'-hoa, in which the city of Huë has been the capital since 1398.*

COCKUP, s. An excellent table-fish, found in the mouths of tidal rivers in most parts of India. In Calcutta it is generally known by the Beng. name of begtī or bhiktī (see BHIKTY), and it forms the daily breakfast dish of half the European gentlemen in that city. The name may be a corruption, we know not of what; or it may be given from the erect sharp spines of the dorsal fin. [The word is a corr. of the Malay (ikan) kakap, which Klinkert defines as a palatable sea-fish, Lates nobilis, the more common form being siyakap.] It is Lates calcarifer (Günther) of the group Percina, family Percidae, and grows to an immense size, sometimes to eight feet in length.

COCO, COCOA, COCOA-NUT, and (vulg.) COKER-NUT, s. The tree and nut Cocos nucifera, L.; a palm found in all tropical countries, and the only one common to the Old and New Worlds.

The etymology of this name is very obscure. Some conjectural origins are given in the passages quoted below. Ritter supposes, from a passage in Pigafetta's Voyage of Magellan, which we cite, that the name may have been indigenous in the Ladrone Islands, to which that passage refers, and that it was first introduced into Europe by Magellan's crew. On the other hand, the late Mr. C. W. Goodwin found in ancient Egyptian the word kuku used as "the name of the fruit of a palm 60 cubits high, which fruit contained water." (Chabas, Mélanges Égyptologiques, ii. 239.) It is hard, however, to conceive how this name should have survived, to reappear in Europe in the later Middle Ages, without being known in any intermediate literature.*

The more common etymology is that which is given by Barros, Garcia de Orta, Linschoten, &c., as from a Spanish word coco applied to a monkey's or other grotesque face, with reference to the appearance of the base of the shell with its three holes. But after all may the term not have originated in the old Span. coca, 'a shell' (presumably Lat. concha), which we have also in French coque? properly an egg-shell, but used also for the shell of any nut. (See a remark under COPRAH.)

The Skt. narikila [nārikera, nārikela] has originated the Pers. nārgīl, which Cosmas grecizes into ἀργελλίον, [and H. ndriyal].

Medieval writers generally (such as Marco Polo, Fr. Jordanus, &c.) call the fruit the Indian Nut, the name by which it was known to the Arabs (al jauz-al-Hindī). There is no evidence of its having been known to classical writers, nor are we aware of any Greek or Latin mention of it before Cosmas. But Brugsch, describing from the Egyptian wall-paintings of c. B.C. 1600, on the temple of Queen Hashop, representing the expeditions by sea which she sent to the Incense Land of Punt, says: "Men never seen before, the inhabitants of this divine land, showed themselves on the coast, not less astonished than the Egyptians. They lived on pile-buildings, in little dome-shaped huts, the entrance to which was effected by a ladder, under the shade of cocoa-palms laden with fruit, and splendid incense-trees, on whose boughs strange fowls rocked themselves, and at whose feet herds of cattle peacefully reposed." (H. of Egypt, 2nd ed. i. 353; [Maspero, Struggle of the Nations, 248].)

c. A.D. 70.—"In ipsa quidem Aethiopia fricatur haec, tanta est siccitas, et farinae modo spissatur in panem. Gignitur autem in frutice ramis cubitalibus, folio latiore, pomo rotundo majore quam mali amplitudine, coicas vocant."—Pliny, xiii. § 9.

c. 1328.—"First of these is a certain tree called Nargil; which tree every month in the year sends out a beautiful frond like [that of] a [date-] palm tree, which frond or branch produces very large fruit, as big as a man's head. . . . And both flowers and fruit are produced at the same time, beginning with the first month, and going up gradually to the twelfth. . . . The fruit is that which we call nuts of India."—Friar Jordanus, 15 seq. The wonder of the coco-palm is so often noticed in this form by medieval writers, that doubtless in their

* It may be noted that Theophrastus describes under the names of κύκας and κόιξ a palm of Ethiopia, which was perhaps the Doom palm of Upper Egypt (Theoph. H. P. ii. 6, 10). 1553.—"Our people have given it the name of coco, a word applied by women to anything with which they try to frighten children; and this name has stuck, because nobody knew any other, though the proper name was, as the Malabars call it, tenga, or as the Canarins call it, narle."—Barros, Dec. The parallel passage in De Bry runs: "Illas quoque quæ nuces Indicas coccos, id est Simias (intus enim simiæ caput referunt) dictas palmas appellant."—i. 29.

Purchas has various forms in different narratives: Cocus (i. 37); Cokers, a form which still holds its ground among London stall-keepers and costermongers (i. 461, 502); coquer-nuts (Terry, in ii. 1466); coco (ii. 1008); coquo (Pilgrimage, 567), &c.

c. 1690.—Rumphius, who has cocus in Latin, and cocos in Dutch, mentions the derivation already given as that of Linschoten and many others, but proceeds:—

"Meo vero judicio verior et certior vocis origo invenienda est, plures enim nationes, quibus hic fructus est notus, nucem appellant. Sic dicitur Arabicè Gauzos-Indi vel Geuzos-Indi, h. e. Nux Indica. . . . Turcis Cock-Indi eadem significatione, unde sine dubio Ætiopes, Africani, eorumque vicini Hispani ac Portugalli coquo deflexerunt. The Dict. Hist. d'Argot of Lorédan Larchey, from which this seems taken, explains picton as 'vin supérieur.'

COCO-DE-MER, or DOUBLE COCO-NUT, s. The curious twin fruit so called, the produce of the Lodoicea Sechellarum, a palm growing only in the Seychelles Islands, is cast up on the shores of the Indian Ocean, most frequently on the Maldivé

Islands, but occasionally also on Ceylon and S. India, and on the coasts of Zanzibar, of Sumatra, and some others of the Malay Islands.

Great virtues as medicine and antidote were supposed to reside in these fruits.

and extravagant prices were paid for them. The story goes that a "country captain," expecting to make his fortune, took a cargo of these nuts from the Seychelles Islands to Calcutta, but the only result was to destroy their value for the future.

The old belief was that the fruit was produced on a palm growing below the sea, whose fronds, according to Malay seamen, were sometimes seen in quiet bights on the Sumatran coast, especially in the Lampong Bay. According to one form of the story among the Malays, which is told both by Pigafetta and by Rumphius, there was but one such tree, the fronds of which rose above an abyss of the Southern Ocean, and were the abode of the monstrous bird Garuda (or Rukh of the Arabs—see ROC).^{*} The tree itself was called Pausengi, which Rumphius seems to interpret as a corruption of Buwa-zangi, "Fruit of Zang" or E. Africa. [Mr. Skeat writes: "Rumphius is evidently wrong. . . . The first part of the word is 'Pau,' or 'Pauh,' which is perfectly good Malay, and is the name given to various species of mango, especially the wild one, so that 'Pausengi' represents (not 'Buwa,' but) 'Pauh Janggi,' which is to this day the universal Malay name for the tree which grows, according to Malay fable, in the central whirlpool or Navel of the Seas. Some versions add that it grows upon a sunken bank (tébing runtuh), and is guarded by dragons. This tree figures largely in Malay romances, especially those which form the subject of Malay shadow-plays (vide infra, Pl. 23, for an illustration of the Pauh Janggi and the Crab). Rumphius' explanation of the second part of the name (i.e. Janggi) is, no doubt, quite correct."—Malay Magic, pp. 6 seqq.)] They were cast up occasionally on the islands off the S.W. coast of Sumatra; and the wild people of the islands brought them for sale to the Sumatran marts, such as Padang and Priamang. One of the largest (say about 12 inches across) would sell for 150 rix dollars. But the Malay princes coveted them greatly, and would sometimes (it was alleged) give a laden junk for a single nut. In India the best known source of supply was from the Maldivé Islands. [In India it is known as Darydī nāriyal, or 'cocoa-nut of the sea,' and this term has been in Bombay corrupted into jaharī (zaharī) or 'poisonous,' so that the fruit is incorrectly regarded as dangerous to life. The hard shell is largely used to make Fakirs' water-bowls.]

The medicinal virtues of the nut were not only famous among all the peoples of the East, including the Chinese, but are extolled by Piso and by Rumphius, with many details. The latter, learned and laborious student of nature as he was, believed in the submarine origin of the nut, though he discredited its growing on a great palm, as no traces of such a plant had ever been discovered on the coasts. The fame of the nut's virtues had extended to Europe, and the Emperor Rudolf II. in his later days offered in vain 4000 florins to purchase from the family of Wolfert Hermanszen, a Dutch Admiral, one that had been presented to that commander by the King of Bantam, on the Hollander's relieving his capital, attacked by the Portuguese, in 1602.

It will be seen that the Maldivé name of this fruit was Tāva-kārhi. The latter word is 'coco-nut,' but the meaning of tāva does not appear from any Maldivé vocabulary. [The term is properly Tāva'karhi, 'the hard-shelled nut,' (Gray, on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 231).] Rumphius states that a book in 4to (totum opusculum) was published on this nut, at Amsterdam in 1634, by Augerius Clutius, M.D. [In more recent times the nut has become famous as the subject of curious speculations regarding it by the late Gen. Gordon.]

1522.—"They also related to us that beyond Java Major . . . there is an enormous tree named Campanganghi, in which dwell certain birds named Garuda, so large that they take with their claws, and carry away flying, a buffalo and even an elephant, to the place of the tree. . . . The fruit of this tree is called Buapanganghi, and is larger than a water-melon . . . it was understood that those fruits which are frequently found in the sea came from that place."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. p. 155.

1553.—". . . it appears . . . that in some places beneath the salt-water there grows

^{*} This mythical story of the unique tree producing this nut curiously shadows the singular fact that one island only (Praslin) of that secluded group, the Seychelles, bears the Lodoicea as an indigenous and spontaneous product. (See Sir L. Pelly, in J.R.G.S., xxxv. 232.)

Wilford has some Wilfordian nonsense about it, connecting it with the Torodora R. of Ptolemy, and with a Touascan which he says is mentioned by the “Portuguese writers” (in such case a criminal mode of expression). The name was really that of a Mahommedan chief, “hum Principe Moura, grande Senhor,” and “Vassalo del Rey de Bengila.” It was probably “Khodābakhsh Khān.” His territory must have been south of Chittagong, for one of his towns was Chacurid, still known as Chakiria on the Chittagong and Arakan Road, in lat 21° 45'. COFFEE, s. Arab. kahwa, a word which appears to have been originally a term for wine.* [So in the Arab. Nights, ii. 168, where Burton gives the derivation as akhd, fastidire fecit, causing disinclination for food. In old days the scrupulous called coffee kahwa to distinguish it from kahwah, wine.] It is probable, therefore, that a somewhat similar word was twisted into this form by the usual propensity to strive after meaning. Indeed, the derivation of the name has been plausibly traced to Kaffa, one of those districts of the S. Abyssinian highlands (Enarea and Kaffa) which appear to have been the original habitat of the Coffee plant (Coffea arabica, L.); and if this is correct, then Coffea is nearer the original than Kahwa. On the other hand, Kahwa, or some form thereof, is in the earliest mentions appropriated to the drink, whilst some form of the word Bawa is that given to the plant, and Bwa is the existing name of the plant in Shoa. This name is also that applied in Yemen to the coffee-berry. There is very fair evidence in Arabic literature that the use of coffee was introduced into Aden by a certain Sheikh Shihabuddin Dhabbani, who had made acquaintance with it on the African coast, and who died in the year H. 875, i.e. A.D. 1470, so that the introduction may be put about the middle of the 15th century, a time consistent with the other negative and positive data.† From Yemen it spread to Mecca (where there arose after some years, in 1511, a crusade against its use as unlawful), to Cairo, to Damascus and Aleppo, and to Constantinople where the first coffee-house was established in 1554. [It is said to have been introduced into S. India some two centuries ago by a Mahomedan pilgrim, named Bala Būdan, who brought a few seeds with him from Mecca: see Grigg, Nilagiri Man. 493; Rice, Mysore, i. 163.] The first European mention of coffee seems to be by Rauwolf, who knew it in Aleppo in 1573. [See 1 ser. N. & Q. I. 25 seq.] It is singular that in the Observations of Pierre Belon, who was in Egypt, 1546-49, full of intelligence and curious matter as they are, there is no indication of a knowledge of coffee.

1573.—"Among the rest they have a very good Drink, by them called Chaaba, that is almost black as Ink, and very good in Illness, chiefly that of the Stomach; of this they drink in the Morning early in open places before everybody, without any fear or regard, out of China cups, as hot as they can; they put it often to their Lips, but drink but little at a Time, and let it go round as they sit. In the same water they take a Fruit called Bawa, which in its Bigness, Shape, and Colour, is almost like unto a Bay-berry, with two thin Shells . . . they agree in the Virtue, Figure, Look, and Name with the Bancho of Avicenna,* and Bancho of Rasis al Ahmans, exactly; therefore I take them to be the same."—Rauwolf, 92.

COIMBATORE, n.p. Name of a District and town in the Madras Presidency. Koyammutūru; [Kōni, the local goddess so called, muttu, ‘pearl,’ ūr, ‘village’].

COIR, s. The fibre of the coco-nut husk, from which rope is made. But properly the word, which is Tam. kayiru, Malayāl. kāyar, from v. kāydrū. ‘to be twisted,’ means ‘cord’ itself (see the accurate Al-Birūnī below). The former use among Europeans is very early. And both the fibre and the rope made from it appear to have been exported to Europe in the middle of the 16th century. The word appears in early Arabic writers in the forms kānbar and kanbār, arising probably from some misreading of the diacritical points (for kāiyar, and kaiyār). The Portuguese adopted the word in the form cairo. The form coir seems to have been introduced by the English in the 18th century. [The N.E.D. gives coire in 1697; coir in 1779.] It was less likely to be used by the Portuguese because coiro in their language is ‘leather.’ And Barros (where quoted below) says allusively of the rope: “parece feito de coiro (leather) encolhen-do e estendendo a vontade do mar,” contracting and stretching with the movement of the sea.

COLLERY-STICK, s. This is a kind of throwing-stick or boomerang used by the Colleries.

1801.—"It was he first taught me to throw the spear, and hurl the Collery-stick, a weapon scarcely known elsewhere, but in a skilful hand capable of being thrown to a certainty to any distance within 100 yards."—Welsh's Reminiscences, i. 130.

Nelson calls these weapons "Vallari Thadis or boomerangs."—Madura, Pt. ii. 44. [The proper form seems to be Tam. valai tādī, 'curved stick'; more usually Tam. kallardādī, tādī, 'stick.'] See also Sir Walter Elliot in J. Ethnol. Soc., N. S., i. 112, seq.

COLOMBO, n.p. Properly Kolumbu, the modern capital of Ceylon, but a place of considerable antiquity. The derivation is very uncertain; some suppose it to be connected with the adjoining river Kalani-gangi. The name Columbum, used in several medieval narratives, belongs not to this place but to Kaulam (see QUILON).

c. 1346.—"We started for the city of Kalanbū, one of the finest and largest cities of the island of Serendīb. It is the residence of the Wazir Lord of the Sea (Hakim-al-Bahr), Jālastī, who has with him about 500 Habshis."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 185.

1517.—"The next day was Thursday in Passion Week; and they, well remembering this, and inspired with valour, said to the King that in fighting the Moors they would be insensible to death, which they greatly desired rather than be slaves to the Moors. . . . There were not 40 men in all, whole and sound for battle. And one brave man made a cross on the tip of a cane, which he set in front for standard, saying that God was his Captain, and that was his Flag, under which they should march deliberately against Columbo, where the Moor was with his forces."—Correa, ii. 521.

1553.—“The King, Don Manuel, because . . . he knew . . . that the King of Colombo, who was the true Lord of the Cinnamon, desired to possess our peace and friendship, wrote to the said Alfonso d'Albuquerque, who was in the island in person, that if he deemed it well, he should establish a fortress in the harbour of Colombo, so as to make sure the offers of the King.”—Barros, Dec. III. liv. ii. cap. 2.

COLUMBO ROOT, CALUMBA ROOT, is stated by Milburn (1813) to be a staple export from Mozambique, being in great esteem as a remedy for dysentery, &c. It is Jateorhiza palmata, Miers; and the name Kalumb is of E. African origin (Hanbury and Flückiger, 23). [The N.E.D. takes it from Colombo, ‘under a false impression that it was supplied from thence.’] The following quotation is in error as to the name :

c. 1779.—“Radix Colombo . . . derives its name from the town of Colombo, from whence it is sent with the ships to Europe (!); but it is well known that this root is neither found near Columbia, nor upon the whole island of Ceylon. . . .”—Thunberg, Travels, iv. 185.

1782.—“Any person having a quantity of fresh sound Columbia Root to dispose of, will please direct a line. . . .”—India Gazette, Aug. 24.

[1809.—“An Account of the Male Plant, which furnishes the Medicine generally called Columbo or Colomba Root.”—Asiat. Res. x. 385 seqq.]

1850.—“Caoutchouc, or India-rubber, is found in abundance . . . (near Tette) . . . and calumba-root is plentiful. . . . The India-rubber is made into balls for a game resembling ‘fives,’ and calumba-root is said to be used as a mordant for certain colours, but not as a dye itself.”—Livingstone, Expedition to the Zambesi, &c., p. 32.

COMAR, n.p. This name (Ar. al-Kumār), which appears often in the old Arab geographers, has been the subject of much confusion among modern commentators, and probably also among the Arabs themselves; some of the former (e.g. the late M. Reinaud) confounding it with C. Comorin, others with Kāmṛūp (or Assam). The various indications, e.g. that it was on the continent, and facing the direction of Arabia, i.e. the west; that it produced most valuable aloes-wood; that it lay a day's voyage, or three days' voyage, west of Sanf or Champa (q.v.), and from ten to twenty days' sail from Zābaj (or Java), together with the name, identify it with Camboja, or Khmer, as the native name is (see Reinaud, Rel. des Arabes, i. 97, ii. 48, 49; Gildemeister, 156 seqq.; Ibn Batuta, iv. 240; Abulfeda, Cathay and the Way Thither, 519, 569). Even the sagacious De Orta is misled by the Arabs, and confounds alcomari with a product of Cape Comorin (see Colloquios, f. 120r.).

CÓMATY, s. Telug. and Canar. kōmati, ‘a trader,’ [said to be derived from Skt. go, ‘eye,’ mushti, ‘fist,’ from their vigilant habits]. This is a term used chiefly in the north of the Madras Presidency, and corresponding to Chetty, [which the males assume as an affix].

1627.—“The next Tribe is there termed Committy, and these are generally the Merchants of the Place who by themselves or their servants, travell into the Countrey, gathering up Callicoes from the weavers, and other commodities, which they sell againe in greater parcels.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 997.

[1679.—“There came to us the Factory this day a Dworfe an Indian of the Comitte Cast, he was he said 30 years old . . . we measured him by the rule 46 inches high, all his limbs and his body streight and equall proportioned, of comely face, his speech small equalling his stature. . . .”—Steynsham Master, in Kistna Man. 142.

[1869.—“Komatis.” See quotation under CHUCKLER.]

COMBACONUM, n.p., written Kumbakonam. Formerly the seat of the Chola dynasty. Col. Branfill gives, as the usual derivation, Skt. Kumbhakona, ‘brim of a water-pot’; [the Madras Gloss. Skt. kumbha, kona, ‘lane’] and this form is given in Williams's Skt. Dict. as ‘name of a town.’ The fact that an idol in the Saiva temple at Combacanam is called Kumbhēśvaram (‘Lord of the water-pot’) may possibly be a justification of this etymology. But see general remarks on S. Indian names in the Introduction.

COMBOY. A sort of skirt or kilt of white calico, worn by Singhalese of both sexes, much in the same way as the Malay Sarong. The derivation which Sir E. Tennent (Ceylon, i. 612, ii. 107) gives of the word is quite inadmissible. He finds that a Chinese author describes the people of Ceylon as wearing a cloth made of koo-pei, i.e. of cotton; and he assumes therefore that those people call their own dress by a Chinese name for cotton! The word, however, is not real Singhalese; and we can have no doubt that it is the proper name Cambay. Paños de Cābaya are mentioned early as used in Ceylon (Castanheda, ii. 78), and Cambays by Forrest (Voyage to Mergui, 79). In the Government List of Native Words (Ceylon, 1869) the form used in the Island is actually Kambāya. A picture of the dress is given by Tennent (Ceylon, i. 612). It is now usually of white, but in mourning black is used.

1615.—“Tansho Samme, the Kinges kinsman, brought two pec. Cambala cloth.”—Cocks's Diary, i. 15.

[1674-5.—“Cambaja Brawles.”—Invoice in Birdwood, Report on Old Recs., p. 42.]

COMMERCOLLY, n.p. A small but well-known town of Lower Bengal in the Nadiya District; properly Kumdr-khālī [‘Prince’s Creek’]. The name is familiar in connection with the feather trade (see ADJUTANT).

COMMISSIONER, s. In the Bengal and Bombay Presidencies this is a grade in the ordinary administrative hierarchy; it does not exist in Madras, but is found in the Punjab, Central Provinces, &c. The Commissioner is over a Division embracing several Districts or Zillahs, and stands between the Collectors and Magistrates of these Districts on the one side, and the Revenue Board (if there is one) and the Local Government on the other. In the Regulation Provinces he is always a member of the Covenanted Civil Service; in Non-Regulation Provinces he may be a military officer; and in these the District officers immediately under him are termed ‘Deputy Commissioners.’

COMMISSIONER, CHIEF. A high official, governing a Province inferior to a Lieutenant-Governorship, in direct subordination to the Governor-General in Council. Thus the Punjab till 1859 was under a Chief Commissioner, as was Oudh till 1877 (and indeed, though the offices are united, the Lieut.-Governor of the N.W. Provinces holds also the title of Chief Commissioner of Oudh). The Central Provinces, Assam, and Burma are other examples of Provinces under Chief Commissioners.

COMORIN, CAPE, n.p. The extreme southern point of the Peninsula of India; a name of great antiquity. No doubt Wilson’s explanation is perfectly correct; and the quotation from the Periplus corroborates it. He says: “Kumdrī, . . . a young girl, a princess; a name of the goddess Durgā, to whom a temple dedicated at the extremity of the Peninsula has long given to the adjacent cape and coast the name of Kumdrī, corrupted to Comorin. . . .” The Tamil pronunciation is Kumdrī.

c. 80-90.—“Another place follows called Komāp, at which place is (* * *) and a port; * and here those who wish to consecrate the remainder of their life come and bathe, and there remain in celibacy. The same do women likewise. For it is related that the goddess there tarried a while and bathed.”—Periplus, in Müller’s Geog. Gr. Min. i. 300.

Para o Sul até o cabo Comori
Ja chamado Cori, que Taprobana

Camões, v. 107.

Here Camões identifies the ancient Kōpu or Kōlis with Comorin. These are in Ptolemy distinct, and his Kory appears to be the point of the Island of Rāmeśvaram from which the passage to Ceylon was shortest. This, as Kōlis, appears in various forms in other geographers as the extreme seaward point of India, and in the geographical poem of Dionysius it is described as towering to a stupendous height above the waves. Mela regards Colis as the

* There is here a doubtful reading. The next paragraph shows that the word should be κομαρι. [We should also read for βριάριον, φρούριον, a watch-post, citadel.]

turning point of the Indian coast, and even in Ptolemy's Tables his Kōry is further south than Komarū, and is the point of departure from which he discusses distances to the further East (see Ptolemy, Bk. I. capp. 13, 14; also see Bishop Caldwell's Comp. Grammar, Introd., p. 103). It is thus intelligible how comparative geographers of the 16th century identified Kōry with C. Comorin.

In 1864 the late venerated Bishop Cotton visited C. Comorin in company with two of his clergy (both now missionary bishops). He said that having bathed at Hardwār, one of the most northerly of Hindu sacred places, he should like to bathe at this, the most southerly. Each of the chaplains took one of the bishop's hands as they entered the surf, which was heavy; so heavy that his right-hand aid was torn from him, and had not the other been able to hold fast, Bishop Cotton could hardly have escaped.*

This probably is derived from D'Herbelot, and involves a confusion often made between Comorin and Comar—the land of aloes-wood.

COMOTAY, COMATY, n.p. This name appears prominently in some of the old maps of Bengal, e.g. that embraced in the Magni Mogolis Imperium of Blaeu's great Atlas (1645-50). It represents Kāmata, a State, and Kāmatapur, a city, of which most extensive remains exist in the territory of Koch Bihār in Eastern Bengal (see COOCH BEHAR). These are described by Dr. Francis Buchanan, in the book published by Montgomery Martin under the name of Eastern India (vol. iii. 426 seqq.). The city stood on the west bank of the River Darlā, which formed the defence on the east side, about 5 miles in extent. The whole circumference of the enclosure is estimated by Buchanan at 19 miles, the remainder being formed by a rampart which was (c. 1809) “in general about 130 feet in width at the base, and from 20 to 30 feet in perpendicular height.”

COMPETITION-WALLAH, s. A hybrid of English and Hindustani, applied in modern Anglo-Indian colloquial to members of the Civil Service who have entered it by the competitive system first introduced in 1856. The phrase was probably the invention of one of the older or Haileybury members of the same service. These latter, whose nominations were due to interest, and who were bound together by the intimacies and esprit de corps of a common college, looked with some disfavour upon the children of Innovation. The name was readily taken up in India, but its familiarity in England is probably due in great part to the “Letters of a Competition-wala,” written by one who had no real claim to the title, Sir G. O. Trevelyan, who was later on member for Hawick Burghs, Chief Secretary for Ireland, and author of the excellent Life of his uncle, Lord Macaulay.

The second portion of the word, wālā, is properly a Hindi adjectival affix, corresponding in a general way to the Latin -arius. Its usual employment as affix to a substantive makes it frequently denote “agent, doer, keeper, man, inhabitant, master, lord, possessor, owner,” as Shakespear vainly tries to define it, and as in Anglo-Indian usage is popularly assumed to be its meaning. But this kind of denotation is incidental; there is no real limitation to such meaning. This is demonstrable from such phrases as Kābul-wālā ghōṛā, ‘the Kabulian horse,’ and from the common form of village nomenclature in the Panjāb, e.g. Mīr-Khān-wālā, Ganda-Singh-wālā, and so forth, implying the village established by Mīr-Khān or Ganda-Singh. In the three immediately following quotations, the second and third exhibit a strictly idiomatic use of wālā, the first an incorrect English use of it.

Though a very learned shastree, he affects to be quite an Englishman, walks fast, talks fast, interrupts and contradicts, and calls the Peshwa and his ministers ‘old fools’ and . . . ‘dam rascals.’ He mixes English words with everything he says, and will say of some one (Holkar for instance): Bhot trickswalla tha, laiken barra akulkund, Kukhye tha, (‘He was very tricky, but very sagacious; he was cock-eyed’).”—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 276.

1853.—“‘No, I’m a Suffolk-wallah.’”—Oakfield, i. 66.

1864.—“The stories against the Competition-wallahs, which are told and fondly believed by the Haileybury men, are all founded more or less on the want of savoir faire. A collection of these stories would be a curious proof of the credulity of the human mind on a question of class against class.”—Trevelyan, p. 9.

1867.—“From a deficiency of civil servants . . . it became necessary to seek reinforcements, not alone from Haileybury, . . . but from new recruiting fields whence volunteers might be obtained . . . under the pressure of necessity, such an exceptional measure was sanctioned by Parliament. Mr. Elliot, having been nominated as a candidate by Campbell Marjoribanks, was the first of the since celebrated list of the Competition-wallahs.”—Biog. Notice prefixed to vol. i. of Dowson’s Ed. of Elliot’s Historians of India, p. xxviii.

The exceptional arrangement alluded to in the preceding quotation was authorised by 7 Geo. IV. cap. 56. But it did not involve competition; it only authorised a system by which writerships could be given to young men who had not been at Haileybury College, on their passing certain test examinations, and they were ranked according to their merit in passing such examinations, but below the writers who had left Haileybury at the preceding half-yearly examination. The first examination under this system was held 29th March, 1827, and Sir H. M. Elliot headed the list. The system continued in force for five years, the last examination being held in April, 1832. In all 83 civilians were nominated in this way, and, among other well-known names, the list included H. Torrens, Sir H. B. Harington, Sir R. Montgomery, Sir J. Cracroft Wilson, Sir T. Pycroft, W. Tayler, the Hon. E. Drummond.

1878 —“The Competition-Wallah, at home on leave or retirement, dins perpetually into our ears the greatness of India. . . . We are asked to feel awestruck and humbled at the fact that Bengal alone has 66 millions of inhabitants. We are invited to experience an awful thrill of sublimity when we learn that the area of Madras far exceeds that of the United Kingdom.”—Sat. Rev., June 15, p. 750.

COMPOUND, s. The enclosed ground, whether garden or waste, which surrounds an Anglo-Indian house. Various derivations have been suggested for this word, but its history is very obscure. The following are the principal suggestions that have been made :—*

- (a.) That it is a corruption of some supposed Portuguese word.
- (b.) That it is a corruption of the French campagne.
- (c.) That it is a corruption of the Malay word kampung, as first (we believe) indicated by Mr. John Crawfurd.

(a.) The Portuguese origin is assumed by Bishop Heber in passages quoted below. In one he derives it from campanha (for which, in modern Portuguese at least, we should read campanha); but campanha is not used in such a sense. It seems to be used only for ‘a campaign,’ or for the Roman Campagna. In the other passage he derives it from campao (sic), but there is no such word.

It is also alleged by Sir Emerson Tennent (infra), who suggests campinho; but this, meaning ‘a small plain,’ is not used for compound. Neither is the latter word, nor any word suggestive of it, used among the Indo-Portuguese.

In the early Portuguese histories of India (e.g. Castanheda, iii. 436, 442; vi. 3) the words used for what we term compound, are jardim, patio, horta. An examination of all the passages of the Indo-Portuguese Bible,

* On the origin of this word for a long time different opinions were held by my lamented friend Burnell and by me. And when we printed a few specimens in the Indian Antiquary, our different arguments were given in brief (see I. A., July 1879, pp. 202, 203). But at a later date he was much disposed to come round to the other view, insomuch that in a letter of Sept. 21, 1881, he says: “Compound can, I think, after all, be Malay Kampung; take these lines from a Malay poem”—then giving the lines which I have transcribed on the following page. I have therefore had no scruple in giving the same unity to this article that had been unbroken in almost all other cases.—H. Y.

COMPRADORE, COMPODORE,

from comprar, ‘to purchase.’ This word was formerly in use in Bengal, where it is now quite obsolete; but it is perhaps still remembered in Madras, and it is common in China.
In Madras the compradore is (or was) a kind of house-steward, who keeps the household accounts, and purchases necessaries. In China he is much the same as a Butler (q.v.). A new building was to be erected on the Bund at

Sat. II. iii. 147 seq.

c. A.D. 70.—(Indi) “maxime quidem oryza gaudent, ex qua tisanam conficiunt quam reliqui mortales ex hordoon.”—Pliny, xviii. § 13.

1563.—“They give him to drink the water squeezed out of rice with pepper and cum-min (which they call canje).”—Garcia, f. 70b.

1578.—“... Canju, which is the water from the boiling of rice, keeping it first for some hours till it becomes acid. . . .”—Acosta, Tractado, 56.

1681.—“Potus quotidianus itaque sit decoctum oryzae quod Candgie Indi vocant.”—Jac. Bontii, Lib. II. cap. iii.

1672.—“... la cangia, ordinaria colatione degl' Indiani . . . quale colano del riso mal cotto.”—P. Vinc. Maria, 3rd ed., 379.

1678.—“They have . . . a great smooth Stone on which they beat their Cloaths till clean; and if for Family use, starch them with Congee.”—Fryer, 200.

1680.—“Le dejeuner des noirs est ordinairement du Cangé, qui est une eau de ris epaisse.”—Dellon, Inquisition at Goa, 186.

1796.—“Cagni, [boiled rice water, which the Europeans call Cangé, is given free of all expenses, in order that the traveller may quench his thirst with a cooling and wholesome beverage.”—P. Paulinus, Voyage, p. 70.

“Can't drink as it is hot, and can't throw away as it is Kanji.”—Crylon Proverb, Ind. Ant. i. 59.

CONGEE-HOUSE, CONJEE-HOUSE, s. The ‘cells’ (or temporary lock-up) of a regiment in India; so called from the traditional regimen of the inmates; [in N. India commonly applied to a cattle-pound].

1835.—“All men confined for drunkenness should, if possible, be confined by themselves in the Congee-House, till sober.”—G. O., quoted in Mason's Records of the Indian Command of Sir C. Napier, 101 note.

CONGEVERAM, n.p. An ancient and holy city of S. India, 46 m. S.W. of Madras. It is called Kachchi in Tamil literature, and Kachchipuram is probably represented by the modern name. [The Madras Gloss. gives the indigenous name as Cutchy (Kachchi), meaning ‘the heart-leaved moon-seed plant,’ tinospira cordifolia, from which the Skt. name Kanchipuram, ‘shining city,’ is corrupted.]

c. 1030.—See Kanchi in Al-Biruni, under MALABAR.

1531.—“Some of them said that the whole history of the Holy House (of St. Thomas) was written in the house of the Pagoda which is called Camjeverlo, twenty leagues distant from the Holy House, of which I will tell you hereafter. . . .”—Corra, iii. 424.

1680.—“Upon a report that Podela Lingapa had put a stop to all the Dutch business of Policat under his government, the agent sent Briminy spys to Conjee Voram and to Policat."—Ft. St. Geo. Cons. Aug. 30. In Notes and Exts. No. iii. 32.

CONGO-BUNDER, CONG, n.p. Kung bandar; a port formerly of some consequence and trade, on the north shore of the Persian Gulf, about 100 m. west of Gombroon. The Portuguese had a factory here for a good many years after their expulsion from Ormus, and under treaty with Persia, made in 1625, had a right of pearl-fishing at Bahrein and a claim to half of the customs of Cong. These claims seem to have been gradually disregarded, and to have had no effect after about 1670, though the Portuguese would appear to have still kept up some pretext of monopoly of rights there in 1677 (see Chardin, ed. 1735, i. 348, and Bruce's Annals of the E.I.C., iii. 393). Some confusion is created by the circumstance that there is another place on the same coast, called Kongun, which possessed a good many vessels up to 1859, when it was destroyed by a neighbouring chief (see Stiffe's P. Gulf Pilot, 128). And this place is indicated by A. Hamilton (below) as the great mart for Bahrein pearls, which Fryer and others assign to what is evidently Cong.

1652.—"Near to the place where the Euphrates falls from Balsara [see BALSORA] into the Sea, there is a little Island, where the Barques generally come to an Anchor. . . . There we stay'd four days, whence to Bandar-Congo it is 14 days Sail. . . . This place would be a far better habitation for the Merchants than Ormus, where it is very unwholsom and dangerous to live. But that which hinders the Trade from Bandar-Congo is, because the Road to Lar is so bad. . . . The 30th, we hir'd a Vessel for Bander-Abassi, and after 3 or 4 hours Sailing we put into a Village . . . in the Island of Keckmishe" (see KISHM).—Tavernier, E.T. i. 94.

1677.—"A Voyage to Congo for Pearl.—Two days after our Arrival at Gombroon, I went to Congo. . . . At noon we came to Bassatu (see BASSADORE), an old ruined Town of the Portugals, fronting Congo . . . Congo is something better built than Gombroon, and has some small Advantage of the Air" (Then goes off about pearls).—Fryer, 320.

1683.—"One Haggerston taken by ye said President into his Service, was run away with a considerable quantity of Gold and Pearle, to ye amount of 30,000 Rupees, intrusted to him at Bussera (see BALSORA) and Cong, to bring to Surrat, to save Freight and Custom."—Hedges, Diary, i. 96 seq.

1685. — "May 27. — This afternoon it pleased God to bring us in safety to Cong Road. I went ashore immediately to Mr. Brough's house (Supra Cargo of ye Siam Merchant), and lay there all night."—Ibid. i. 202.

1727.—"Congoun stands on the South side of a large River, and makes a pretty good figure in Trade; for most of the Pearl that are caught at Bareen, on the Arabian Side, are brought hither for a Market, and many fine Horses are sent thence to India, where they generally sell well. . . . The next maritim town, down the Gulf, is Cong, where the Portuguese lately had a Factory, but of no great Figure in Trade, tho' that Town has a small Trade with Banyans and Moors from India." (Here the first place is Kongun, the second one Kung).—A. Hamilton, i. 92 seq.; [ed. 1744].

CONICOPOLY, s. Literally 'Account-Man,' from Tam. kanakka, 'account' or 'writing,' and pillai, 'child' or 'person.' ["The Kanakar are usually addressed as 'Pillay,' a title of respect common to them and the agricultural and shepherd castes" (Madras Man. ii. 229).] In Madras, a native clerk or writer, [in particular a shipping clerk. The corresponding Tel. term is Curnum].

1544.—"Duc eò tecum . . . domesticos tuos; pueros et aliquem Conacapulam qui norit scribere, cujus manu exaratas relinquere posses in quovis loco precationes a Pueris et aliis Catechumenis ediscendas."—Scti. Franc. Xavier, Epist., pp. 160 seq.

1584.—"So you must appoint in each village or station fitting teachers and Canacopoly, as we have already arranged, and these must assemble the children every day at a certain time and place, and teach and drive into them the elements of reading and religion."—Ditto, in Coleridge's L. of him, ii. 24.

1578.—"At Tanor in Malabar I was acquainted with a Nayre Canacopola, a writer in the Camara del Rey at Tanor . . . who every day used to eat to the weight of 5 drachms (of opium), which he would take in my presence."—Acosta, Tractado, 415.

c. 1680.—"One came who worked as a clerk, and said he was a poor canacappelle, who had nothing to give."—Primer & Hours, &c., i. 94.

1672.—"Xaverius set everywhere teachers called Canacappella."—Baldanza, Ceylon, 377.

1680.—"The Governour, accompanied with the Councill and severall Persons of the factory, attended by six files of Soldyern, the Company's Poons, 300 of the Washers, the Pedda Naigue, the Canocopy of the Towne and of the grounds, went the circuit of Madras ground, which was described by the Canocopy of the grounds, and lyen so intermixed with others (as is customary in these Countrys) that 'tis impossible to be knowne to any others, therefore every Village has a Canocopy and a Parryar, who are employed in this office, which goes from Father to Son for ever."—Pt. St. Geo. Comm. Sept. 21. In Notes and Ktis, No. iii, 34.

1718.—"Besides this we maintain seven Kanakappell, or Malabarick writers."—Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Pt. ii. 55.

1726.—"The Conakapules (commonly called Kanakappells) are writers."—Valentijn, Choru, 88.

[1749.—"Canacappula," in Logun, Malabar, iii. 52.

[1750.—"Conicoplas," ibid. iii. 150.

[1773.—"Conucopola. He keeps your accounts, pays the rest of the servants their wages, and assists the Dubash in buying and selling. At Bengal he is called secretary. . . ."—Ives, 49.]

CONSOO-HOUSE, n.p. At Canton this was a range of buildings adjoining the foreign Factories, called also the 'Council Hall' of the foreign Factories. It was the property of the body of Hong merchants, and was the place of meeting of these merchants among themselves, or with the chiefs of the Foreign houses, when there was need for such conference (see Funkhoar, p. 23). The name is probably a corruption of 'Council.' Bp. Moule, however, says: "The name is likely to have come from kung-su, the public hall, where a kung-su, a 'public company,' or guild, meets."

CONSUMAH, KHANSAMA, s. P. Khansāmdn; 'a house-steward.' In Anglo-Indian households in the Bengal Presidency, this is the title of the chief table servant and provider, now always a Mahomedan. [See BUTLER.] The literal meaning of the word is 'Master of the household gear'; it is not connected with khādn, 'a tray,' as Wilson suggests. The analogous word Mir-sāmdn occurs in Eliot, vii. 163. The Anglo-Indian form Consumer seems to have been not uncommon in the 18th century, probably with a spice of intention. From tables quoted in Long, 182, and in Saton-Karr, i. 95, 107, we see that the wages of a "Consumah, Christian, Moor, or Gentoo," were at Calcutta, in 1759, 5 rupees a month, and in 1785, 8 to 10 rupees.

[1609.—"Emeree Nooherdees being called by the Canocamma."—Danvers, Letters, i. 24.]

c. 1664.—"Some time after . . . she chose for her Kans-saman, that is, her Steward, a certain Permia called Naschika, who was a young Omrah, the handsomest and most accomplished of the whole Court."—Bernier, E.T., p. 4; [ed. Constantin, p. 13].

1712.—"They were brought by a great circuit on the River to the Chansamma or Steward (Dispenser) of the storeroom Mahal."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte) 268.

1759.—"DUSTUCK or ORDER, under the Chan Samana, or Steward's Seal, for the Honourable Company's holding the King's [i.e. the Great Mogul's] fleet."

"At the back of this is the seal of Zecah al Doulat Tidaudin Cann Bahadour, who is Cann Samann, or Steward to his Majesty, whose prerogative it is to grant this Order."—R. Owen Cambridge, pp. 231 sq.

1788.—"After some deliberation I asked the Khansaman, what quantity was remaining of the clothes that had been brought from Iran to camp for sale, who answered that there were 15,000 jackets, and 12,000 pairs of long drawers."—Mém. of Khayr Abdulkurroon, tr. by Gladwin, 55.

1810.—"The Kansamah may be classed with the house-steward, and butler; both of which offices appear to unite in this servant."—Williamson, V. M., i. 199.

1831.—"I have taught my khansama to make very light iced punch."—Jacquemont, Letters, E.T., ii. 104.

COOCH AZO, or AZO simply, n.p. Koch Hajo, a Hindu kingdom on the banks of the Brahmaputra R., to the E. of Koch Bihâr, annexed by Jahāngir's troops in 1637. See Blochmann in J.A.S.B. xli. pt. i. 53, and xlii. pt. i. 235. In Valentijn's map of Bengal (made c. 1660) we have Cos Assam with Azo as capital, and T'Eng van Azo, a good way south and east of Silhet.

1753.—"Ceste rivière (Brahmaputra), en remontant, conduit à Rangamati et à Asoo, qui font la frontière de l'état du Mogol. Asoo est une forteresse que l'Emir Jemia, sous le règne d'Aurengzebe, occupa sur le roi d'Asham, comme une dependance de Bengale."—D'Anville, p. 62.

COOCH BEHAR, n.p. Koch Bihār, a native tributary State on the N.E. of Bengal, adjoining Bhotan and the Province of Assam. The first part of the name is taken from that of a tribe, the Koch, apparently a forest race who founded this State about the 16th century, and in the following century obtained dominion of considerable extent. They still form the majority of the population, but, as usual in such circumstances, give themselves a Hindu pedigree, under the name of Rajbansi. [See Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. 491 seq.] The site of the ancient monarchy of Kāmrūp is believed to have been in Koch Bihār, within the limits of which there are the remains of more than one ancient city. The second part of the name is no doubt due to the memory of some important Vihāra, or Buddhist Monastery, but we have not found information on the subject. [Possibly the ruins at Kanatapur, for which see Buchanan Hamilton, Eastern India, iii. 426 seq.]

1585.—"I went from Bengala into the country of Coocha, which hath 25 dayes journey Northwards from Tanda."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 397.

c. 1596.—"To the north of Bengal is the province of Coach, the Chief of which commands 1,000 horse, and 100,000 foot. Kamroop, which is also called Kamroo and Kantah (see COCHOTAY) makes a part of his dominions."—Ayren (by Gladwin), ed. 1800, ii. 3; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 117].

1726.—"Coo Bhaar is a Kingdom of itself, the King of which is sometimes subject to the Great Mogol, and sometimes throws his yoke off."—Valentijn, v. 159.

1774.—"The country about Bahar is low. Two kos beyond Bahar we entered a thicket . . . frogs, watery insects and dank air . . . 2 miles farther on we crossed the river which separates the Kuch Bahar country from that of the Deb Rajah, in sail canoes. . . ."—Bogle, in Marikam's Tibet, &c., 14 seq.

(But Mr. Markham spoils all the original spelling. We may be sure Bogle did not write kos, nor "Kuch Bahar," as Mr. M. makes him do.)

1791.—"The late Mr. George Bogle . . . travelled by way of Coo-Beyhar, Tamsudon, and Paridrong, to Chanmanning the then residence of the Lama."—Rennell (3rd ed.), 301.

COOJA, a. P. kāsa; an earthenware water-vessel (not long-necked, like the surdāi—see SERAI). It is a word used at Bombay chiefly, [but is not uncommon among Mahomedans in N. India].

[1611.—"One sack of coaher to make coho."—Danvers, Letters, i. 128.

[1871.—"Many parts of India are celebrated for their coojahs or guglets, but the finest are brought from Bussorah, being light, thin, and porous, made from a whitish clay."—Riddell, Indian Domestic Economy, 7th ed., p. 362.]

1883.—"They (tree-frogs) would perch pleasantly on the edge of the water cooja, or on the rim of a tumbler."—Tribes on my Frontier, 118.

COOK-ROOM, a. Kitchen; in Anglo-Indian establishments always detached from the house.

1758.—"We will not in future admit of any expenses being defrayed by the Company either under the head of cook-rooms, gardens, or other expenses whatever."—The Court's Letter, March 3, in Long, 130.

1878.—"I was one day watching an old female monkey who had a young one by her side to whom she was giving small bits of a piece of bread which she had evidently just received from my cook-room."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 44.

COOLJOURNER, a. This is the title of the village accountant and writer in some of the central and western parts of India. Mahr. kulkar-ari, apparently from kula, 'tribe' and karana, writer, &c., the patwari of N. India (see under GRANNY, CURNUM). [Kula "in the revenue language of the S. appears to be applied especially to families, or individual heads of families, paying revenue" (Wilson).]

c. 1590.—" . . . in this Soobah (Berar) . . . a chowdry they call Deymuck, a Chanoogou with them is Drypandeh; a Mokuddem . . . they style Putiel; and a Puivare they name Kulkarnae."—Gladwin's Ayren Akbery, ii. 57; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 228].

[1826.—"You potails, coolcunnies, &c., will no doubt . . . contrive to reap tolerable harvests."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 47.]

COOLICOY, a. A Malay term, properly kulit-kayu, 'skin-wood,' explained in the quotation:

1784.—"The coolitoayo or coolicoy. . . . This is a bark procured from some particular trees. (It is used for matting the sides of houses, and by Europeans as dunnage in pepper cargoes.)"—Marsden's H of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 51.

COOLIN, adj. A class of Brāhmans of Bengal Proper, who make extraordinary claims to purity of caste and exclusiveness. Beng. kullinas, from Skt. kula, 'a caste or family,' kulina, 'belonging to a noble family.' They are much sought in marriage for the daughters of Brāhmans of less exalted pretensions, and often take many brides for the sake of the presents they receive. The system is one of the greatest abuses in Bengali Hinduism. [Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. 146 seqq.]

1820.—"Some inferior Koolēntās marry many wives; I have heard of persons having 120; many have 15 or 20, and others 40 and 50 each. Numbers procure a subsistence by this excessive polygamy. . . ."—Ward, i. 81.

COOLUNG, COOLEN, and in W. India CULLUM, s. Properly the great grey crane (Grus cinerea), H. kulang (said by the dictionaries to be Persian, but Jerdon gives Mahr. kallam, and Tel. kulangi, kolangi, which seem against the Persian origin), [and Platts seems to connect it with Skt. kurankara, the Indian crane, Ardea Sibirica (Williams)]. Great companies of these are common in many parts of India, especially on the sands of the less frequented rivers; and their clanging, trumpet-like call is often heard as they pass high overhead at night.

"Ille gruum . . .
Clamor in aetheriis dispersus nubibus austri." (Lucr. iv. 182 seq.).

The name, in the form Coolen, is often misapplied to the Demoiselle Crane (Anthropoides virgo, L.), which is one of the best of Indian birds for the table (see Jerdon, ed. 1877, ii. 667, and last quotation below). The true Coolung, though inferior, is tolerably good eating. This bird, which is now quite unknown in Scotland, was in the 15th century not uncommon there, and was a favourite dish at great entertainments (see Accts. of L. H. Treasurer of Scotland, i. ccv.).

1698.—"Peculiarly Brand-geese, Colum, and Serass, a species of the former."—Fryer, 117.

c. 1809.—"Large flocks of a crane called Kolong, and of another called Saros (Ardea Antigone—see CYRUS), frequent this district in winter. . . . They come from the north in the beginning of the cold season, and retire when the heats commence."—Buchanan's Rungpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 579.

1813.—"Peacocks, partridges, quails, doves, and green-pigeons supplied our table, and with the addition of two stately birds, called the Sakras and cullum, added much to the animated beauty of the country."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 29; [2nd ed. i. 331].

1883.—"Not being so green as I was, I let the tempting herd of antelopes pass, but the kullum I cannot resist. They are feeding in thousands at the other end of a large field, and to reach them it will only be necessary to crawl round behind the hedge for a quarter of a mile or so. But what will one not do with roast kullum looming in the vista of the future?"—Tribes on my Frontier, p. 162.

" N.B.—I have applied the word kullum, as everybody does, to the demoiselle crane, which, however, is not properly the kullum but the Koonja."—Ibid. p. 171.

COOLY, s. A hired labourer, or burden-carrier; and, in modern days especially, a labourer induced to emigrate from India, or from China, to labour in the plantations of Mauritius, Réunion, or the West Indies, sometimes under circumstances, especially in French colonies, which have brought the cooly's condition very near to slavery. In Upper India the term has frequently a specific application to the lower class of labourer who carries earth, bricks, &c., as distinguished from the skilled workman, and even from the digger.

The original of the word appears to have been a nomen gentile, the name (Koli) of a race or caste in Western India, who have long performed such offices as have been mentioned, and whose savagery, filth, and general degradation attracted much attention in former times, [see Hamilton, Descr. of Hindostan (1820), i. 609]. The application of the word would thus be analogous to that which has rendered the name of a Slav, captured and made a bondservant, the word for such a bondservant in many European tongues. According to Dr. H. V. Carter the Kolis proper are a true hill-people, whose especial locality lies in the Western Ghāts, and in the northern extension of that range, between 18° and 24° N. lat. They exist in large numbers in Guzerat, and in the Konkan, and in the adjoining districts of the Deccan, but not beyond these limits (see Ind. Antiquary, ii. 154). [But they are possibly kinsfolk of the Kols, an important Dravidian race in Bengal —] —

N.W.P. (see Risley, T. and C. of Bengal, ii. 101; Crooke, T. C. of N.W.P. iii. 294.) In the Rās Mālā [ed. 1878, p. 78 seqq.] the Koolies are spoken of as a tribe who lived long near the Indus, but who were removed to the country of the Null (the Nāl, a brackish lake some 40 m. S.W. of Ahmedabad) by the goddess Hinglāj.

Though this explanation of the general use of the term Cooly is the most probable, the matter is perplexed by other facts which it is difficult to trace to the same origin. Thus in S. India there is a Tamil and Can. word kūli in common use, signifying 'hire' or 'wages,' which Wilson indeed regards as the true origin of Cooly. [Oppert (Orig. Inhab. of Bharatavarsa, p. 131) adopts the same view, and disputing the connection of Cooly with Koli or Kol, regards the word as equivalent to 'hired servant' and originating in the English Factories on the E. coast.] Also in both Oriental and Osmanli Turkish kol is a word for a slave, whilst in the latter also kūleh means 'a male slave, a bondsman' (Redhouse). Khol is in Tibetan also a word for a servant or slave (Note from A. Schiefner; see also Jäschke's Tibetan Dict., 1881, p. 59). But with this the Indian term seems to have no connection. The familiar use of Cooly has extended to the Straits Settlements, Java, and China, as well as to all tropical and sub-tropical colonies, whether English or foreign.

In the quotations following, those in which the race is distinctly intended are marked with an *.

*1548.—"And for the duty from the Colés who fish at the sea-stakes and on the river of Bacaim. . . ."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 155.

*1553.—"Soltan Badur . . . ordered those pagans to be seized, and if they would not become Moors, to be flayed alive, saying that was all the black-mail the Collijs should get from Champanel."—Barros, Dec. IV. liv. v. cap. 7.

*1563.—"These Colles . . . live by robbing and thieving at this day."—Garcia, f. 34.

*1584.—"I attacked and laid waste nearly fifty villages of the Kolis and Grassias, and I built forts in seven different places to keep these people in check."—Tabakat-i-Akbari, in Elliot, v. 447.

*1598.—"Others that yet dwell within the countrie called Colles: which Colles . . . doe yet live by robbing and stealing. . . ."—Linschoten, ch. xxvii.; [Hak. Soc. i. 166].

*1616.—"Those who inhabit the country villages are called Coolies; these till the ground and breed up cattle."—Terry, in Purchas; [ed. 1777, p. 180].

* "The people called Colles or Quillees."—In Purchas, i. 436.

1630.—"The husbandmen or inferior sort of people called the Coullies."—Lord's Display, &c., ch. xiii.

1638.—"He lent us horses to ride on, and Cowlers (which are Porters) to carry our goods."—W. Bruton, in Hakl. v. 49.

In this form there was perhaps an indefinite suggestion of the cowl-staff used in carrying heavy loads.

1644.—"In these lands of Damam the people who dwell there as His Majesty's Vassals are heathen, whom they call Collis, and all the Padres make great complaints that the owners of the aldeas do not look with favour on the conversion of these heathen Collis, nor do they consent to their being made Christians, lest there thus may be hindrance to the greater service which is rendered by them when they remain heathen."—Bocarro (Port. MS.).

*1659.—"To relate how I got away from those Robbers, the Koullis . . . how we became good Friends by the means of my Profession of Physick . . . I must not insist upon to describe."—Bernier, E.T., p. 30; [ed. Constable, 91].

*c. 1666.—"Nous rencontrâmes quantité de Colys, qui sont gens d'une Caste ou tribut des Gentils, qui n'ont point d'habitation arrêtée, mais qui vont de village en village et portent avec eux tout leur ménage."—Thevenot, v. 21.

*1673.—"The Inhabitants of Ramnagur are the Salvages called Coolies. . . ."—Fryer, 161.

"Coolies, Frasses, and Holencores, are the Dregs of the People."—Ibid. 194.

1680.—". . . It is therefore ordered forthwith that the drum be beat to call all coolies, carpenters. . . ."—Official Memo. in Wheeler, i. 129.

*c. 1703.—"The Imperial officers . . . sent . . . ten or twelve ardars, with 13,000 or 14,000 horse, and 7,000 or 8,000 trained Kolis of that country."—Khāfi Khān, in Elliot, vii. 375.

1711.—"The better sort of people travel in Palankeens, carry'd by six or eight Cooleys, whose Hire, if they go not far from Town, is threepence a Day each."—Lockyer, 26.

1726.—"Coeli's. Bearers of all sorts of Burdens, goods, Andols (see ANDOR) and Palankins. . . ."—Valentijn, vol. v., Names, &c., 2.

*1727.—"Goga . . . has had some Mud Wall Fortifications, which still defend them from the Insults of their Neighbours the Coullies."—A. Hamilton, i: 141; [ed. 1744, i. 142].

1755.—"The Families of the Coolies sent to the Negrais complain that Mr. Brook has paid to the Head Cooley what money those who died there left behind them."—In Long, 54.

1785.—". . . the officers were obliged to have their baggage transported upon men's heads over an extent of upwards of 800 miles, at the rate of 5*l.* per month for every cooley or porter employed."—Curraccioli's L. of Clive, i. 248 seq.

1789.—"If you should ask a common cooly or porter, what cast he is of, he will answer, the same as Master, pariar-cast."—Munro's Narrative, 29.

1791.—". . . deux relais de vigoureux coulis, ou porteurs, de quatre hommes chacun. . . ."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chaumière Indienne, 15.

[1798.—"The Resident hopes all distinctions between the Cooley and Portuguese inhabitants will be laid aside."—Procl. in Logan, Malabar, iii. 302.]

*1813.—"Gudgerah, a large populous town surrounded by a wall, to protect it from the depredations of the Coolees, who are a very insolent set among the numerous and probably indigenous tribes of freebooters, and robbers in this part of India."—Forbes, Orient. Mem. iii. 63; [2nd ed. ii. 160; also see i. 146].

1817.—"These (Chinese) emigrants are usually employed as coolees or labourers on their first arrival (in Java)."—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 205.

*1820.—"In the profession of thieving the Koolees may be said to act con amore. A Koolee of this order, meeting a defenceless person in a lane about dusk, would no more think of allowing him to pass unplundered than a Frenchman would a woman without bowing to her; it may be considered a point of honour of the caste."—Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. iii. 335.

*1825.—"The head man of the village said he was a Kholee, the name of a degenerate race of Rajpoots in Guzerat, who from the low occupations in which they are generally employed have (under the corrupt name of Coolie) given a name, probably through the medium of the Portuguese, to bearers of burdens all over India."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 92.

1867.—"Bien que de race différente les Coolies et les Chinois sont comportés à peu-près de même."—Quatrefages, Rapport sur le Progrès de l'Anthropologie, 219.

1871.—"I have hopes for the Coolies in British Guiana, but it will be more sure and certain when the immigration system is based on better laws."—Jenkins, The Coolie.

1873.—"The appellant, the Hon. Julian Pauncefoot, is the Attorney-General for the Colony (Hong Kong) and the respondent Hwoka-Sing is a Coolie or labourer, and a native of China."—Report of Case before Jud. Com. of Privy Council.

"A man (Col. Gordon) who had wrought such wonders with means so modest as a levy of Coolies . . . needed, we may be sure, only to be put to the highest test to show how just those were who had marked him out in his Crimean days as a youth whose extraordinary genius for war could not be surpassed in the army that lay before Sebastopol."—Sat. Review, Aug. 16, 203.

1875.—"A long row of cottages, evidently pattern-built . . . announced the presence of Coolies, Indian or Chinese."—Palgrave, Dutch Guiana, ch. i.

The word Cooly has passed into English thieves' jargon in the sense of 'a soldier' (v. Slang Dict.)^o

COOMKEE, adj., used as sub. This is a derivative from P. kumak, 'aid,' and must have been widely diffused in India, for we find it specialised in different senses in the extreme West and East, besides having in both the general sense of 'auxiliary.'

[(a) In the Moghul army the term is used for auxiliary troops.

[c. 1590.—"Some troops are levied occasionally to strengthen the munsibs, and they are called Kummeke (or auxiliaries)."—Gladwin, Ayeen Akbery, ed. 1800, i. 188; in Blochmann, i. 232, Kumakis.

[1858.—"The great landholders despise them (the ordinary levies) but respect the Komukee corps. . . ."—Sleeman, Journey through Oudh, i. 30.]

(b) Kumaki, in N. and S. Canara, is applied to a defined portion of forest, from which the proprietor of the village or estate has the privilege of supplying himself with wood for house-building, &c. (except from the reserved kinds of wood), with leaves and twigs for manure, fodder, &c. (See COOMBY). [The system is described by Sturrock, Man. S. Canara, i. 16, 224 seqq.]

(c). Koomkee, in Bengal, is the technical name of the female elephant used as a decoy in capturing a male.

1807.—"When an elephant is in a proper state to be removed from the Keddah, he is conducted either by koomkies (i.e. decoy females) or by tame males."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, folio ed., p. 30.

[1873.—"It was an interesting sight to see the captive led in between two khoonkies or tame elephants."—Cooper, Mishmee Hills, 88.

[1882.—"Attached to each elephant hunting party there must be a number of tame elephants, or Koonkies, to deal with the wild elephants when captured."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 70.]

COOMRY, s. [Can. kumari, from Mahr. kumbari, 'a hill slope of poor soil.'] Kumari cultivation is the S. Indian (especially in Canara), [Sturrock, S. Canara Man. i. 17], appellation of that system pursued by hill-people in many parts of India and its frontiers, in which a certain tract of forest is cut down and burnt, and the ground planted with crops for one or two seasons, after which a new site is similarly treated. This system has many names in different regions; in the east of Bengal it is known as jhūm (see JHOOM); in Burma as tounggyan; [in parts of the N.W.P. dahya, Skt. daha, 'burning'; ponam in Malabar; ponacaud in Salem]. We find kumried as a quasi-English participle in a document quoted by the High Court, Bombay, in a judgment dated 27th January, 1879, p. 227.

1883.—“Kumaki (Coomkee) and Kumari privileges stand on a very different platform. The former are perfectly reasonable, and worthy of a civilised country. . . . As for Kumari privileges, they cannot be defended before the tribunal of reason as being really good for the country, but old custom is old custom, and often commands the respect of a wise government even when it is indefensible.”—Mr. Grant Duff's Reply to an Address at Mangalore, 15th October.

COONOOR, n.p. A hill-station in the Neilgherries. Kunnur, 'Hill-Town.' [The Madras Gloss. gives Can. Kunnūru, Skt. kunna, 'small,' Can. ūru, 'village.']

COORG, n.p. A small hill State on the west of the table-land of Mysore, in which lies the source of the Cauvery, and which was annexed to the British Government, in consequence of cruel misgovernment in 1834. The name is a corruption of Kōdagu, of which Gundert says: "perhaps from kodu, 'steep,' or Tamil kadaga, 'west.'" [For various other speculations on the derivation, see Oppert, Original Inhabit., 162 seqq. The Madras Gloss. seems to refer it to Skt. krodadeśa, 'hog-land,' from "the tradition that the inhabitants had nails on hands and feet like a boar."] Coorg is also used for a native of the country, in which case it stands for Kōdaga.

COORSY, s. H.—from Ar.—kursi [which is used for the stand on which the Koran is laid]. It is the word usually employed in Western India for 'a chair,' and is in the Bengal Presidency a more dignified term than chauki (see CHOKY). Kursi is the Arabic form, borrowed from the Aramaic, in which the emphatic state is kursēyd. But in Hebrew the word possesses a more original form with ss for rs (kisse, the usual word in the O. T. for 'a throne'). The original sense appears to be 'a covered seat.'

1781.—“It happened, at this time, that the Nawaub was seated on his koorsi, or chair, in a garden, beneath a banyan tree.”—Hist. of Hydur Naik, 452.

COOSUMBA, s. H. kusum, kusumbha, Safflower, q.v. But the name is applied in Rajputana and Guzerat to the tincture of opium, which is used freely by Rājputs and others in those territories; also (according to Shakespear) to an infusion of Bang (q.v.).

[1823.—“Several of the Rajpoot Princes West of the Chumbul seldom hold a Durbar without presenting a mixture of liquid opium, or, as it is termed, 'kusoombah,' to all present. The minister washes his hands in a vessel placed before the Rawul, after which some liquid opium is poured into the palm of his right hand. The first in rank who may be present then approaches and drinks the liquid.”—Malcolm, Mem. of Central India, 2d ed. ii. 146, note.]

COOTUB, THE, n.p. The Kutb Minār, near Delhi, one of the most remarkable of Indian architectural antiquities, is commonly so called by Europeans. It forms the minaret of the Great Mosque, now long in ruins, which Kutb-uddīn Ibak founded A.D. 1191, immediately after the capture of Delhi, and which was built out of the materials of numerous Hindu temples, as is still manifest. According to the elaborate investigation of Gen. A. Cunningham [Arch. Rep. i. 189 seqq.], the magnificent Minār was begun by Kutb-uddīn Ibak about 1200, and completed by his successor Shamsuddīn Iyaltimish about 1220. The tower has undergone, in its upper part, various restorations. The height as it now stands is 238 feet 1 inch. The traditional name of the tower no doubt had reference to the name of its founder, but also there may have been a reference to the contemporary Saint, Kutb-uddīn Ushī, whose tomb is close by; and perhaps also to the meaning of the name Kutb-uddīn, 'The Pole or

c. 1330.—“Attached to the mosque (of Delhi) is a tower for the call to prayer which has no equal in the whole world. It is built of red stone, with about 360 steps. It is not square, but has a great number of angles, is very massive at the base, and very lofty, equalling the Pharos of Alexandria.”—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 190.

c. 1340.—“In the northern court of the mosque stands the minaret (al-ma'ma'a), which is without a parallel in all the countries of Islām. . . . It is of surpassing height; the pinnacle is of milk-white marble, and the globes which decorate it are of pure gold. The aperture of the staircase is so wide that elephants can ascend, and a person on whom I could rely told me that when the minaret was a-building, he saw an elephant ascend to the very top with a load of stones.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 151.

The latter half of the last quotation is fiction.

1663.—“At two Leagues off the City on Agra's side, in a place by the Mahumetans called Koja Kotubeddine, there is a very ancient Edifice which hath been a Temple of Idols. . . .”—Bernier, E.T. 91.

It is evident from this that Bernier had not then visited the Kutb. [Constable in his tr. reads “Koja Kotubeddine,” by which he understands Koh-i-Kutab-uddin, the hill or eminence of the Saint, p. 283.]

1825.—“I will only observe that the Cuttab Minar . . . is really the finest tower I have ever seen, and must, when its spire was complete, have been still more beautiful.”—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 308.

COPECK, s. This is a Russian coin, $\frac{1}{100}$ of a ruble. The degeneration of coin denominations is often so great that we may suspect this name to preserve that of the dīnār Kopekī often mentioned in the histories of Timur and his family. Kopek is in Turki, ‘dog,’ and Charmoy explains the term as equivalent to Abū-kalb, ‘Father of a dog,’ formerly applied in Egypt to Dutch crowns (Löwen-thaler) bearing a lion. There could not be Dutch coins in Timur's time, but some other Frank coin bearing a lion may have been so called, probably Venetian. A Polish coin with a lion on it was called by a like name (see Macarius, quoted below, p. 169). Another etymology of kopek suggested (in Chaudoir, Aperçu des Monnaies Russes) is from Russ. kopie, kopyé, a pike, many old Russian coins representing the Prince on horseback with a spear. [This is accepted by the N.E.D.] Kopeks are mentioned in the reign of Vassili III., about the middle of the 15th century, but only because regularly established in the coinage c. 1536. [See TANGA.]

1390.—(Timour resolved) “to visit the venerated tomb of Sheikh Maslahat . . . and with that intent proceeded to Tāsh-kand . . . he there distributed as alms to worthy objects, 10,000 dīndrs kopaki. . . .”—Sharifuddin, in Extracts by M. Charmoy, Mem. Acad. St. P., vi. S., tome iii. p. 363, also note, p. 135.

1535.—“It was on this that the Grand Duchess Helena, mother of Ivan Vassilievitch, and regent in his minority, ordered, in 1535, that these new Dengui should be melted down and new ones struck, at the rate of 300 dengui, or 3 Roubles of Moscow à la grivenka, in Kopeks. . . . From that time accounts continued to be kept in Roubles, Kopeks, and Dengui.”—Chaudoir, Aperçu.

c. 1655.—“The pension in lieu of provisions was, for our Lord the Patriarch 25 copecks daily.”—Travels of the Patriarch Macarius, Or. Tr. Fund, i. 281.

1783.—“The Copeck of Russia, a copper coin, in name and apparently in value, is the same which was current in Tartary during the reign of Timur.”—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 332.

COPPERSMITH, s. Popular name both in H. (tumbayat) and English of the crimson-breasted barbet (Xantholaema indica, Latham). See the quotation from Jerdon.

1862.—“It has a remarkably loud note, which sounds like took-took-took, and this it generally utters when seated on the top of some tree, nodding its head at each call, first to one side and then to another. . . . This sound and the motion of its head, accompanying it, have given origin to the name of ‘Coppersmith.’ . . .”—Jerdon, ed. 1877, i. 316.

1879.—

“ . . . In the mango-sprays
The sun-birds flashed; alone at his green forge
Toiled the loud Coppersmith. . . .”

The Light of Asia, p. 20.

1883.—“For the same reason mynas seek the tope, and the ‘blue jay,’ so-called, and the little green coppersmith hooting ventriloquistically.”—Tribes on my Frontier, 154.

COPRAH, s. The dried kernel of the coco-nut, much used for the expression of its oil, and exported largely from the Malabar ports. The Portuguese probably took the word from the Malayāl. koppara, which is, however, apparently borrowed from the H. khoprā, of the same meaning. The fruit; there is an inferior plate in Debry, iv. No. xvi.).

1672.—"The plant Carapall is peculiar to Malabar. . . . The ripe fruit is used as ordinary food; the unripe is cut in pieces and dried in the sun, and is then used all the year round to mix in dishes, along with tamarind, having an excellent flavour, of a tempered acidity, and of a very agreeable and refreshing odour. The form is nearly round, of the size of an apple, divided into eight equal lobes of a yellow colour, fragrant and beautiful, and with another little fruitlet attached to the extremity, which is perfectly round," &c., &c.—P. Vincoso Marra, 356.

CORGE, COORGE, &c., a. A mercantile term for 'a score.' The word is in use among the trading Arabs and others, as well as in India. It is established in Portuguese use apparently, but the Portuguese word is almost certainly of Indian origin, and this is expressly asserted in some Portuguese Dictionaries (e.g. Lacerda's, Lisbon, 1871). Kori is used exactly in the same way by natives all over Upper India. Indeed, the vulgar there in numeration habitually say do kori, tin kori, for 40, 60, and so forth. The first of our quotations shows the word in a form very closely allied to this, and explaining the transition. Wilson gives Telugu korjam, "a bale or lot of 20 pieces, commonly called a corge." [The Madras Gloss. gives Can. korji, Tel. korjam, as meaning either a measure of capacity, about 44 maunds, or a Madras town cloth measure of 20 pieces.] But, unless a root can be traced, this may easily be a corruption of the trade-word. Littré explains corge or courge as "Paquet de toile de coton des Indes"; and Marcel Devic says: "C'est vraisemblablement l'Arabe khordj;" which means a saddlebag, a portmanteau. Both the definition and the etymology seem to miss the essential meaning of corye, which is that of a score, and not that of a packet or bundle, unless by accident.

1510.—"If they be stuffs, they deal by coria, and in like manner if they be jewels. By a coria is understood twenty."—Parthenius, 170.

1525.—"A corja dos quotonys grandes vale (260) tangas."—Lembrança, das Cousas da India, 48.

1554.—"The nut and mace when gathered were bartered by the natives for common kinds of cloth, and for each korja of these . . . they gave a bakar of mace . . . and seven bakars of the nut."—Cassaneda, vi. 8.

[1605-6.—"Note the cody or corge is a sundell or set number of 20 pieces."—Bird-road, First Letter Book, 80.]

1612.—"White calicoes from twentie to fortie Royale the Corge (a Corge being twentie pieces), a great quantitie."—Capt. Harris, in Purchas, i. 347.

1612-13. "They returning brought doun the Mustras of everie sort, and the prices demanded for them per Corge."—Houghton, in Purchas, i. 299.

1615.—
"6 pec. whit hufins of 16 and 17 Re....corg.
6 pec. blew byruses, of 15 Re.corg.
6 pec. red celas, of 13 Re.corg."
Cock's Diary, i. 75.

1622.—Adam Denton . . . admits that he made "90 corgs of Pintadoes" in their house at Patani, but not at their charge.—Nainsbury, iii. 42.

1644.—"To the Friars of St. Francis for their regular yearly allowance, a cow every week, 24 candies of wheat, 15 sacks of rice girisol, 2 sacks of sugar, half a candy of oro (qu. oro, 'tallow,' 'grease,'?) $\frac{1}{2}$ candy of coco-nut oil, 6 maunds of butter, 4 corgs of cotton stuffs, and 25,920 réu for dispensary medicines (mezinhos de boticao)."—Bocarro, MS. i. 217.

c. 1670.—"The Whites . . . which are made at Lahor . . . are sold by Corges, every Corge consisting of twenty pieces. . . ."—Tavernier, On the Commodities of the Romanes, of the Great Mogul, &c., E.T. p. 58; [ed. Bull, ii. 5].

1747.—"Another Sett of Madras Painters . . . being examined regarding what Goods were Remaining in their hands upon the Loss of Madras, they acknowledge to have had 15 Corge of Chints then under their Performance, and which they acquaint us is all safe . . . but as they have lost all their Wax and Colours, they request an Advance of 300 Pagodas for the Purchase of more. . . ."
Consens. Fort St. David, Aug. 13. MS. Records in India Office.

c. 1700.—"At Madras . . . 1 corge is 22 pieces."—Urme, i. 284.

"No washerman to demand for 1 corge of pieces more than 7 pan of cowries."—In Long, 239.

1784.—In a Calcutta Lottery-list of prizes we find "55 corge of Pearls."—In Nelson-Karr, i. 33.

[c. 1809.—"To one korj or 20 pieces of Tunzebs . . . 50 re."—Buchanan Hamilton, Eastern India, i. 398.]

1810.—"I recollect about 29 years back, when marching from Berhampore to Cawnpore with a detachment of European recruits, seeing several coorgs (of sheep) bought for their use, at 3 and $\frac{3}{4}$ rupees! at the latter rate 6 sheep were purchased for a rupee . . . five pence each."—Williamson, V. M. i. 298.

1813.—"Corge is 22 at Judda."—Milburn, i. 93.

CORINGA, n.p. Koringa; probably a corruption of Kalinga [see KLING]. [The Madras Gloss. gives the Tel. korangi, 'small cardamoms.' The name of a seaport in Godavari Dist. on the northern side of the Delta. ["The only place between Calcutt and Trincomalee where large vessels used to be docked."—Morris, Godaver Man., p. 40.]

CORLE, s. Singh. kōrales, a district

1726.—"A Coraal is an overseer of a Corle or District. . . ."—Valentijn, Name of Native Officers in the Villages of Ceylon, 1.

CORNAC, s. This word is used by French writers especially, as an Indian word, and as the equivalent of Mahout (q.v.), or driver of the elephant. Littré defines: "Nom qu'on donne dans les Indes au conducteur d'un éléphant," &c., &c., adding: "Etym. Sanskrit karnakin, éléphant." "Dans les Indes" is happily vague, and the etymology worthless. Bluteau gives Cornaca, but no etymology. In Singhalese Kārava = 'Elephant Stud.' (It is not in the Singhalese Dict., but it is in the official Glossary of Terms, &c.), and our friend Dr. Rost suggests Kārava-ndyaka, 'Chief of the Kārava' as a probable origin. This is confirmed by the form Cournaque in Valentijn, and by another title which he gives as used for the head of the Elephant Stable at Madura, viz. Gajinaike (Names, &c., p. 11), i.e. Gajin-ndyaka, from Gaja, 'an elephant.' [The N.E.D. remarks that some authorities give for the first part of the word Skt. kari, 'elephant.']

1672.—"There is a certain season of the year when the old elephant discharges an oil at the two sides of the head, and at that season they become like mad creatures, and often break the neck of their cornac or driver."—Baldassus, Germ. ed. 422. (See MUST.)

1685.—"O cornaca q̄ estava de baixo delle tinha hum laço que metia em hã das mãos ao bravo."—Ribeiro, f. 49b.

1712.—"The aforesaid author (P. Fr. Gaspar de S. Bernardino in his Itinerary), relates that in the said city (Goa), he saw three Elephants adorned with jewels, adorning the most Holy Sacrament at the St. Gate on the Octave of Easter, on which day in India they make the procession of Corpus Domini, because of the calm weather. I doubt not that the Cornacas of these animals had taught them to perform these acts of apparent adoration. But at the same time there appears to be Religion and Piety innate in the Elephant."—In Bluteau, s.v. Elephant.

1726.—"After that (at Mongeer) one goes over a great walled area, and again through a gate, which is adorned on either side with a great stone elephant with a Carnak on it."—Valentijn, v. 167.

"Cournaques, who stable the new-caught elephants, and tend them."—Valentijn, Names, &c., 5 (in vol. v.).

1727.—"As he was one Morning going to the River to be washed, with his Carnak or Rider on his Back, he chanced to put his Trunk in at the Taylor's Window."—A. Hamilton, ii. 110; [ed. 1744, ii. 109]. This is the only instance of English use that we know (except Mr. Carl Beck's; and he is not an Englishman, though his book is in English). It is the famous story of the Elephant's revenge on the Tailor.

[1831.—"With the same judgment an elephant will task his strength, without human direction. 'I have seen,' says M. D'Obsonville, 'two occupied in beating down a wall which their cornacs (keepers) had desired them to do. . . .'"—Library of Entertaining Knowledge, Quadrupeds, ii. 157.]

1884.—"The cornac, or driver, was quite unable to control the beast, which roared and trumpeted with indignation."—C. Beck, Temples and Elephants, p. 22.

COROMANDEL, n.p. A name which has been long applied by Europeans to the Northern Tamil Country, or (more comprehensively) to the eastern coast of the Peninsula of India from Pt. Calimere northward to the mouth of the Kistna, sometimes to Orissa. It corresponds pretty nearly to the Maabar of Marco Polo and the Mahomedan writers of his age, though that is defined more accurately as from C. Comorin to Nellore.

Much that is fanciful has been written on the origin of this name. Tod makes it Kāra-mandala, the Realm of the Kūrū (Trans. R. As. Soc. iii. 157). Bp. Caldwell, in the first edition of his Dravidian Grammar, suggested that European traders might have taken this familiar name from that of Karumalai ('black sand'), the name of a small village on the coast north of Madras, which is habitually pronounced and written Coromandel by European residents at Madras. [The same suggestion was made earlier (see Wilks, Hist. Sketches, ed. 1869, i. 5, note)]. The learned author, in his second edition, has given up this suggestion, and has accepted that to which we adhere. But Mr. C. P. Brown, the eminent Telugu scholar, in repeating the former suggestion, ventures positively to assert: "The earliest Portuguese sailors pronounced this Coromandel, and called the whole coast by this name, which was unknown to the Hindus";* a passage containing in three lines several errors. Again, a writer in the Ind. Antiquary (i. 380) speaks of this supposed origin of the name as "pretty generally accepted," and proceeds to give an imaginative explanation of how it was propagated. These etymologies are founded on a corrupted form of the name, and the same remark would apply to Kharamandalam, the 'hot country,' which Bp. Caldwell mentions as one of the names given, in Telugu, to the eastern coast. Padre Paolino gives the name more accurately as Ciola (i.e. Chola) mandalam, but his explanation of it as meaning the Country of Cholam (or iwdrī—Sorghum vulgare, Pers.) is erroneous. An absurd etymology is given by Teixeira (Relacion de Harmuz, 28; 1610). He writes: "Choromādel or Choro Bādel, i.e. Rice Port, because of the great export of rice from thence." He apparently compounds H. chaul, chāwal, 'cooked rice' (!) and bandel, i.e. bandar (q.v.) 'harbour.' This is a very good type of the way etymologies are made by some people, and then confidently repeated.

The name is in fact Chōramandala, the Realm of Chōra; this being the Tamil form of the very ancient title of the Tamil Kings who reigned at Tanjore. This correct explanation of the name was, already given by D'Anville (see Eclaircissements, p. 117), and by W. Hamilton in 1820 (ii. 405), by Ritter, quoting him in 1836 (Erdkunde, vi. 296); by the late M. Reinaud in 1845 (Relation, &c., i. lxxxvi.); and by Sir Walter Elliot in 1869 (J. Ethnol. Soc. N.S. i. 117). And the name occurs in the forms Cholamandalam or Solamandalam on the great Temple inscription of Tanjore (11th century), and in an inscription of A.D. 1101 at a temple dedicated to Varāhasvāmi near the Seven Pagodas. We have other quite analogous names in early inscriptions, e.g. Ilamandalam (Ceylon), Cheramandalam, Tondaimandalam, &c.

Chola, as the name of a Tamil people and of their royal dynasty appears as Choda in one of Asoka's inscriptions, and in the Telugu inscriptions of the Chālukya dynasty. Nor can we doubt that the same name is represented by Σῶπα of Ptolemy who reigned at Ἀρκατοῦ (Arcot), Σῶρ-ραξ who reigned at Ὀρθοῦρα (Wariūr), and the Σῶπαί νομάδες who dwelt inland from the site of Madras.*

The word Soli, as applied to the Tanjore country, occurs in Marco Polo (Bk. iii. ch. 20), showing that Chola in some form was used in his day. Indeed Soli is used in Ceylon.† And although the Choromandel of Baldaeus and other Dutch writers is, as pronounced in their language, ambiguous or erroneous, Valentijn (1726) calls the country Sjola, and defines it as extending from Negapatam to Orissa, saying that it derived its name from a certain kingdom, and adding that mandalam is 'kingdom.'‡ So that this respectable writer had already distinctly indicated the true etymology of Coromandel.

Some old documents in Valentijn speak of the 'old city of Coromandel.' It is not absolutely clear what place was so called (probably by the Arabs in their fashion of calling a chief town by the name of the country), but the indications point almost certainly to Negapatam.§

The oldest European mention of the name is, we believe, in the Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, where it appears as Chomandarla. The short Italian narrative of Hieronymo da Sto. Stefano is, however, perhaps earlier still, and he curiously enough gives the name in exactly the modern form "Coromandel," though perhaps his C

* See Bp. Caldwell's Comp. Gram., 18, 95, &c.

† See Tennent, i. 395.

‡ "This coast bears commonly the corrupted name of Choromandel, and is now called only thus; but the right name is Sjola-mandalam, after Sjola, a certain kingdom of that name, and mandalam, 'a kingdom,' one that used in the old times to be an independent and mighty empire."—Val. v. 2.

§ e.g. 1675.—"Hence the country . . . has become very rich, wherefore the Portuguese were induced to build a town on the site of the old Gentoo (Jentiefze) city Chlormandelan."—Report on the Dutch Conquests in Ceylon and B. by Rykloof Van Goens in Valentijn, v. (Ceylon).

* J.R.A.S., N.S. v. 148. He had said the same in earlier writings, and was apparently the original author of this suggestion. [But see above.]

had originally a cadilla (Ramusio, i. f. 345v.). These instances suffice to show that the name was not given by the Portuguese. Da Gama and his companions knew the east coast only by hearsay, and no doubt derived their information chiefly from Mahomedan traders, through their "Moorish" interpreter. That the name was in familiar Mahomedan use at a later date may be seen from Rowlandson's translation of the Tahfat-ul-Mujahidin, where we find it stated that the Franks had built fortresses "at Meelapoor (i.e. Mailapur or San Thomé) and Nagapattani, and other ports of Solmundul," showing that the name was used by them just as we use it (p. 153). Again (p. 164) this writer says that the Mahomedans of Malabar were cut off from extra-Indian trade, and limited "to the ports of Guzerat, the Concan, Solmundul, and the countries about Kacel." At page 160 of the same work we have mention of "Coromandel and other parts," but we do not know how this is written in the original Arabic. Varthema (1510) has Chormandel, i.e. Chormandel, but which Eden in his translation (1577, which probably affords the earliest English occurrence of the name) deforms into Cyromandel (f. 396b). [Albuquerque in his Cartas (see p. 135 for a letter of 1513) has Choromandell passim.] Barbosa has in the Portuguese edition of the Lisbon Academy, Charamandel; in the Span. MS. translated by Lord Stanley of Alderley, Cholmandel and Cholmender. D'Albuquerque's Commentaries (1557), Mendez Pinto (c. 1550) and Barros (1553) have Choromandel, and Garcia De Orta (1563) Charamandel. The ambiguity of the ch, soft in Portuguese and Spanish, but hard in Italian, seems to have led early to the corrupt form Coromandel, which we find in Parkes's Mondoes (1589), and Coromandyll, among other spellings, in the English version of Castanheda (1582). Cesare Federici has in the Italian (1587) Chlaramandel (probably pronounced soft in the Venetian manner), and the translation of 1599 has Coromandel. This form thenceforward generally prevails in English books, but not without exceptions. A Madras document of 1673 in Wheeler has Cormandell, and so have the early Bengal records in the India Office; Daupier (1689) has Coromondal (i. 509); Lockyer (1711) has "the Coast of Cormandel"; A. Hamilton (1737) Chormondel (i. 349); ed. 1744, i. 351; and a paper of about 1750, published by Dalrymple, has "Choromandel Coast" (Orient. Report, i. 120-121). The poet Thomson has Cormandel:

"all that from the tract
Of woody mountains stretch'd through gorgeous Ind
Fall on Cormandel's Coast or Malabar."

Summer.

The Portuguese appear to have adhered in the main to the correcter form Choromandel: e.g. Archivio Port. Oriental, fasc. 3, p. 480, and passim. A Protestant Missionary Catechism, printed at Tranquebar in 1713 for the use of Portuguese schools in India has: "na costa dos Malabaros que se chania Cormandel." Bernier has "la côte de Koromandel" (Amst. ed. ii. 322). W. Hamilton says it is written Choramandel in the Madras Records until 1779, which is substantially correct. In the MS. "List of Persons in the Service of the Rt. Honble. E. I. Company in Fort St. George and other places on the Coast of Choromandell," preserved in the Indian Office, that spelling continues down to 1778. In that year it is changed to Coromandel. In the French translation of Ibn Batuta (iv. 142) we find Coromandel, but this is only the perverse and misleading manner of Frenchmen, who make Julius Caesar cross from "France" to "England." The word is Ma'bar in the original. [Albuquerque (Comm. Hak. Soc. i. 41) speaks of a violent squall under the name of cara de Coromandel.]

CORPORAL FORBES. A soldier's grimly jesting name for Cholera Morbus.

1829.—"We are all pretty well, only the regiment is sickly, and a great quantity are in hospital with the Corporal Forbes, which carries them away before they have time to die, or say who comes there."—In Sherr's Memoirs, ii. 218.

CORRAL. A. An enclosure as used in Ceylon for the capture of wild elephants, corresponding to the Keddah of Bengal. The word is Sp. corral, 'a court,' &c., Port. curral, 'a cattle-pen, a paddock.' The Americans have the same word, direct from the Spanish, in common use for a cattle-pen; and they have formed a verb 'to corral,' i.e. to enclose in a pen, to pen. The word kraal applied to native camps and villages at the Cape of Good Hope appears to be the same word introduced there by the Dutch. The word corral is explained by Bluteau: "A receptacle for any kind of cattle, with railings round it and no roof, in which respect it differs from Corte, which is a building with a roof." Also he states that the word is used especially in churches for septum nobilium feminarum, a pen for ladies.

c. 1270.—"When morning came, and I rose and had heard mass, I proclaimed a council to be held in the open space (corral) between my house and that of Montaragon."—Chron. of James of Aragon, tr. by Foster, i. 65.

1404.—"And this mosque and these chapels were very rich, and very finely wrought with gold and azure, and enamelled tiles (azulejos); and within there was a great corral, with trees and tanks of water."—Clavijo, § cv. Comp. Markham, 123.

1672.—"About Mature they catch the Elephants with Coraals" (Coralen, but sing. Coraal).—Baldacens, Ceylon, 168.

1860.—In Emerson Tennent's Ceylon, Bk. VIII. ch. iv. the corral is fully described.

1880.—"A few hundred pounds expended in houses, and the erection of coralls in the neighbourhood of a permanent stream will form a basis of operations." (In Colorado.)—Fortnightly Rev., Jan., 125.

CORUNDUM, s. This is described by Dana under the species Sapphire, as including the grey and darker coloured opaque crystallised specimens. The word appears to be Indian. Shakespear gives Hind. kurand, Dakh. kurund. Littré attributes the origin to Skt. kuruvinda, which Williams gives as the name of several plants, but also as 'a ruby.' In Telugu we have kuruvindam, and in Tamil kurundam for the substance in present question; the last is probably the direct origin of the term.

c. 1666.—"Cet emeri blanc se trouve par pierres dans un lieu particulier du Roiaume, et s'appelle Corind en langue Telengui."—Thevenot, v. 297.

COSMIN, n.p. This name is given by many travellers in the 16th and 17th centuries to a port on the western side of the Irawadi Delta, which must have been near Bassein, if not identical with it. Till quite recently this was all that could be said on the subject, but Prof. Forchhammer of Rangoon has now identified the name as a corruption of the classical name formerly borne by Bassein, viz. Kusima or Kusumanagara, a city founded about the beginning of the 5th century. Kusima-mandala was the western province of the Delta Kingdom which we know as Pegu. The Burmese corrupted the name of Kusuma into Kusmein and Kothein, and Alompra after his conquest of Pegu in the middle of the 18th century, changed it to Bathein. So the facts are stated substantially by Forchhammer (see Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma, No. 2, p. 12); though familiar and constant use of the word Persaim, which appears to be a form of Bassein, in the English writings of 1750-60, published by Dalrymple (Or. Repertory, passim), seems hardly consistent with this statement of the origin of Bassein. [Col. Temple (Ind. Ant. xxii. 19 seqq.; J. R. A. S. 1893, p. 885) disputes the above explanation. According to him the account of the change of name by Alompra is false history; the change from initial p to k is not isolated, and the word Bassein itself does not date beyond 1780.]

The last publication in which Cosmin appears is the "Draught of the River Irrawaddy or Irabatty," made in 1796, by Ensign T. Wood of the Bengal Engineers, which accompanies Symes's Account (London, 1800). This shows both Cosmin, and Persaim or Bassein, some 30 or 40 miles apart. But the former was probably taken from an older chart, and from no actual knowledge.

c. 1165.—"Two ships arrived at the harbour Kusuma in Aramana, and took in battle and laid waste country from the port Sapattota, over which Kurttipurapam was governor."—J.A.S. Bengal, vol. xli. pt. i. p. 198.

1516.—"Anrique Leme set sail right well equipped, with 60 Portuguese. And pursuing his voyage he captured a junk belonging to Pegu merchants, which he carried off towards Martaban, in order to send it with a cargo of rice to Malaca, and so make a great profit. But on reaching the coast he could not make the port of Martaban, and had to make the mouth of the River of Pegu. . . . Twenty leagues from the bar there is another city called Cosmin, in which merchants buy and sell and do business. . . ."—Correa, ii. 474.

1545.—“. . . and 17 persons only out of 83 who were on board, being saved in the boat, made their way for 5 days along the coast; intending to put into the river of Cosmim, in the kingdom of Pegu, there to embark for India (i.e. Goa) in the king's lacker ship. . . .”—F. M. Pinto, ch. cxlvii.

1554.—“Cosmym . . . the currency is the same in this port that is used in Peguu, for this is a seaport by which one goes to Peguu.”—A. Nunez, 38.

1566.—“In a few days they put into Cosmi, a port of Pegu, where presently they gave out the news, and then all the Talapoins came in haste, and the people who were dwelling there.”—Couto, Dec. viii. cap. 13.

c. 1570.—“They go it vp the riuer in foure daies . . . with the flood, to a City called Cosmin . . . whither the Customer of Pegu comes to take the note or markes of euery man. . . . Nowe from Cosmin to the citie Pegu . . . it is all plaine and a goodly Country, and in 8 dayes you may make your voyage.”—Cæsar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 366-7.

1585.—“So the 5th October we came to Cosmi, the territory of which, from side to side is full of woods, frequented by parrots, tigers, boars, apes, and other like creatures.”—G. Balbi, f. 94.

1587.—“We entered the barre of Negrais, which is a braue barre, and hath 4 fadomes water where it hath least. Three dayes after we came to Cosmin, which is a very pretie towne, and standeth very pleasantly, very well furnished with all things . . . the houses are all high built, set vpon great high postes . . . for feare of the Tygers, which be very many.”—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 390.

1613.—“The Portuguese proceeded without putting down their arms to attack the Banha Dela's (position), and destroyed it entirely, burning his factory and compelling him to flee to the kingdom of Prom, so that there now remained in the whole realm of Pegu only the Banho of Cosmim (a place adjoining Negrais) calling himself vassal of the King of Arracan.”—Bocarro, 132.

COSPETIR, n.p. This is a name which used greatly to perplex us on the 16th and 17th century maps of India, e.g. in Blaeu's Atlas (c. 1650), appearing generally to the west of the Ganges Delta. Considering how the geographical names of different ages and different regions sometimes get mixed up in old maps, we at one time tried to trace it to the Κασπάρυπος of Herodotus, which was certainly going far afield! The difficulty was solved by the sagacity of the deeply-lamented Prof. Blochmann, who has pointed out

(J. As. Soc. Beng., xlii. pt. i. 224) that Cospetir represents the Bengali genitive of Gajpati, ‘Lord of Elephants,’ the traditional title of the Kings of Orissa. The title Gajpati was that one of the Four Great Kings who, according to Buddhist legend, divided the earth among them in times when there was no Chakravartti, or Universal Monarch (see CHUCKERBUTTY). Gajapati rules the South; Āśvapati (Lord of Horses) the North; Chhatrapati (Lord of the Umbrella) the West; Narapati (Lord of Men) the East. In later days these titles were variously appropriated (see Lassen, ii. 27 seq.). And Akbar, as will be seen below, adopted these names, with others of his own devising, for the suits of his pack of cards. There is a Raja Gajpati, a chief Zamindar of the country north of Patna, who is often mentioned in the wars of Akbar (see Elliot, v. 399 and passim, vi. 55, &c.) who is of course not to be confounded with the Orissa Prince.

c. 700 (?).—“In times when there was no Chakravartti King . . . Chen-pu (Sambadvipa) was divided among four lords. The southern was the Lord of Elephants (Gajapati), &c. . . .”—Introd. to Si-yu-ki (in Pèlerin's Bouddh.), ii. lxxv.

1553.—“On the other or western side, over against the Kingdom of Orixá, the Bengalis (os Bengalos) hold the Kingdom of Cospetir, whose plains at the time of the risings of the Ganges are flooded after the fashion of those of the River Nile.”—Barros, Dec. IV. ix. cap. I.

This and the next passage compared show that Barros was not aware that Cospetir and Gajpati were the same.

„ “Of this realm of Bengala, and of other four realms its neighbours, the Gentoos and Moors of those parts say that God has given to each its peculiar gift: to Bengala infantry numberless; to the Kingdom of Orixá elephants; to that of Bisnaga men most skilful in the use of sword and shield; to the Kingdom of Dely multitudes of cities and towns; and to Cou a vast number of horses. And so naming them in this order they give them these other names, viz.: Espaty, Gaspaty, Noropaty, Buapaty, and Coapaty.”—Barros, ibid. [These titles appear to be Āśvapati, “Lord of Horses”; Gajapati; Narapati, “Lord of Men”; Bhūpati, “Lord of Earth”; Gopati, “Lord of Cattle.”]

c. 1590.—“His Majesty (Akbar) plays with the following suits of cards. 1st. Āśvapati, the lord of horses. The highest card represents a King on horseback, resembling the King of Dihli. . . . 2nd. Gajpati, the King whose power lies in the number of his elephants, as the ruler of Orisah. . . . 3rd.

COSSACK, s. It is most probable that this Russian term for the military tribes of various descent on what was the S. frontier of the Empire has come originally from kazzdk, a word of obscure origin, but which from its adoption in Central Asia we may venture to call Turki. [Schuyler, Turkistan, i. 8.] It appears in Pavet de Courteille's Dict. Turk-Oriental as "vagabond; aventurier . . . ; onagre que ses compagnons chassent loin d'eux." But in India it became common in the sense of 'a predatory horseman' and freebooter.

1366.—"On receipt of this bad news I was much dispirited, and formed to myself three plans; 1st. That I should turn Cossack, and never pass 24 hours in one place, and plunder all that came to hand."—Mem. of Timūr, tr. by Stewart, p. 111.

[1609.—In a Letter from the Company to the factors at Bantam mention is made of one "Sophony Cosuke," or as he is also styled in the Court Minutes "the Russe."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 288.]

1618.—"Cossacks (Cosacchi) . . . you should know, is not the name of a nation, but of a collection of people of various countries and sects (though most of them Christians) who without wives or children, and without horses, acknowledge obedience to no prince; but dwelling far from cities in fastnesses among the woods or mountains, or rivers . . . live by the booty of their swords . . . employ themselves in perpetual inroads and cruising by land and sea to the detriment of their nearest enemies, i.e. of the Turks and other Mahometans. . . . As I have heard from them, they promise themselves one day the capture of Constantinople, saying that Fate has reserved for them the liberation of that country, and that they have clear prophecies to that effect."—P. della Valle, i. 614 seq.

c. 1752.—"His kuzzaks . . . were likewise appointed to surround and plunder the camp of the French. . . ."—Hist. of Hydur Naik, tr. by Miles, p. 36.

1813.—"By the bye, how do Clarke's friends the Cossacks, who seem to be a band of Circassians and other Sarmatians, come to be called by a name which seems to belong to a great Toorkee tribe on the banks of the Jaxartes? Kuzzauk is used about Delhi for a highwayman. Can it be (as I have heard) an Arabic Mobaligh (exaggeration) from kizk (plunder) applied to all predatory tribes?"—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 264.

1819.—"Some dashing leader may . . . gather a predatory band round his standard, which, composed as it would be of desperate adventurers, and commanded by a professional Kuzzauk, might still give us an infinite deal of trouble."—Ibid. ii. 68.

c. 1823.—"The term Cossack is used because it is the one by which the Mahrattas describe their own species of warfare. In their language the word Cossakee (borrowed like many more of their terms from the Moghuls) means predatory."—Malcolm, Central India, 3d ed. i. 69.

COSSID, s. A courier or running messenger; Arab. kāṣid.

1682.—"I received letters by a Cossid from Mr. Johnson and Mr. Catchpoole, dated ye 18th instant from Muxoodarud, Bulchund's residence."—Hedges, Diary, Dec. 20th; [Hak. Soc. i. 58].

[1687.—"Haveing detained the Cossetts 4 or 5 Daies."—Ibid. ii. lxix.]

1690.—"Therefore December the 2d. in the evening, word was brought by the Broker to our President, of a Cosset's Arrival with Letters from Court to the Vacinavish, injoyning our immediate Release."—(Wington, 416.

1748.—"The Tappies [dāk runners] on the road to Ganjam being grown so exceedingly indolent that he has called them in, being convinced that our packets may be forwarded much faster by Cassids [mounted postmen*]."—In Long, p. 3.

c. 1759.—"For the performance of this arduous . . . duty, which required so much care and caution, intelligencers of talent, and Kasids or messengers, who from head to foot were eyes and ears . . . were stationed in every quarter of the country."—H. of Hydur Naik, 126.

1803.—"I wish that you would open a communication by means of cosoids with the officer commanding a detachment of British troops in the fort of Songhur."—Wellington, ii. 159.

COSSIMBAZAR, n.p. Properly Kāsimbāzār. A town no longer existing, which closely adjoined the city of Murshidābād, but preceded the latter. It was the site of one of the most important factories of the East India Company in their mercantile days, and was indeed a chief centre of all foreign trade in Bengal during the 17th century. ["In 1658 the Company established a factory at Cossimbazaar, 'Castle Bazaar.'"—(Birdwood Rep. on Old Rec. 219.)] Fryer (1673) calls it Castle Buzzar (p. 38).

1665.—"That evening I arrived at Casen-Basar, where I was welcom'd by Menheir Arnold van Wachtendonk, Director of all Holland-Factories in Bengal."—Tavernier, E.T., ii. 58; [ed. Ball, i. 131. Bernier (E.T. p. 141; ed. Constable, 440) has Kasem-Bazar; in the map, p. 454, Kasem-bazar.]

1676.—"Kassembasar, a Village in the Kingdom of Bengula, sends abroad every year two and twenty thousand Bales of Silk; every Bale weighing a hunder'd pound."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 126; [Ball, ed. ii. 2].

[1678.—"Cassumbazar." See quotation under DADNY.]

COSSYA, n.p. More properly Kāsia, but now officially Khāsi; in the language of the people themselves kī-

Kdai, the first syllable being a prefix denoting the plural. The name of a hill people of Mongoloid character, occupying the mountains immediately north of Silhet in Eastern Bengal. Many circumstances in relation to this people are of high interest, such as their practice, down to our own day, of erecting rude stone monuments of the menhir and dolmen kind, their law of succession in the female line, &c. Shillong, the modern seat of administration of the Province of Assam, and lying midway between the proper valley of Assam and the plain of Silhet, both of which are comprehended in that government, is in the Kāsia country, at a height of 4,900 feet above the sea. The Kāsias seem to be the people encountered near Silhet by Ibn Batuta as mentioned in the quotation :

c. 1346.—"The people of these mountains resemble Turks (i.e. Tartars), and are very strong labourers, so that a slave of their race is worth several of another nation."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 216. [See KHASYA.]

1780.—"The first thing that struck my observation on entering the arena was the similarity of the dresses worn by the different tribes of Cusseahs or native Tartars, all dressed and armed agreeable to the custom of the country or mountain from whence they came."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 182.

1789.—"We understand the Cossyaks who inhabit the hills to the north-westward of Sylhet, have committed some very daring acts of violence."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 218.

1790.—"Agreed and ordered, that the Trade of Sylhet . . . be declared entirely free to all the natives . . . under the following Regulations:—1st. That they shall not supply the Cossyaks or other Hill-people with Arms, Ammunition or other articles of Military store. . . ."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 31.

COSTUS. (See PUTCHOCK.)

COT, s. A light bedstead. There is a little difficulty about the true origin of this word. It is universal as a sea-term, and in the South of India. In Northern India its place has been very generally taken by charpoy (q.v.), and cot, though well understood, is not in such prevalent European use as it formerly was, except as applied to barrack furniture, and among soldiers and their families. Words with this last characteristic have very frequently been introduced from the south. There are, however, both in north and south, vernacular words which may have led to the adoption of the term cot in their respective localities. In the north we have H. khat and khatwa, both used in this sense, the latter also in Sanskrit; in the south, Tam. and Malayā. kattil, a form adopted by the Portuguese. The quotations show, however, no Anglo-Indian use of the word in any form but cot.

The question of origin is perhaps further perplexed by the use of quatre as a Spanish term in the West Indies (see Tom Cringle below). A Spanish lady tells us that catre, or catre de tigre ("scissors-cot") is applied to a bedstead with X-trestles. Catre is also common Portuguese for a wooden bedstead, and is found as such in a dictionary of 1611. These forms, however, we shall hold to be of Indian origin; unless it can be shown that they are older in Spain and Portugal than the 16th century. The form quatre has a curious analogy (probably accidental) to चतुर्पाद.

1553.—"The Camarij (Zamorin) who was at the end of a house, placed on a bedstead, which they call cattle. . . ."—De Barros, Dec. I. liv. iv. cap. viii.

1557.—"The king commanded his men to furnish a tent on that spot, where the interview was to take place, all carpeted inside with very rich tapestries, and fitted with a sofa (cattle) covered over with a silken cloth."—Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 204.

1566.—"The king was set on a catal (the name of a kind of field bedstead) covered with a cloth of white silk and gold. . . ."—Damian de Góis, Chron. del R. Dom Emanuel, 48.

1600.—"He retired to the hospital of the sick and poor, and there had his cell, the walls of which were of coarse palm-mats. Inside there was a little table, and on it a crucifix of the wood of St. Thomas, covered with a cloth, and a breviary. There was also a catre of coir, with a stone for pillow; and this completes the inventory of the furniture of that house."—Lucena, V. do P. F. Xavier, 199.

[1634.—"The better sort sleeps upon cots, or Beds two foot high, matted or done with girth-weh."—Sir T. Herbert, Trav. 149. N.E.D.]

1648.—"Indian bedsteads or Cadels."—Van Twist, 64.

1673.—". . . where did sit the King in State on a Cott or Bed."—Fryer, 18.

1678.—"Upon being thus abused the said Serjeant Waterhouse commanded the corporal Edward Short, to tie Savage down on his cot."—In Wheeler, i. 106.

1685.—"I hired 12 stout fellows . . . to carry me as far as Lar in my cott (Palankeen fashion). . . ."—Hedges, Diary, July 29; [Hak Soc. i. 263].

1688.—"In the East Indies, at Fort St. George, also Men take their Cotts or little Field-Beds and put them into the Yards, and go to sleep in the Air."—Dampier's Voyages, ii. Pt. iii.

1690.—". . . the Cot or Bed that was by . . ."—Ovington, 211.

1711.—In Canton Price Current: "Bamboo Cotts for Servants each . . . 1 mace."—Lockyer, 150.

1768-71.—"We here found the body of the deceased, lying upon a kadel, or couch."—Stavorinus, E.T., i. 442.

1794.—"Notice is hereby given that sealed proposals will be received . . . for supplying . . . the different General Hospitals with clothing, cotts, and bedding."—In Seton-Harr, ii. 115.

1824.—"I found three of the party insisted upon accompanying me the first stage, and had despatched their camp-cots."—Seely, Ellora, ch. iii.

c. 1830.—"After being . . . furnished with food and raiment, we retired to our quattres, a most primitive sort of couch, with a piece of canvas stretched over it."—Tom Cringle's Log, ed. 1863, p. 100.

1872.—"As Badan was too poor to have a khat, that is, a wooden bedstead with tester frames and mosquito curtains."—Gopinada Samanta, i. 140.

COTAMALUCO, n.p. The title by which the Portuguese called the kings of the Golconda Dynasty, founded, like the other Mahomedan kingdoms of S. India, on the breaking up of the Bāhmani kingdom of the Deccan. It was a corruption of Kutb-ut-Mulk, the designation of the founder, retained as the style of the dynasty by Mahomedans as well as Portuguese (see extract from Akbar-nāma under IDALCAN).

1543.—"When Idalcān heard this reply he was in great fear . . . and by night made his escape with some in whom he trusted (very few they were), and fled in secret, leaving his family and his wives, and went to the territories of the Isam Maluco (see NEZAMALUCO), his neighbour and friend . . . and made matrimonial ties with the Isam Maluco, marrying his daughter, on which they arranged together; and there also came into this concert the Mademaluco, and Cotamaluco, and the Verido, who are other great princes, marching with Izam Maluco, and connected with him by marriage."—Correa, iv. 313 seq.

1553.—"The Captains of the Kingdom of the Decan added to their proper names other honorary ones which they affected more, one calling himself Iniza Malmulco, which is as much as to say 'Spear of the State,' Cota Malmulco, i.e. 'Fortress of the State,' Adelchan, 'Lord of Justice'; and we, corrupting these names, call them Nizamalucco, Cotamalucco, and Hidalchan."—Barros, IV. iv. 16; [and see Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 172]. These same explanations are given by Garcia de Orta (Colloquios, f. 36v), but of course the two first are quite wrong. Iniza Malmulco, as Barros here writes it, is Ar. An-Nizām ul Mulk, "The Administrator of the State," not from P. neza, "a spear." Cotamalucco is Kutb-ul-Mulk, Ar. "the Pivot (or Pole-star) of the State," not from H. kofā, "a fort."

COTIA, s. A fast-sailing vessel, with two masts and lateen sails, employed on the Malabar coast. Kottiya is used in Malayāl.; [the Madras Gloss. writes the word kotych, and says that it comes from Ceylon;] yet the word hardly appears to be Indian. Bluteau however appears to give it as such (iii. 590).

1552.—"Among the little islands of Goa he embarked on board his fleet, which consisted of about a dozen cotias, taking with him a good company of soldiers."—Castanheda, iii. 25. See also pp. 47, 48, 228, &c.

c. 1580.—"In the gulf of Naguná . . . I saw some Cutias."—Primor e Houra, &c., f. 73.

1602.—". . . embarking his property on certain Cotias, which he kept for that purpose."—Couto, Dec. IV. liv. i. cap. viii.

COTTA, s. H. katthā. A small land-measure in use in Bengal and Bahar, being the twentieth part of a Bengal bighā (see BEEGAH), and containing eighty square yards.

[1767.—"The measurement of land in Bengal is thus estimated: 16 Gundas make 1 Cotta; 20 Cottas, 1 Bega, or about 16,000 square feet."—Verelst, View of Bengal, 221, note.]

1784.—". . . An upper roomed House standing upon about 5 cottahs of ground. . . ."—Seton-Karr, i. 34.

COTTON, s. We do not seem to be able to carry this familiar word further back than the Ar. kutn, kutun, or kutunn, having the same meaning, whence Prov. coton, Port. cotão, It. cotone, Germ. Kattun. The Sp. keeps the Ar. article, algodon, whence old Fr.

auqueton and hoqueton, a coat quilted with cotton. It is only by an odd coincidence that Pliny adduces a like-sounding word in his account of the arbores lunigeræ: "ferunt mali cotonei amplitudine cucurbitas, quæ maturitate ruptæ ostendunt lanuginis pilas, ex quibus vestes pretioso linteo faciunt"—xii. 10 (21). [On the use and cultivation of cotton in the ancient world, see the authorities collected by Frazer, Pausanias, iii. 470, seqq.]

[1830.—"The dress of the great is on the Persian model; it consists of a shirt of kuttaun (a kind of linen of a wide texture, the best of which is imported from Aleppo, and the common sort from Persia). . . ."—Alphinstone's Cانبul, i. 351.]

COTTON-TREE, SILK. (See SEEMUL.)

COTWAL, CUTWAUL, s. A police-officer; superintendent of police; native town magistrate. P. kotwāl, 'a seneschal, a commandant of a castle or fort.' This looks as if it had been first taken from an Indian word, kotwālā; [Skt. kōṭha- or kōṣṭha pālā 'castle-porter']; but some doubt arises whether it may not have been a Turki term. In Turki it is written kotāul, kotdāul, and seems to be regarded by both Vambéry and Pavet de Courteille as a genuine Turki word. V. defines it as: "Ketaul, garde de forteresse, chef de la garnison; nom d'un tribu d'Ozbegs;" P. "kotāul, kotdāul, gardien d'une citadelle." There are many Turki words of analogous form, as kardāul, 'a vidette,' bakdāul, 'a table-steward,' yasdāul, 'a chamberlain,' tangdāul, 'a patrol,' &c. In modern Bokhara Kataul is a title conferred on a person who superintends the Amir's buildings (Khanikoff, 241). On the whole it seems probable that the title was originally Turki, but was shaped by Indian associations.

[The duties of the Kotwāl, as head of the police, are exhaustively laid down in the Āin (Jarrett, ii. 41). Amongst other rules: "He shall amputate the hand of any who is the pot-companion of an executioner, and the finger of such as converse with his family."] The office of Kotwāl in Western and Southern India, technically speaking, ceased about 1862, when the new police system (under Act, India, V. of 1861, and corresponding Acts) was introduced. In Bengal the term has been long obsolete. [It is still in use in the N.W.P. to designate the chief police officer of one of the larger cities or cantonments.]

c. 1040.—“Bu-Ali Kotwal (of Ghazni) returned from the Khilj expedition, having adjusted matters.” — Bahaki, in Elliot, ii. 151.

1406-7. — “They fortified the city of Astarābād, where Abul Leith was placed with the rank of Kotwal.” — Abdurrazāk, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 123.

1553. — “The message of the Camorij arriving, Vasco da Gama landed with a dozen followers, and was received by a noble person whom they called Catual. . . .” — Barros, Dec. I. liv. iv. ch. viii.

1572. —

“Na praya hum regedor do Regno estava Que na sua lingua Catual se chama.”
Camões, vii. 44.

By Burton :

“There stood a Regent of the Realm ashore, a chief, in native parlance ‘Cat’ual’ hight.”

also the plural :

Que o Gentilico povo governavam.”
Ibid. viii. 56.

1616.—Roe has Cutwall passim; [e.g. Hak. Soc. i. 90. &c.].

1727.—“Mr. Boucher being bred a Druggist in his youth, presently knew the Poison, and carried it to the Cautwaul or Sheriff, and showed it.” — A. Hamilton, ii. 199. [In ed. 1744, ii. 199, cautwal.]

1763.—“The Catwal is the judge and executor of justice in criminal cases.” — Orme (ed. 1803), i. 26.

1812.—“. . . an officer retained from the former system, denominated cutwal, to whom the general police of the city and regulation of the market was entrusted.” — Fifth Report, 44.

1847.—“The Kutwal . . . seems to have done his duty resolutely and to the best of his judgment.” — G. O. by Sir C. Napier, 121.

[1880.—“The son of the Raja’s Kotwal was the prince’s great friend.” — Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 209.]

COUNSILLEE, s. This is the title by which the natives in Calcutta generally designate English barristers. It is the same use as the Irish one of Counsellar, and a corruption of that word.

COUNTRY, adj. This term is used colloquially, and in trade, as an adjective to distinguish articles produced in India (generally with a sub-indication of disparagement), from such as are imported, and especially imported from Europe. Indeed Europe (q.v.) was, and still occasionally is, used as the contrary adjective. Thus, ‘country harness’ is opposed to ‘Europe harness’; ‘country-born’ people are persons of European descent, but born in India; ‘country horses’ are Indian-bred in distinction from Arabs, Walers (q.v.), English horses, and even from ‘stud-breds,’ which are horses reared in India, but from foreign sires; ‘country ships’ are those which are owned in Indian ports, though often officered by Europeans; country bottled beer is beer imported from England in cask and bottled in India; [‘country-wound’ silk is that reeled in the crude native fashion]. The term, as well as the H. desī, of which country is a translation, is also especially used for things grown or made in India as substitutes for certain foreign articles. Thus the Cicca disticha in Bombay gardens is called ‘Country gooseberry’; Convolvulus batatas, or sweet potato, is sometimes called the ‘country potato.’ It was, equally with our quotidian root which has stolen its name, a foreigner in India, but was introduced and familiarised at a much earlier date. Thus again desī bādām, or ‘country almond,’ is applied in Bengal to the nut of the Terminalia Catappa. On desī, which is applied, among other things, to silk, the great Ritter (dormitans Homerus) makes the odd remark that desī is just Seide reversed! But it would be equally apposite to remark that Trigon-ometry is just Country-ometry reversed!

Possibly the idiom may have been taken up from the Portuguese, who also use it, e.g. ‘açafrão da terra,’ ‘country saffron,’ i.e. safflower, otherwise called bastard saffron, the term being sometimes applied to turmeric. But the source of the idiom is general, as the use of desī shows. Moreover the Arabic baladī, having the same literal meaning, is applied in a manner strictly analogous, including the note of disparagement, insomuch that it has been naturalised in Spanish as indicating ‘of little or no value.’ Illustrations of the mercantile use of beledī (i.e. baladī) will be found in a note to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 370. For the Spanish use we may quote the Dict.

of Cobarruvias (1611): "Buladi, the thing which is produced at less cost, and is of small duration and profit." (See also Dozy and Engelmann, 232 seq.)

1516.—"Belady ginger grows at a distance of two or three leagues all round the city of Calicut. . . . In Bengal there is also much ginger of the country (Jengirre Beladi)."—Barthema, 221 seq.

[1530.—"I at once sent some of these country men (homeens caludis) to the Thanas."—Albuquerque, Curtis, p. 148.]

1582.—"The Nayres maye not take anye Countrie women, and they also doe not marrie."—Castañeda, (by N. L.), f. 36.

[1608.—"The Country here are at dissonion among themselves."—Junvers, Letters, i. 20.]

1619.—"The twelfth in the morning Master Methicold came from Messalipatan in one of the Country Boats."—Pring, in Purchas, i. 638.

1685.—"The inhabitants of the Gentoo Town, all in arms, bringing with them also elephants, kettle-drums, and all the Country music."—Wheeler, i. 140.

1747.—"It is resolved and ordered that a Serjeant with two Troopers and a Party of Country Horse, to be sent to Markisnah Puram to patroll. . . ."—Fr. St. David Council of War, Dec. 25. M.S. Records in India Office.

1752.—"Captain Clive did not despair . . . and at ten at night sent one Shawlum, a serjeant who spoke the country languages, with a few sepoyes to reconnoitre."—Orme, i. 211 (ed. 1803).

1769.—"I supped last night at a Country Captain's; where I saw for the first time a specimen of the Indian taste."—Trignmouth, Mem. i. 15.

1775.—"The Moors in what is called Country ships in East India, have also their chearing songs; at work in hoisting, or in their boats a rowing."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 305.

1793.—"The jolting springs of country-made carriages, or the grunts of country-made carriers, commonly called palankeenboys."—Hugh Boyd, 146.

1809.—"The Rajah had a drawing of it made for me, on a scale, by a country Draftsman of great merit."—Ld. Valentia, i. 356.

" . . . split country peas . . ."—Maria Graham, 25.

1817.—"Since the conquest (of Java) a very extensive trade has been carried on by the English in country ships."—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 210.

[1882.—"There was a country-born European living in a room in the bungalow."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 256.]

COUNTRY-CAPTAIN, s. This is in Bengal the name of a peculiar dry kind of curry, often served as a breakfast dish. We can only conjecture that it was a favourite dish at the table of the skippers of 'country ships,' who were themselves called 'country captains,' as in our first quotation. In Madras the term is applied to a spatchcock dressed with onions and curry stuff, which is probably the original form. [Riddell says: "Country-captain.—Cut a fowl in pieces; shred an onion small and fry it brown in butter; sprinkle the fowl with fine salt and curry powder and fry it brown; then put it into a stewpan with a pint of soup; stew it slowly down to a half and serve it with rice" (Ind. Dom. Econ. 176).]

1792.—"But now, Sir, a Country Captain is not to be known from an ordinary man, or a Christian, by any certain mark whatever."—Madras Courier, April 26.

c. 1825.—"The local name for their business was the 'Country Trade,' the ships were 'Country Ships,' and the masters of them 'Country Captains.' Some of my readers may recall a dish which was often placed before us when dining on board these vessels at Whampoa, viz. 'Country Captain.'"—The Fankue at Canton (1882), p. 33.

COURSE, s. The drive usually frequented by European gentlemen and ladies at an Indian station.

1853.—"It was curious to Oakfield to be back on the Ferozepore course, after a six months' interval, which seemed like years. How much had happened in these six months!"—Oakfield, ii. 124.

COURTALLUM, n.p. The name of a town in Tinnevely [used as an European sanatorium (Stuart, Man. of Tinnevely, 96)]; written in vernacular Kuttālum. We do not know its etymology. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tri-kūtāchalu, Skt., the 'Three-peaked Mountain.']

COVENANTED SERVANTS. This term is specially applied to the regular Civil Service of India, whose members used to enter into a formal covenant with the East India Company, and do now with the Secretary of State for India. Many other classes of servants now go out to India under a variety of contracts and covenants, but the term in question continues to be appropriated as before. [See CIVILIAN.]

1757.—“There being a great scarcity of covenanted servants in Calcutta, we have entertained Mr. Hewitt as a monthly writer . . . and beg to recommend him to be covenanted upon this Establishment.”—Letter in Long, 112.

COVID, s. Formerly in use as the name of a measure, varying much locally in value, in European settlements not only in India but in China, &c. The word is a corruption, probably an Indo-Portuguese form, of the Port. covado, a cubit or ell.

[1612.—“A long covad within 1 inch of our English yard, wherewith they measure cloth, the short covad is for silks, and containeth just as the Portuguese covad.”—Danvers, Letters, i. 241.

[1616.—“Clothes of gould : . . were worth 100 rupies a cobde.”—Sir T. Roe, Hak: Soc. i. 203.

[1617.—Cloth “here afforded at a rupie and two in a cobdee vnder ours.”—Ibid. ii. 409.]

1672.—“Measures of Surat are only two; the Lesser and the Greater Coveld [probably misprint for Coveed], the former of 27 inches English, the latter of 36 inches English.”—Fryer, 206.

1720.—“Item. I leave 200 pagodas for a tomb to be erected in the burial place in form as follows. Four large pillars, each to be six covids high, and six covids distance one from the other; the top to be arched, and on each pillar a cherubim; and on the top of the arch the effigy of Justice.”—Testament of Charles Danvers, Merchant, in Wheeler, ii. 338.

[1726.—“Cobidos.” See quotation under LOONGHEE.]

c. 1760.—According to Grosse the covid at Surat was 1 yard English [the greater coveed of Fryer], at Madras $\frac{1}{2}$ a yard; but he says also: “At Bengal the same as at Surat and Madras.”

1794.—“To be sold, on very reasonable terms, About 3000 covits of 2-inch Calicut Planks.”—Bombay Courier, July 19.

The measure has long been forgotten under this name in Bengal, though used under the native name hath. From Milburn (i. 334, 341, &c.) it seems to have survived on the West Coast in the early part of last century, and possibly may still linger.

[1612.—“ $\frac{1}{2}$ corge of pintados of 4 hastas the piece.”—Danvers, Letters, i. 232.]

COVIL, s. Tam. kō-v-il, ‘God-house,’ a Hindu temple; and also (in Malabar) a palace, [also in the form Colghum, for Kovilagam]. In colloquial use in S. India and Ceylon. In S. India it is used, especially among the French, for ‘a church’; also among the uneducated English.

[1796.—“I promise to use my utmost endeavours to procure for this Raja the colghum of Pychi for his residence. . . .”—Treaty, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 254.]

COWCOLLY, n.p. The name of a well-known lighthouse and landmark at the entrance of the Hoogly, in Midnapur District. Properly, according to Hunter, Geonkhālī. In Thornton’s English Pilot (pt. iii. p. 7, of 1711) this place is called Cockoly.

COW-ITCH, s. The irritating hairs on the pod of the common Indian climbing herb Mucuna pruriens, D.C., N. O. Leguminosae, and the plant itself. Both pods and roots are used in native practice. The name is doubtless the Hind. kewānch (Skt. kapi-kachchhu), modified in Hobson-Jobson fashion, by the ‘striving after meaning.’

[1773.—“Cow-itch. This is the down found on the outside of a pod, which is about the size and thickness of a man’s little finger, and of the shape of an Italian S.”—Ives, 494.]

COWLE, s. A lease, or grant in writing; a safe-conduct, amnesty, or in fact any written engagement. The Emperor Sigismund gave Cowle to John Huss—and broke it. The word is Ar. kaul, ‘word, promise, agreement,’ and it has become technical in the Indian vernaculars, owing to the prevalence of Mahomedan Law.

[1611.—“We desired to have a cowl of the Shahbunder to send some persons aland.”—Danvers, Letters, i. 133.

[1613.—“Procured a cowl for such ships as should come.”—Foster, Letters, ii. 17.]

1680.—“A Cowle granted by the Right Worshipful Streynsham Master, Esq., Agent and Governour for affairs of the Honorable East India Company in ffort St. George at Chinapatnam, by and with the advice of his Councill to all the Pegu Ruby Marchants. . . .”—Fort St. George Cons. Feb. 23, in Notes and Extracts, No. iii. p. 10.

1688.—“The President has by private correspondence procured a Cowle for renting the Town and customs of S. Thomé.”—Wheeler, i. 176.

1758.—“The Nawaub . . . having mounted some large guns on that hill . . . sent to the Killadar a Kowl-nama, or a summons and terms for his surrender.”—H. of Hydur Naik, 123.

COWRY.

his ed. of Pyrard de Laui, Hak. Soc. i. 236 seq.]

Cowries were at one time imported into England in considerable quantities for use in the African slave-trade. "For this purpose," says Millburn, "they should be small, clean, and white, with a beautiful gloss" (i. 273). The duty on this importation was £53, 16s. 3d per cent. on the sale value, with $\frac{1}{2}$ added for war-tax. In 1803, 1415 cwt. were sold at the E. I. auctions, fetching £2,696; but after that few were sold at all. In the height of slave-trade the great mart for cowries was at Amsterdam, where there were spacious warehouses for them (see the Voyage &c., quoted 1747).

c. A.D. 943.—"Trading affairs are carried on with cowries (al-wada), which are the money of the country" Maq'ad, i. 385.

c. 1020.—"These isles are divided into two classes, according to the nature of their chief products. The one are called Danu Kewila, 'the isles of the Cowries,' because of the Cowries that they collect on the branches of coco-trees planted in the sea."—Abidant, in J. As., Ser. IV. tom. iv. 200.

c. 1240.—"It has been narrated on this wise that as in that country (Bengal), the Kauri [shell] is current in place of silver, the least gift he used to bestow was a fat of Kauria. The Almighty mitigate his punishment [in hell]!"—Tahakki-i-Nasri, by Rasul, 555 seq.

c. 1350.—"The money of the islanders (of the Maldives) consists of cowries (al-wada). They so style creatures which they collect in the sea, and bury in holes dug on the shore. The flesh wastes away, and only a white shell remains. 100 of these shells are called sipah, and 700 fat; 12,000 they call tutta, and 100,000 busid. Bargains are made with these cowries at the rate of 4 busid for a gold dinar. [This would be about 40,000 for a rupee.] Sometimes the rate falls, and 12 busid are exchanged for a gold dinar. The islanders barter them to the people of Bengal for rice, for they also form the currency in use in that country. . . . These cowries serve also for barter with the negroes in their own land. I have seen them sold at Malé and Gôgâ [on the Niger] at the rate of 1150 for a gold dinar."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 122.

c. 1420.—"A man on whom I could rely assured me that he saw the people of one of the chief towns of the Said employ as currency, in the purchase of low-priced articles of provision, kandaa, which in Egypt are known as wada, just as people in Egypt use fat."—Maqrri, S. de Sacy, Christ. Arab., 2nd ed. i. 252.

[1510.—Mr. Whiteway writes: "In an abstract of an unpublished letter of Albuquerque which was written about 1510, and abstracted in the following year, occurs this sentence:—'The merchandise which they carry from Cairo consists of snails (curruves) of the Twelve Thousand Islands.' He is speaking of the internal caravan trade of Africa, and these snails must be cowries."] 1564.—At the Maldives: "Cowries 12,000 make one cola, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ colas of average size weigh one quntal, the big ones something more."—A. Naves, 36.

"In these isles . . . are certain white little shells which they call cauria."—Catanaloda, iv. 7.

1561.—"Which vessels (Grandes, or palm-wood boats from the Maldives) come loaded with our and caury, which are certain little white shells found among the Islands in such abundance that whole vessels are laden with them, and which make a great trade in Bengala, where they are current as money."—Correa, i. i. 341.

1566.—"In Bengal are current these little shells that are found in the islands of Maldiva, called here caurin, and in Portugal Buro."—Naves, in De Uberantia, 305.

[c. 1580.—"Four kos from this is a well, into which if the bone of any animal be thrown it petrifies, like a cowrie shell, only smaller."—Ain, ed. Jarret, ii. 229.]

c. 1610.—"Les marchandises qu'ils portent le plus souvent sont des petites coquilles des Maldives, dont ils chargent tous les ans grand nombre de navires. Ceux des Maldives les appellent Bely, et les autres Indiens Caury."—Pyrard de Laui, i. 517. see also p. 165; [Hak. Soc. i. 438; also comp. i. 72, 157, 228, 236, 240, 260, 269; Bely is Singh. belia, a cowry].

c. 1684.—" . . . lastly, it (Indostan) wants these little San-rectes of the Maldives, which serve for common Coyne in Bengale, and in some other places. . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 63; [ed. Constable, 204].

[c. 1685.—"The other small money consists of shells called Cowries, which have the edges inverted, and they are not found in any other part of the world save only the Maldiva Islands. . . . Close to the sea they give up to 80 for the piast, and that diminishes as you leave the sea, on account of carriage; so that at Agra you receive but 50 or 55 for the piast."—Tavernier, ed. Bail, i. 27 seq.]

1672.—"Cowrya, like sea-shells, come from Siam, and the Philippine Islands."—Fryer, 88.

1683.—"The Ship Britannia—from the Maldiva Islands, arrived before the Factory . . . at their first going ashore, their first salutation from the natives was a shower of Stones and Arrows, whereby 6 of their Men were wounded, which made them immediately return on board, and by ye mouths of their Guns forced them to a compliance, and permission to load what Cowries they would at Markett Price; so that in a few days time they sett saile from thence for Surat with above 80 Tunn of Cowrya."—Hedges, Diary, July 1; [Hak. Soc. i. 98].

1705.—" . . . Curia, qui sont des petites coquilles."—Ludlow, 245.

1727.—“The Couries are caught by putting Branches of Cocoa-nut trees with their Leaves on, into the Sea, and in five or six Months the little Shell-fish stick to those leaves in Clusters, which they take off, and digging Pits in the Sand, put them in and cover them up, and leave them two or three Years in the Pit, that the Fish may putrefy, and then they take them out of the Pit, and barter them for Rice, Butter, and Cloth, which Shipping bring from Ballasore in Orisa near Bengal, in which Countries Couries pass for Money from 2500 to 3000 for a Rupee, or half a Crown English.”—A. Hamilton [ed. 1744], i. 349.

1747.—“Formerly 12,000 weight of these cowries would purchase a cargo of five or six hundred Negroes: but those lucrative times are now no more; and the Negroes now set such a value on their countrymen, that there is no such thing as having a cargo under 12 or 14 tons of cowries.

“As payments of this kind of specie are attended with some intricacy, the Negroes, though so simple as to sell one another for shells, have contrived a kind of copper vessel, holding exactly 108 pounds, which is a great dispatch to business.”—A Voyage to the Id. of Ceylon on board a Dutch Indiaman in the year 1747, &c. &c. Written by a Dutch Gentleman. Transl. &c. London, 1754, pp. 21 seq.

1749.—“The only Trade they deal in is Cowries (or Blackamoor's Teeth as they call them in England), the King's sole Property, which the sea throws up in great abundance.”—The Boissieren's Voyage to Bombay, by Philalèthes (1750), p. 52.

1753.—“Our Hon'ble Masters having expressly directed ten tons of couries to be laden in each of their ships homeward bound, we ordered the Secretary to prepare a protest against Captain Cooke for refusing to take any on board the Admiral Vernon.”—In Long, 41.

1762.—“The trade of the salt and butty wood in the Chucla of Sillett, has for a long time been granted to me, in consideration of which I pay a yearly rent of 40,000 caouns * of cowries. . . .”—Native Letter to Nabob, in Van Sittart, i. 203.

1770.—“. . . millions of millions of lires, pounds, rupees, and cowries.”—H. Walpole's Letters, v. 421.

1780.—“We are informed that a Copper Coinage is now on the Carpet . . . it will be of the greatest utility to the Public, and will totally abolish the trade of Cowries, which for a long time has formed so extensive a field for deception and fraud. A grievance (sic) the poor has long groan'd under.”—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 29.

1786.—In a Calcutta Gazette the rates of payment at Pultah Ferry are stated in Rupees, Annas, Puns, and Gundas (i.e. of Cowries, see above).—In Seton-Karr, i. 140.

1791.—“Notice is hereby given, that on or before the 1st November next, sealed proposals of Contract for the remittance in Dacca of the cowries received on account of the Revenues of Sylhet . . . will be received at the Office of the Secretary to the Board of Revenue. . . . All persons who may deliver in proposals, are desired to specify the rates per cowan or courons of cowries (see kāhan above) at which they will engage to make the remittance proposed.”—In Seton-Karr, ii. 53.

1803.—“I will continue to pay, without demur, to the said Government, as my annual peakhnah or tribute, 12,000 kāhans of cowries in three instalments, as specified herein below.”—Treaty Engagement by the Rajah of Kitta Keonghur, a Tributary subordinate to Cuttack, 16th December, 1803.

1833.—“May 1st. Notice was given in the Supreme Court that Messrs. Gould and Campbell would pay a dividend at the rate of nine gundahs, one cowrie, one cauy, and eighteen teel, in every sicca rupee, on and after the 1st of June. A curious dividend, not quite a farthing in the rupee!”—The Pilgrim (by Fanny Parkes), i. 273.

c. 1865.—“Strip him stark naked, and cast him upon a desert island, and he would manage to play heads and tails for cowries with the sea-gulls, if land-gulls were not to be found.”—Zelda's Fortune, ch. iv.

1883.—“Johnnie found a lovely cowrie two inches long, like mottled tortoise-shell, walking on a rock, with its red fleshy body covering half its shell, like a jacket trimmed with chenille fringe.”—Letter (of Miss North's) from Seychelle Islands, in Pall Mall Gazette, Jan. 21, 1884.

COWRY, s. Used in S. India for the yoke to carry burdens, the Bangy (q.v.) of N. India. In Tamil, &c., kāvadi, [kāvu, ‘to carry on the shoulder,’ tadi, ‘pole’].

COWTAILS, s. The name formerly in ordinary use for what we now more euphoniously call chowries (q.v.).

c. 1664.—“These Elephants have then also . . . certain Cow-tails of the great Tibet, white and very dear, hanging at their

* Kāhan, see above = 1280 cowries.

* A Kāg would seem here to be equivalent to $\frac{1}{4}$ of a cowry. Wilson, with (?) as to its origin [perhaps P. kāḥ, ‘minute’], explains it as ‘a small division of money of account, less than a ganda of Kauris.’ Til is properly the sesamum seed, applied in Bengal, Wilson says, ‘in account to $\frac{1}{16}$ of a kauri.’ The Table would probably thus run: 20 til = 1 kāg, 4 kāg = 1 kauri, and so forth. And 1 rupee = 400,000 til!

Ears like great Mustachoes. . . .”—Bernier, E.T., 84 ; [ed. Constable, 261].

1665.—“Now that this King of the Great Tibet knows, that Aureng-Zebe is at Kuchemire, and threatens him with War, he hath sent to him an Ambassador, with Presents of the Countrey, as Chrystal, and those dear White Cow-tails. . . .”—Ibid. 135 ; [ed. Constable, 422].

1774.—“To send one or more pair of the cattle which bear what are called cowtails.”—Warren Hastings, Instruction to Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 8.

“There are plenty of cowtailed cows (!), but the weather is too hot for them to go to Bengal.”—Bogle, ibid. 52. ‘Cow-tailed cows’ seem analogous to the ‘dis-mounted mounted infantry’ of whom we have recently heard in the Suakin campaign.

1784.—In a ‘List of Imports probable from Tibet,’ we find “Cow Tails.”—In Seton-Karr, i. 4.

“From the northern mountains are imported a number of articles of commerce. . . . The principal . . . are . . . musk, cowtails, honey. . . .”—Gladwin's Ayeen Akbery (ed. 1800) ii. 17 ; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 172].

CRAN, s. Pers. krān. A modern Persian silver coin, worth about a franc, being the tenth part of a Tomaun.

1880.—“A couple of mules came clattering into the courtyard, driven by one muleteer. Each mule carried 2 heavy sacks . . . which jingled pleasantly as they were placed on the ground. The sacks were afterwards opened in my presence, and contained no less than 35,000 silver krans. The one muleteer without guard had brought them across the mountains, 170 miles or so, from Tehran.”—MS. Letter from Col. Bateman-Champain, R.E.

[1891.—“I on my arrival took my servants' accounts in tomauns and kerans, afterwards in kerans and shaies, and at last in kerans and puls.”—Wills, Land of the Lion, 63.]

CRANCHEE, s. Beng. H. kardn-chī. This appears peculiar to Calcutta, [but the word is also used in N. India]. A kind of ricketty and sordid carriage resembling, as Bp. Heber says below, the skeleton of an old English hackney-coach of 1800-35 (which no doubt was the model), drawn by wretched ponies, harnessed with rope, and standing for native hire in various parts of the city.

1823.—“. . . a considerable number of ‘caranchies,’ or native carriages, each drawn by two horses, and looking like the skeletons of hackney coaches in our own country.”—Heber, i. 28 (ed. 1844).

1834.—“As Lady Wroughton guided her horse through the crowd to the right, a kuranchy, or hackney-coach, suddenly passed her at full speed.”—The Baboo, i. 228.

CRANGANORE, n.p. Properly (according to Dr. Gundert), Koḍunrīlūr, more generally Koḍungalūr; [the Madras Gloss. gives Mal. Kotannallūr, kota, ‘west,’ kovil, ‘palace,’ ūr, ‘village’]. An ancient city and port of Malabar, identical with the Mūyri-kkoḍu of an ancient copper-plate inscription,* with the Mouçipis of Ptolemy's Tables and the Periplus, and with the Muziris primum emporium Indiae of Pliny (Bk. vi. cap. 23 or 26) [see Logan, Malabar, i. 80]. “The traditions of Jews, Christians, Brahmans, and of the Kerala Ulpatti (legendary History of Malabar) agree in making Koḍungalūr the residence of the Perumāls (ancient sovereigns of Malabar), and the first resort of Western shipping” (Dr. Gundert in Madras Journal, vol. xiii. p. 120). It was apparently the earliest settlement of Jew and Christian immigrants. It is prominent in all the earlier narratives of the 16th century, especially in connection with the Malabar Christians; and it was the site of one of the seven churches alleged in the legends of the latter to have been founded by St. Thomas.† Cranganor was already in decay when the Portuguese arrived. They eventually established themselves there with a strong fort (1523), which the Dutch took from them in 1662. This fort was dismantled by Tippoo's troops in 1790, and there is now hardly a trace left of it. In Baldaeus (Malabar und Coromandel, p. 109, Germ. ed.) there are several good views of Cranganore as it stood in the 17th century. [See SHINKALI.]

c. 774. A.D.—“We have given as eternal possession to Iravi Corttan, the lord of the town, the brokerage and due customs . . . namely within the river-mouth of Codangalur.”—Copper Charter, see Madr. Journ. xiii. And for the date of the inscription, Burnell, in Ind. Antiq. iii. 315.

(Before 1500, see as in above quotation, p. 334.).—“I Erveh Barmen . . . sitting this day in Canganūr. . . .” (Madras Journal, xiii. pt. ii. p. 12). This is from an old Hebrew translation of the 8th century copper-grant to the Jews, in which the Tamil has “The king . . . Sri Bhaskara Ravi Varman . . . on the day when he was pleased to sit in Muyiri-kódu. . . .”—thus identifying Muyiri or Muziris with Cranganore, an identification afterwards verified by tradition ascertained on the spot by Dr. Burnell.

1498.—“Quorongolis belongs to the Christians, and the king is a Christian; it is 3 days distant from Calcut by sea with fair wind; this king could muster 4,000 fighting men; here is much pepper. . . .”—Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, 108.

1503.—“Nostra autem regio in qua Christiani commorantur Malabar appellatur, habetque xx circiter urbes, quarum tres celebres sunt et firmæ, Carongoly, Palor, et Colom, et alie illis proximæ sunt.”—Letter of Nestorian Bishops on mission to India, in Assemani, iii. 594.

1516.—“ . . . a place called Crongolor, belonging to the King of Calicut . . . there live in it Gentiles, Moors, Indians, and Jews, and Christians of the doctrine of St. Thomas.”—Barbun, 154.

c. 1535.—“Crancanor fu antichamento honorata, e buon porto, tien molte genti . . . la città è grande, ed honorata con grã traffico, auñti che si facesse Cochin, cõ la venuta di Portoghesi, nobile.”—Summario de' Regni, &c. Ramusio, i. f. 332r.

1554.—“Item . . . paid for the maintenance of the boys in the College, which is kept in Cranguanor, by charter of the King our Lord, annually 100 000 reis. . . .”—S. Botelho, Tombo, &c., 27.

c. 1570.—“ . . . prior to the introduction of Islamism into this country, a party of Jews and Christians had found their way to a city of Malabar called Cadungaloor.”—Tahfat-ul-Mujakkilan, 47.

1572.—

“A hum Cochin, e a outro Cananor,
A qual Chale, a qual a ilha da pimenta,
A qual Couão, a qual dá Cranganor,
E os mais, a quem o mais serve e contenta. . . .”—Camões, vii. 35.

1614.—“The Great Samorine's Deputy came aboard . . . and . . . earnestly persuaded us to stay a day or two, till he might send to the Samorine, then at Crangelor, besieging a Castle of the Portugal.”—Penton, in Perkins, i. 531.

c. 1806.—“In like manner the Jews of Kranghír (Cranganore), observing the weakness of the Samuri . . . made a great many Mahomedans drink the cup of martyrdom. . . .”—Muballat Khân (writing of events in 16th century, in Ellod, viii. 398).

CRANNY. c. In Bengal commonly used for a clerk writing English, and thence vulgarly applied generically to the East Indians, or half-caste class, from among whom English copyists are chiefly recruited. The original is Hind. karānī, kirānī, which Wilson derives from Skt. karan, ‘a door.’

Karana is also the name of one of the (so-called) mixt castes of the Hindus, sprung from a Sudra mother and Vaisya father, or (according to some) from a pure Kshatriya mother by a father of degraded Kshatriya origin. The occupation of the members of this mixt caste is that of writers and accountants; [see Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. 424 seqq.].

The word was probably at one time applied by natives to the junior members of the Covenanted Civil Service—“Writers,” as they were designated. See the quotations from the “Seir Mutagherin” and from Hugh Boyd. And in our own remembrance the “Writers’ Buildings” in Calcutta, where those young gentlemen were at one time quartered (a range of apartments which has now been transfigured into a splendid series of public offices, but, wisely, has been kept to its old name), was known to the natives as Karānī kī Batrik.

c. 1350.—“They have the custom that when a ship arrives from India or elsewhere, the slaves of the Sultan . . . carry with them complete suits . . . for the Rahban or skipper, and for the kirānī, who is the ship's clerk.”—Ibn Batuta, ii. 198.

“The second day after our arrival at the port of Kailūkari, the princess escorted the nakhodāh (or skipper), the kirānī, or clerk. . . .”—Ibid. iv. 250.

c. 1590.—“The Karrānī is a writer who keeps the accounts of the ship, and serves out the water to the passengers.”—Ain (Bluchmann), i. 290.

c. 1610.—“Le Secrétaire s'appelle carans. . . .”—Pyrcard de Laval, i. 152; [Hak. Soc. i. 214].

[1611.—“Doubt you not but it is too true, however the Cranny flatters you with better hopes.”—Duncera, Letters, i. 117, and see also i. 120).

1684. . . . “Ye Noceda and Craneo.”—Pringle, Diary of Ft. St. George, iii. 111.]

c. 1741.—“The gentlemen likewise, other than the Military, who are in high offices and employments, have amongst themselves degrees of service and work, which have not come minutely to my knowledge; but the whole of them collectively are called Carranis.”—Seir Mutagherin, ii. 543.

1793.—“But, as Gay has it, example gains where precept fails. As an encouragement therefore to my brother crannies, I will offer an instance or two, which are remembered as good Company's jokes.”—Hugh Boyd, The Indian Observer, 42.

1810.—“The Cranny, or clerk, may be either a native Armenian, a native Portuguese, or a Bengallee.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 260.

OREASE, CRIS.

Sir Fr. Drake, has Cricke, 'a dagger.'—Hakl. iv. 246.

[1584.—"Crisp." See quotation under A MUCK.]

1586-88.—"The custom is that whenever the King (of Java) doth die . . . the wives of the said King . . . every one with a dagger in her hand (which dagger they call a crese, and is as sharp as a razor) stab themselves to the heart."—Carendish, in Hakl. iv. 337.

1591.—"Furthermore I enjoin and order in the name of our said Lord . . . that no servant go armed whether it be with staves or daggers, or crisses."—Procl. of Viceroy Mathias d'Albuquerque in Archiv. Port. Oriental, fasc. 3, p. 325.

1598.—"In the Western part of the Island (Sumatra) is Manancabo where they make Poinyards, which in India are called Cryses, which are very well accounted and esteemed of."—Linschoten, 33; [with some slight differences of reading, Hak. Soc. i. 110].

1602.—". . . Chinesische Dolchen, so sie Cris nennen."—Hulsius, i. 33.

c. 1610.—"Ceux-là ont d'ordinaire à leur costé vn poignard ondé qui s'apelle cris, et qui vient d'Achen en Sumatra, de laua, et de la Chine."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 121; [Hak. Soc. i. 164]; also see ii. 101; [ii. 162, 170].

1634.—"Malayos crises, Arabes alfanges."—Malaca Conquistada, ix. 32.

1686.—"The Cresset is a small thing like a Baggonet which they always wear in War or Peace, at Work or Play, from the greatest of them to the poorest or meanest person."—Dampier, i. 337.

1690.—"And as the Japanners . . . rip up their Bowels with a Cric. . . ."—Orington, 173.

1727.—"A Page of twelve Years of Age . . . (said) that he would shew him the Way to die, and with that he took a Cress, and ran himself through the body."—A. Hamilton, ii. 99; [ed. 1744, ii. 98].

1770.—"The people never go without a poniard which they call cris."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 97.

c. 1850-60.—"They (the English) chew hashish, cut themselves with poisoned creases . . . taste every poison, buy every secret."—Emerson, English Traits [ed. 1866, ii. 59].

The Portuguese also formed a word crisada, a blow with a cris (see Castanheda, iii. 379). And in English we find a verb to 'crease'; see in Purchas, i. 532, and this:

1604.—"This Boyhog we tortured not, because of his confession, but crysed him."—Scot's Discourse of Iava, in Purchas, i. 175.

[1704.—"At which our people . . . were most of them creezed."—Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxxxvii.]

Also in Braddel's Abstract of the Sijara Malayu:

"He was in consequence creased at the shop of a sweetmeat seller, his blood flowed on the ground, but his body disappeared miraculously."—Sijara Malayu, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 318.

CREDERE, DEL. An old mercantile term.

1813.—"Del credere, or guaranteeing the responsibility of persons to whom goods were sold—commission $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent."—Milburn, i. 235.

CREOLE, s. This word is never used by the English in India, though the mistake is sometimes made in England of supposing it to be an Anglo-Indian term. The original, so far as we can learn, is Span. criollo, a word of uncertain etymology, whence the French créole, a person of European blood but colonial birth. See Skeat, who concludes that criollo is a negro corruption of criadillo, dim. of criado, and is='little nursling.' Criados, criadas, according to Pyrard de Laval, [Hak. Soc. ii. 89 seq.] were used at Goa for male and female servants. And see the passage quoted under NEELAM from Correa, where the words 'apparel and servants' are in the original 'todo o fato e criados.'

1782.—"Mr. Macintosh being the son of a Scotch Planter by a French Creole, of one of the West India Islands, is as swarthy and ill-looking a man as is to be seen on the Portuguese Walk on the Royal Exchange."—Price's Observations, &c. in Price's Tracts, i. 9.

CROCODILE, s. This word is seldom used in India; alligator (q.v.) being the term almost invariably employed.

c. 1328.—"There be also coquodriles, which are vulgarly called calcatix [Lat. calcatrix, 'a cockatrice']. . . . These animals be like lizards, and have a tail stretched over all like unto a lizard's," &c.—Friar Jordanus, p. 19.

1590.—"One Crocodile was so huge and greedy that he devoured an Alibamba, that is a chained company of eight or nine slaves; but the indigestible Iron paid him his wages, and murdered the murderer."—Andrew Battel (West Africa), in Purchas, ii. 985.

[1870.—". . . I have been compelled to amputate the limbs of persons seized by crocodiles (Mugger). . . . The Alligator (ghariul) sometimes devours children. . . ."—Chevers, Mal. Jurispr. in India, 366 seq.].

CRORE, s. One hundred lakhs, i.e. 10,000,000. Thus a crore of rupees was for many years almost the exact equivalent of a million sterling. It had once been a good deal more, and has now been for some years a good deal less. The H. is karor, Skt. koṭi.

c. 1315.—“Kales Dewar, the ruler of Ma'bar, enjoyed a highly prosperous life. . . . His coffers were replete with wealth, inso-much that in the city of Mardi (Madura) there were 1200 crores of gold deposited, every crore being equal to a thousand laks, and every lak to one hundred thousand dinārs.”—Wassāf, in Elliot, iii. 52. N.B.—The reading of the word crore is however doubtful here (see note by Elliot in loco). In any case the value of crore is misstated by Wassāf.

c. 1343.—“They told me that a certain Hindu farmed the revenue of the city and its territories (Daulatābād) for 17 karōr . . . as for the karōr it is equivalent to 100 laks, and the lak to 100,000 dinārs.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 49.

c. 1350.—“In the course of three years he had misappropriated about a kror of tankas from the revenue.”—Ziā-uddīn-Barnī, in Elliot, iii. 247.

c. 1590.—“Zealous and upright men were put in charge of the revenues, each over one Krōr of dams.” (These, it appears, were called krōris.)—Āīn-i-Akbarī, i. 13.

1609.—“The King's yeerely Income of his Crowne Land is fiftie Crou of Rupias, every Crou is an hundred Leckes, and every Lecke is an hundred thousand Rupias.”—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 216.

1628.—“The revenue of all the territories under the Emperors of Delhi amounts, according to the Royal registers, to six arbs and thirty krors of dāms. One arb is equal to a hundred krors (a kror being ten millions) and a hundred Krors of dāms are equivalent to two krors and fifty lacs of rupees.”—Muhammad Sharīf Hanafī, in Elliot, vii. 138.

1690.—“The Nabob or Governour of Bengal was reputed to have left behind him at his Death, twenty Courous of Roupies: A kourou is an hundred thousand lacks.”—Ovington, 189.

1757.—“In consideration of the losses which the English Company have sustained . . . I will give them one crore of rupees.”—Orme, ii. 162 (ed. 1803).

c. 1785.—“The revenues of the city of Decca, once the capital of Bengal, at a low estimation amount annually to two kherore.”—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, i. 172.

1797.—“An Englishman, for H. E.'s amusement, introduced the elegant European diversion of a race in sacks by old women: the Nabob was delighted beyond measure, and declared that though he had spent a crore of rupees . . . in procuring amusement, he had never found one so pleasing to him.”—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 407.

1879.—

“‘Tell me what lies beyond our brazen gates.’

Then one replied, ‘The city first, fair Prince!’

* * * * *

And next King Bimbasāra's realm, and then

The vast flat world with crores on crores of folk.’”

Sir E. Arnold, The Light of Asia, iii.

[CRORI, s. “The possessor or collector of a kror, or ten millions, of any given kind of money; it was especially applied as an official designation, under the Mohammedan government, to a collector of revenue to the extent of a kror of dāms, or 250,000 rupees, who was also at various times invested with the general superintendence of the lands in his district, and the charge of the police.” (Wilson.)

[c. 1590.—See quotation under CRORE.

[1675.—“Nor does this exempt them from pishcashing the Nabob's Crewry or Governour.”—Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ccxxxix.]

[CROTCHY, KURACHEE, properly Karāchi, the sea-port and chief town of the province of Sind, which is a creation of the British rule, no town appearing to have existed on the site before 1725. In As Suyūti's History of the Caliphs (E.T. p. 229) the capture of Kīrah or Kīraj is mentioned. Sir H. M. Elliot thinks that this place was probably situated in if not named from Kachh. Jarrett (Āīn, ii. 344, note) supposes this to be Karāchi, which Elliot identified with the Krokala of Arrian. Here, according to Curtius, dwelt the Arabioi or Arabitai. The harbour of Karāchi was possibly the Porus Alexandri, where Nearchus was detained by the monsoon for twenty-four days (see McCrindle, Ancient India, 167, 262).

[1812.—“From Crotchey to Cape Monze the people call themselves Balouches.”—Morier, Journey through Persia, p. 5.

[1839.—“. . . spices of all kinds, which are carried from Bombay . . . to Koratchee or other ports in Sind.”—Elphinstone's Caubul, i. 384.]

CROW-PHEASANT, s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of a somewhat ignoble bird (Fam. Cuculidae), common all over the plains of India, in Burma, and the Islands, viz. Cen- tropus rufipennis, Illiger. It is held in India to give omens.

1878.—“The crow-pheasant stalks past with his chestnut wings drooping by his side.”—Phil. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 7.

1883.—“There is that ungainly object the coucal, crow-pheasant, jungle-crow, or whatever else you like to call the miscellaneous thing, as it clambers through a creeper-laden bush or spreads its reddish-bay wings and makes a slow voyage to the next tree. To judge by its appearance only it might be a crow developing for a peacock, but its voice seems to have been borrowed from a black-faced monkey.”—Tribes on my Frontier, 155.

CUBEB, s. The fruit of the Piper Cubeba, a climbing shrub of the Malay region. [Its Hind. name kabab chini marks its importation from the East by Chinese merchants.] The word and the articles were well known in Europe in the Middle Ages, the former being taken directly from the Arab. kabābah. It was used as a spice like other peppers, though less common. The importation into Europe had become infinitesimal, when it revived in last century, owing to the medicinal power of the article having become known to our medical officers during the British occupation of Java (1811-15). Several particulars of interest will be found in Hanbury and Flickiger's Pharmacog. 526, and in the notes to Marco Polo, ii. 380.

c. 943.—“The territories of this Prince (the Maharaja of the Isles) produce all sorts of spices and aromatics. . . . The exports are camphor, lign-aloes, clove, sandal-wood, betel-nut, nutmeg, cardamom, cubeb (al-kabābah). . . .”—Maṣūdi, i. 341 seq.

13th cent.—

“Theo canel and the licoris
And swete savoury meynthe I wis,
Theo gilofre, quybibe and mace. . . .”

King Alesaunder, in Weber's Metr. Rom., i. 279.

1298.—“This Island (Java) is of surpassing wealth, producing black pepper, nutmegs, spikenard, galingale, cubeba, cloves. . . .”—Marco Polo, ii. 254.

c. 1328.—“There too (in Jana) are produced cubeba, and nutmegs, and mace, and all the other finest spices except pepper.”—Friar Jordanus, 31.

c. 1340.—“The following are sold by the pound. Raw silk; saffron; clove-stalks and cloves; cubeba; lign-aloes. . . .”—Pegolotti, in Cathay, &c., p. 305.

“Cubeba are of two kinds, i.e. domestic and wild, and both should be entire and light, and of good smell; and the domestic are known from the wild in this way, that the former are a little more brown than the wild; also the domestic are round, whilst the wild have the lower part a little flattened underneath like flattened buttons.”—Pegolotti, in Cathay, &c.; in orig. 374 seq.

c. 1390.—“Take fresh pork, seethe it, chop it small, and grind it well; put to it hard yolks of eggs, well mixed together, with dried currants, powder of cinnamon, and maces, cubeba, and cloves whole.”—Recipe in Wright's Domestic Manners, 350.

1563.—“R. Let us talk of cubeba; although, according to Sepulveda, we seldom use them alone, and only in compounds.

“O. 'Tis not so in India; on the contrary they are much used by the Moors soaked in wine . . . and in their native region, which is Java, they are habitually used for coldness of stomach; you may believe me they hold them for a very great medicine.”—Garcia, f. 80-80c.

1572.—“The Indian physicians use Cubeba as cordials for the stomach. . . .”—Acosta, p. 138.

1612.—“Cubeba, the pound . . . xvi. s.”—Rates and Valuations (Scotland).

1874.—“In a list of drugs to be sold in the . . . city of Ulm, A.D. 1596, cubeba are mentioned . . . the price for half an ounce being 8 kreuzers.”—Hanb. & Flück. 527.

CUBEER BURR, n.p. This was a famous banyan-tree on an island of the Nerbudda, some 12 m. N.E. of Baroch, and a favourite resort of the English there in the 18th century. It is described by Forbes in his Or. Mem. i. 28; [2nd ed. i. 16, and in Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 137 seq.]. Forbes says that it was thus called by the Hindus in memory of a favourite saint (no doubt Kabīr). Possibly, however, the name was merely the Ar. kabīr, ‘great,’ given by some Mahomedan, and misinterpreted into an allusion to the sectarian leader.

[1623.—“On an other side of the city, but out of the circuit of the houses, in an open place, is seen a great and fair tree, of that kind which I saw in the sea coasts of Persia, near Ormuz, called there Lul, but here Ber.”—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 35. Mr. Grey identifies this with the CUBEER BURR.]

1818.—“The popular tradition among the Hindus is that a man of great sanctity named Kubeer, having cleaned his teeth, as is practised in India, with a piece of stick, stuck it into the ground, that it took root, and became what it now is.”—Copland, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 290.

CUCUYA, CUCUYADA, s. A cry of alarm or warning; Malayāl. kūkkuya, ‘to cry out’; not used by English, but found among Portuguese writers, who formed cucuyada from the native

CUDDALORE.

CULGEE.

1759.—“To present to Omed Roy, viz. :—

1 Culgah 1200 0 0
 1 Surpage (sirpesh, or aigrette) 600 0 0
 1 Killot (see Killut) 250 0 0”

—Expenses of Nubob's Entertainment. In Long, 198.

1786.—“Three Kulgies, three Surpashes (see Sirpesh), and three Pudaks (?) [pudak, H. ‘a badge, a flat piece of gold, a neck ornament’] of the value of 36,320 rupees have been despatched to you in a casket.”—Tippoo's Letters, 263.

[1892.—Of a Banjara ox—“Over the beast's forehead is a shaped frontlet of cotton cloth bordered with patterns in colour with pieces of mirror sewn in, and crowned by a kalg or aigrette of peacock feather tips.”—L. Kipling, Beast and Man in India, 147.

[The word was also applied to a rich silk cloth imported from India.

[1714.—In a list of goods belonging to sub-governors of the South Sea C.—“A pair of culgee window curtains.”—2 ser. Notes & Q. VI. 244.]

CULMUREEA, KOORMUREEA,

s. Nautical H. kalmarīya, ‘a calm,’ taken direct from Port. calmaria (Roe-buck).

CULSEY, s. According to the quotation a weight of about a candy (q.v.). We have traced the word, which is rare, also in Prinsep's Tables (ed. Thomas, p. 115), as a measure in Bhūj, kalsi. And we find R. Drummond gives it: “Kulsee or (Culsey (Guz.). A weight of sixteen maunds” (the Guzerat maunds are about 40 lbs., therefore kalsi=about 640 lbs.). [The word is probably Skt. kalaśi, ‘a water jar,’ and hence a grain measure. The Madras Gloss. gives Can. kalasi as a measure of capacity holding 14 Seers.]

1813.—“So plentiful are mangos . . . that during my residence in Guzerat they were sold in the public markets for one rupee the culsey; or 600 pounds in English weight.”—Forbes, Orient. Mem. i. 30; [2d. ed. i. 20].

CUMBLY, CUMLY, CUMMUL,

s. A blanket; a coarse woollen cloth. Skt. kambala, appearing in the vernaculars in slightly varying forms, e.g. H. kamlī. Our first quotation shows a curious attempt to connect this word with the Arab. hammal, ‘a porter’ (see HUMMAUL), and with the camel's hair of John Baptist's raiment. The word is introduced into Portuguese as cam-bolim, ‘a cloak.’

c. 1350.—“It is customary to make of those fibres wet-weather mantles for those rustics whom they call camalls,* whose business it is to carry burdens, and also to carry men and women on their shoulders in palankins (lerticis). . . . A garment, such as I mean, of this camall cloth (and not camel cloth) I wore till I got to Florence. . . . No doubt the raiment of John the Baptist was of that kind. For, as regards camel's hair, it is, next to silk, the softest stuff in the world, and never could have been meant. . . .”—John Marignolli, in Cuthay, 366.

1606.—“We wear nothing more frequently than those cambolins.”—Gourea, f. 132.

[c. 1610.—“Of it they make also good store of cloaks and capes, called by the Indians Manaus, and by the Portuguese ‘Ormus cambalis.’”—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 240.]

1673.—“Leaving off to wonder at the natives quivering and quaking after Sunset wrapping themselves in a comby or Hair-Cloth.”—Fryer, 54.

1690.—“Camlees, which are a sort of Hair Coat made in Persia. . . .”—Orington, 455.

1718.—“But as a body called the Cammul-pashes, or blanket wearers, were going to join Qhandaoran, their commander, they fell in with a body of troops of Mahratta horse, who forbade their going further.”—Sir Mutasherin, i. 143.

1781.—“One comley as a covering . . . 4 fanams, 6 dubs, 0 cash.”—Prison Expenses of Hon. J. Lindsay, Lives of Lindsays, iii.

1798.—“. . . a large black Kummul, or blanket.”—G. Forster, Travels, i. 194.

1800.—“One of the old gentlemen, observing that I looked very hard at his cumly, was alarmed lest I should think he possessed numerous flocks of sheep.”—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 281.

1813.—Forbes has cameleens.—Or. Mem. i. 195; [2d. ed. i. 108].

CUMMERBUND, s. A girdle. H. from P. kamar-band, i.e. ‘loin-band.’ Such an article of dress is habitually worn by domestic servants, peons, and irregular troops; but any waist-belt is so termed.

[1534.—“And tying on a cummerbund (camarubando) of yellow silk.”—Correa, iii. 588. Camaraundes in Dalboquerque, Comm., Hak. Soc. iv. 104.]

1552.—“The Governor arriving at Goa received there a present of a rich cloth of Persia which is called comarbados, being of gold and silk.”—Castanheda, iii. 396.

* Camall (= facchin) survives from the Arabic in some parts of Sicily.

1616.—“The nobleman of Xaxma sent to have a sample of gallie pottes, jugges, po-dingers, lookinglasses, table bookes, chint bramport, and combarbands, with the prices.”—Cocks's Diary, i. 147.

1638.—“Ils sorrent la veste d'une ceinture, qu'ils appellent Commerbant.”—Mandelslo, 223.

1648.—“In the middle they have a well adjusted girdle, called a Commerbant.”—Van Twist, 55.

1727.—“They have also a fine Turband, embroidered Shoes, and a Dagger of Value, stuck into a fine Cummerband, or Sash.”—A. Hamilton, i. 229; [ed. 1744, ii. 233].

1810.—“They generally have the turbans and cummer-bunds of the same colour, by way of livery.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 274.

[1826.—“My white coat was loose, for want of a kumberbund.”—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 275.]

1880.—“... The Punjab seems to have found out Manchester. A meeting of native merchants at Umritsur... describes the effects of a shower of rain on the English-made turbans and Kummerbunds as if their heads and loins were enveloped by layers of starch.”—Pioneer Mail, June 17.

CUMQUOT, s. The fruit of Citrus japonica, a miniature orange, often sent in jars of preserved fruits, from China. Kumkwat is the Canton pronunciation of kin-ki, ‘gold orange,’ the Chinese name of the fruit.

CUMRA, s. H. kamrā, from Port. camara; a chamber, a cabin. [In Upper India the drawing-room is the gol kamrā, so called because one end of it is usually semi-circular.]

CUMRUNGA, s. See CARAM-BOLA.

CUMSHAW, s. Chin. Pigeon-English for bucksheesh (q.v.), or a present of any kind. According to Giles it is the Amoy pron. (kam-sid) of two characters signifying ‘grateful thanks.’ Bp. Moule suggests kan-siu (or Cantonese) kām-sau, ‘thank-gift.’

1879.—“... they pressed upon us, blocking out the light, uttering discordant cries, and clamouring with one voice, Kum-sha, i.e. backsheesh, looking more like demons than living men.”—Miss Bird's Golden Chersonese, 70.

1882.—“As the ship got under weigh, the Compradore's cumshas, according to ‘olo custom,’ were brought on board... dried lychee, Nankin dates... baskets of oranges, and preserved ginger.”—The Fan-kwa, 103.

CUNCHUNEE, s. H. kanchani. A dancing-girl. According to Shakespeare, this is the feminine of a caste, Kanchan, whose women are dancers. But there is doubt as to this: [see Crooke, Tribes and Castes, N.W.P. iv. 364, for the Kanchan caste.] Kanchan is ‘gold’; also a yellow pigment, which the women may have used; see quot. from Bernier. [See DANCING-GIRL.]

[c. 1590.—“The Kanjari; the men of this class play the Pakhawaj, the Rabab, and the Tala, while the women sing and dance. His Majesty calls them Kanchanis.”—Āin, ed. Jarrett, iii. 257.]

c. 1660.—“But there is one thing which seems to me a little too extravagant... the publick Women, I mean not those of the Bazar, but those more retired and considerable ones that go to the great marriages at the houses of the Omrahs and Mansebdars to sing and dance, those that are called Kenchen, as if you should say the gilded the blossoming ones...”—Bernier, E.T. 88; [ed. Constable, 273 seq.].

c. 1661.—“On regala dans le Serrail, toutes ces Dames Etrangères, de festins et des dances des Quenchenies, qui sont des femmes et des filles d'une Caste de ce nom, qui n'ont point d'autre profession que celle de la danse.”—Thevenot, v. 151.

1689.—“And here the Dancing Wenches, or Quenchenies, entertain you, if you please.”—Ovington, 257.

1799.—“In the evening the Canchanis... have exhibited before the Prince and court.”—Diary in Life of Colebrooke, 153.

1810.—“The dancing-women are of different kinds... the Meerascens never perform before assemblies of men... The Kunchenees are of an opposite stamp; they dance and sing for the amusement of the male sex.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 386.

CURIA MURIA, n.p. The name of a group of islands off the S.E. coast of Arabia (Kharydn Marydn, of Edrisi).

1527.—“Thus as they sailed, the ship got lost upon the shore of Fartaque in (the region of) Curia Muria; and having swum ashore they got along in company of the Moors by land to Calayata, and thence on to Ormuz.”—Correa, iii. 562; see also i. 366.

c. 1535.—“Dopo Adem à Fartaque, e le isole Curia, Muria...”—Sommario de' Regni, in Ramusio, f. 325.

1540.—“We letted not to discover the Isles of Curia, Muria, and Avedalcuria (in orig. Abedalcuria).”—Mendez Pinto, E.T. p. 4.

[1553.—See quotation under ROSAL-GAT.]

1554.—“... it is necessary to come forth between Sūkara and the islands Khūr or Múria (Khōr Mōriyā).”—The Mohit, in Jour. As. Soc. Beng. v. 459.

[1833.—“The next place to Saugra is Koorya Moorya Bay, which is extensive, and has good soundings throughout; the islands are named Jibly, Hallanny, Soda, and Haskee.”—Owen, Narr. i. 348.]

1834.—“The next place to Saugra is Koorya Moorya Bay.”—J. R. Geog. Soc. ii. 208.

CURNUM, s. Tel. karanamu; a village accountant, a town-clerk. Acc. to Wilson from Skt. karana; (see CRANNY). [It corresponds to the Tam. kanakan (see CONICOPOLY).]

1827.—“Very little care has been taken to preserve the survey accounts. Those of several villages are not to be found. Of the remainder only a small share is in the Collector's cutcherry, and the rest is in the hands of curnums, written on cadjans.”—Minute by Sir T. Munro, in Arbuthnot, i. 285.

CUROUNDA, s. H. karaundd. A small plum-like fruit, which makes good jelly and tarts, and which the natives pickle. It is borne by Carissa carandas, L., a shrub common in many parts of India (N.O. Apocynaceae).

[1870.—Riddell gives a receipt for kur- under jelly, Ind. Dom. Econ. 338.]

[CURRIG JEMA, adj. A corr. of H. khārij jama, “separated or detached from the rental of the State, as lands exempt from rent, or of which the revenue has been assigned to individuals or institutions” (Wilson).

[1687.—“... that whenever they have a mind to build Factorys, satisfying for the land where it was Currig Jema, that is over measure, not entred in the King's books, or paying the usuall and accustomed Rent, no Government should molest them.”—Yule, Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lxiii.]

CURRUMSHAW HILLS, n.p. This name appears in Rennell's Bengal Atlas, applied to hills in the Gaya district. It is ingeniously supposed by F. Buchanan to have been a mistake of the geographer's, in taking Karna - Chaupār (‘Karna's place of meeting or teaching’), the name of an ancient ruin on the hills in question, for Karnachau Pahār (Pahār = Hill).—(Eastern India, i. 4).

CURRY, s. In the East the staple food consists of some cereal, either (as in N. India) in the form of flour baked into unleavened cakes, or boiled in the grain, as rice is. Such food having little taste, some small quantity of a much more savoury preparation is added as a relish, or ‘kitchen,’ to use the phrase of our forefathers. And this is in fact the proper office of curry in native diet. It consists of meat, fish, fruit, or vegetables, cooked with a quantity of bruised spices and turmeric [see MUSSALLA]; and a little of this gives a flavour to a large mess of rice. The word is Tam. kari, i.e. ‘sauce’; [kari, v. ‘to eat by biting’]. The Canarese form kuril was that adopted by the Portuguese, and is still in use at Goa. It is remarkable in how many countries a similar dish is habitual; pikto [see PILLAU] is the analogous mess in Persia, and kuskusu in Algeria; in Egypt a dish well known as ruzz mufful [Lane, Mod. Egypt, ed. 1871, i. 185], or “peppered rice.” In England the proportions of rice and “kitchen” are usually reversed, so that the latter is made to constitute the bulk of the dish.

The oldest indication of the Indian cuisine in this kind, though not a very precise one, is cited by Athenaeus from Megasthenes: “Among the Indians, at a banquet, a table is set before each individual . . . and on the table is placed a golden dish on which they throw, first of all, boiled rice . . . and then they add many sorts of meat dressed after the Indian fashion” (Athen., by Yonge, iv. 39). The earliest precise mention of curry is in the Mahavanso (c. A.D. 477), where it is said of Kassapa that “he partook of rice dressed in butter, with its full accompaniment of curries.” This is Turnour's translation, the original Pali being sūpa.

It is possible, however, that the kind of curry used by Europeans and Mahomedans is not of purely Indian origin, but has come down from the spiced cookery of medieval Europe and Western Asia. The medieval spiced dishes in question were even coloured like curry. Turmeric, indeed, called by Garcia de Orta, Indian saffron, was yet unknown in Europe, but it was represented by saffron and sandalwood. A notable incident occurs in the old English poem of King Richard, wherein the Lion-heart feasts on the head of a Saracen—

“soden full hastily
With powder and with spysory,
And with saffron of good colour.”

CURRY.

This shows that curry was not a domesticated dish in England at the date of publication. It also is a sample of what the wit was that ran through so many editions!

c. 1830.—“J’ai substitué le lait à l’eau pour boisson . . . c’est une sorte de contre-poison pour l’essence de feu que forme la sauce enragée de mon sempiternel cari.”—Jacquemont, Correspondance, i. 196.

1848.—“Now we have seen how Mrs. Sedley had prepared a fine curry for her son.”—Vanity Fair, ch. iv.

1860.—“. . . Vegetables, and especially farinaceous food, are especially to be commended. The latter is indeed rendered attractive by the unrivalled excellence of the Singhaliese in the preparation of innumerable curries, each tempered by the delicate creamy juice expressed from the flesh of the cocoa-nut, after it has been reduced to a pulp.”—Tennent’s Ceylon, i. 77. N.B. Tennent is misled in supposing (i. 437) that chillies are mentioned in the Mahavanno. The word is maricha, which simply means “pepper,” and which Turnour has translated erroneously (p. 158).

1874.—“The craving of the day is for quasi-intellectual food, not less highly peppered than the curries which gratify the faded stomach of a returned Nabob.”—Blackwood’s Magazine, Oct. 434.

The Dutch use the word as Kerrie or Karrie; and Kari à l’Indienne has a place in French cartes.

CURRY-STUFF, s. Onions, chillies, &c.; the usual material for preparing curry, otherwise mussalla (q.v.), represented in England by the preparations called curry-powder and curry-paste.

1860.—“. . . with plots of esculents and curry-stuffs of every variety, onions, chillies, yams, cassavas, and sweet potatoes.”—Tennent’s Ceylon, i. 463.

CUSBAH, s. Ar.—H. kaṣṭha, kaṣaba; the chief place of a pergunnah (q.v.).

1548.—“And the caçabe of Tunaa is rented at 4450 pardaos.”—S. Botelho, Tombo, 150.

[c. 1590.—“In the fortieth year of his Majesty’s reign, his dominions consisted of one hundred and five Sircas, sub-divided into two thousand seven hundred and thirty-seven kusbahs.”—Ayren, tr. Gludwin, ii. 1; Jarrett, ii. 115.]

1644.—“On the land side are the houses of the Vazador (?) or Possessor of the Casabe, which is as much as to say the town or aldeia of Mombaym (Bombay). This town of Mombaym is a small and scattered affair.”—Bocarro, MS. fol. 227.

c. 1844-45.—“In the centre of the large Cusbah of Streerygoontum exists an old mud fort, or rather wall of about 20 feet high, surrounding some 120 houses of a body of people calling themselves Kotie Vellalas,—that is ‘Fort Vellalas.’ Within this wall no police officer, warrant or Peon ever enters. . . . The females are said to be kept in a state of great degradation and ignorance. They never pass without the walls alive; when dead they are carried out by night in sacks.”—Report by Mr. E. B. Thomas, Collector of Tinnevely, quoted in Lord Stanhope’s Miscellanies, 2nd Series, 1872, p. 132.

CUSCUSS, CUSS, s. Pers.—H. khaskhas. The roots of a grass [called in N. India senṭha or tin,] which abounds in the drier parts of India, Anatherum muricatum (Beauv.), Andropogon muricatus (Retz), used in India during the hot dry winds to make screens, which are kept constantly wet, in the window openings, and the fragrant evaporation from which greatly cools the house (see TATTY). This device seems to be ascribed by Abul Fazl to the invention of Akbar. These roots are well known in France by the name wtyrer, which is the Tam. name rettireru, ‘the root which is dug up.’ In some of the N. Indian vernaculars khaskhas is ‘a poppy-head’; [but this is a different word, Skt. khaskhasa, and compare P. khaskkhaskh].

c. 1590.—“But they (the Hindus) were notorious for the want of cold water, the intolerable heat of their climate. . . . His Majesty remedied all these evils and defects. He taught them how to cool water by the help of saltpetre. . . . He ordered mats to be woven of a cold odoriferous root called Khuss . . . and when wetted with water on the outside, those within enjoy a pleasant cool air in the height of summer.”—Ayren (Gludwin, 1800), ii. 196; [ed. Jarrett, iii. 9].

1663.—“Kas kanays.” See quotation under TATTY.

1810.—“The Kuss-Kuss . . . when fresh, is rather fragrant, though the scent is somewhat terraceous.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 235.

1824.—“We have tried to keep our rooms cool with ‘tatties,’ which are mats formed of the Kuskos, a peculiar sweet-scented grass. . . .”—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 59.

It is curious that the coarse grass which covers the more naked parts of the Islands of the Indian Archipelago appears to be called kusu-kusu (Wallace, 2nd ed. ii. 74). But we know not if there is any community of origin in these names.

[1832.—“The sirrakee (sirkī) and sainturh (senṭhā) are two specimens of one genus of jungle grass, the roots of which are called secundah (sirkanda) or khus-khus.”—Mrs. Meer Hasan Ali, Observations, &c., ii. 208.]

In the sense of poppy-seed or poppy-head, this word is P.; De Orta says Ar.; [see above.]

1563.—“... at Cambaiete, seeing in the market that they were selling poppy-heads big enough to fill a canada, and also some no bigger than ours, and asking the name, I was told that it was cazcax (cashcash)—and that in fact is the name in Arabic—and they told me that of these poppies was made opium (amfido), cuts being made in the poppy-head, so that the opium exudes.”—Garcia De Orta, f. 155.

1621.—“The 24th of April public proclamation was made in Ispahan by the King's order . . . that on pain of death, no one should drink cocnur, which is a liquor made from the husk of the capsule of opium, called by them khash-khash.”—P. della Valle, ii. 209; [cocnur is P. koknār].

CUSPADORE, s. An old term for a spittoon. Port. cuspadadeira, from cuspir, [Lat. conspuere], to spit. Cuspidor would be properly qui multum spuit.

[1554.—Speaking of the greatness of the Sultan of Bengal, he says to illustrate it—“From the camphor which goes with his spittle when he spits into his gold spittoon (cospidor) his chamberlain has an income of 2000 cruzados.”—Castanheda, Bk. iv. ch. 83.]

1672.—“Here maintain themselves three of the most powerful lords and Naiks of this kingdom, who are subject to the Crown of Velour, and pay it tribute of many hundred Pagodas . . . viz. Vitipa-naik of Madura, the King's Cuspidoor-bearer, 200 Pagodas, Cristapa-naik of Chengier, the King's Betel-server, 200 pagodas, the Naik of Tanjouwer, the King's Warder and Umbrella carrier, 400 Pagodas. . . .”—Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 153.

1735.—In a list of silver plate we have “5 cuspadores.”—Wheeler, iii. 139.

1775.—“Before each person was placed a large brass salver, a black earthen pot of water, and a brass cuspadore.”—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, &c. (at Magindanao), 235.

[1900.—“The royal cuspadore” is mentioned among the regalia at Selangor, and a “cuspadore” (ketor) is part of the marriage appliances.—Skeat, Malay Magic, 26, 374.]

CUSTARD-APPLE, s. The name in India of a fruit (Anona squamosa, L.) originally introduced from S. America, but which spread over India during the 16th century. Its commonest name in Hindustan is sharīfa, i.e. ‘noble’; but it is also called Sitap’hal, i.e. ‘the Fruit of Sītā,’ whilst another Anona (‘bullock’s heart,’ A. reticulata, L., the custard-apple of the W. Indies, where both names are applied to it) is called in the south by the name of her husband Rāma. And the Sitap’hal and Rāmp’hal have become the subject of Hindu legends (see Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 410). The fruit is called in Chinese Fan-li-chi, i.e. foreign leechee.

A curious controversy has arisen from time to time as to whether this fruit and its congeners were really imported from the New World, or were indigenous in India. They are not mentioned among Indian fruits by Baber (c. A.D. 1530), but the translation of the Āin (c. 1590) by Prof. Blochmann contains among the “Sweet Fruits of Hindustan,” Custard-apple (p. 66). On referring to the original, however, the word is saddp’hal (fructus perennis), a Hind. term for which Shakespear gives many applications, not one of them the anona. The bel is one (Aegle marmelos), and seems as probable as any (see BAEL). The custard-apple is not mentioned by Garcia de Orta (1563), Linschoten (1597), or even by P. della Valle (1624). It is not in Bontius (1631), nor in Piso’s commentary on Bontius (1658), but is described as an American product in the West Indian part of Piso’s book, under the Brazilian name Araticu. Two species are described as common by P. Vincenzo Maria, whose book was published in 1672. Both the custard-apple and the sweet-sop are fruits now generally diffused in India; but of their having been imported from the New World, the name Anona, which we find in Oviedo to have been the native West Indian name of one of the species, and which in various corrupted shapes is applied to them over different parts of the East, is an indication. Crawford, it is true, in his Malay Dictionary explains nona or buah (“fruit”) nona in its application to the custard-apple as fructus virginalis, from nona, the term applied in the Malay countries (like missy in India) to an unmarried European lady. But in the face of the American word this becomes out of the question.

It is, however, a fact that among the Bharhut sculptures, among the carvings dug up at Muttra by General Cunningham, and among the copies from wall-paintings at Ajanta (as pointed out by Sir G. Birdwood in 1874, (see Athenaeum, 26th October), [Bombay Gazetteer, xii. 490]) there is a fruit represented which is certainly very like a custard-apple (though an abnormally big one), and not very like anything else yet pointed out. General Cunningham is convinced that it is a custard-apple, and urges in corroboration of his view that the Portuguese in introducing the fruit (which he does not deny) were merely bringing coals to Newcastle; that he has found extensive tracts in various parts of India covered with the wild custard-apple; and also that this fruit bears an indigenous Hindi name, dtā or dt, from the Sanskrit dtṛipya.

It seems hard to pronounce about this dtṛipya. A very high authority, Prof. Max Müller, to whom we once referred, doubted whether the word (meaning 'delightful') ever existed in real Sanskrit. It was probably an artificial name given to the fruit, and he compared it aptly to the factitious Latin of aureum malum for "orange," though the latter word really comes from the Sanskrit nāranga. On the other hand, dtṛipya is quoted by Rāja Rādhakant Deb, in his Sanskrit dictionary, from a medieval work, the Dravyaguna. And the question would have to be considered how far the MSS. of such a work are likely to have been subject to modern interpolation. Sanskrit names have certainly been invented for many objects which were unknown till recent centuries. Thus, for example, Williams gives more than one word for cactus, or prickly pear, a class of plants which was certainly introduced from America (see Vidara and Viśvasaraka, in his Skt. Dictionary).

A new difficulty, moreover, arises as to the indigenous claims of dtā, which is the name for the fruit in Malabar as well as in Upper India. For, on turning for light to the splendid works of the Dutch ancients, Rheede and Rumphius, we find in the former (Hortus Malabaricus, part iv.) a reference to a certain author, 'Recchus de Plantis Mexicanis,' as giving a drawing of a custard-apple tree, the name of which in Mexico was ahaté or até, "fructu apud Mexicanos præcellenti arbor nobilis" (the expressions are noteworthy, for the popular Hindustani name of the fruit is sharīfa = "nobilis"). We also find in a Manilla Vocabulary that ate or atte is the name of this fruit in the Philippines. And from Rheede we learn that in Malabar the dtā was sometimes called by a native name meaning "the Manilla jack-fruit"; whilst the Anona reticulata, or sweet-sop, was called by the Malabars "the Parangi (i.e. Firingi or Portuguese) jack-fruit."

These facts seem to indicate that probably the dtā and its name came to India from Mexico via the Philippines, whilst the anona and its name came to India from Hispaniola via the Cape. In the face of these probabilities the argument of General Cunningham from the existence of the tree in a wild state loses force. The fact is undoubted and may be corroborated by the following passage from "Observations on the nature of the Food of the Inhabitants of South India," 1864, p. 12:—"I have seen it stated in a botanical work that this plant (Anona sp.) is not indigenous, but introduced from America, or the W. Indies. If so, it has taken most kindly to the soil of the Deccan, for the jungles are full of it": [also see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 259 seq., who supports the foreign origin of the plant]. The author adds that the wild custard-apples saved the lives of many during famine in the Hyderabad country. But on the other hand, the Argemone Mexicana, a plant of unquestioned American origin, is now one of the most familiar weeds all over India. The cashew (Anacardium occidentale), also of American origin, and carrying its American name with it to India, not only forms tracts of jungle now (as Sir G. Birdwood has stated) in Canara and the Concan (and, as we may add from personal knowledge, in Tanjore), but was described by P. Vincenzo Maria, more than two hundred and twenty years ago, as then abounding in the wilder tracts of the western coast.

The question raised by General Cunningham is an old one, for it is alluded to by Rumphius, who ends by leaving it in doubt. We cannot say that we have seen any satisfactory suggestion of another (Indian) plant as that represented in the ancient sculpture of Bharhut. [Dr. Watt says: "They may prove to be conventional representations of the jack-fruit tree

CUTCH.

CUTCH GUNDAVA, n.p. Kachchh Gandva or Kachchi, a province of Biluchistan, under the Khan of Kela't, adjoining our province of Sind; a level plain, subject to inordinate heat in summer, and to the visitation of the simām. Across the northern part of this plain runs the railway from Sukkur to Sibi. Gandva, the chief place, has been shown by Sir H. Elliot to be the Kandabil or Kandhabel of the Arab geographers of the 9th and 10th centuries. The name in its modern shape, or what seems intended for the same, occurs in the Persian version of the Chachnamah, or H. of the Conquest of Sind, made in A.D. 1216 (see Elliot, i. 166).

CUTCHA, KUTCHA, adj. Hind. kachchd, 'raw, crude, unripe, uncooked.' This word is with its opposite pukka (see PUCKA) among the most constantly recurring Anglo-Indian colloquial terms, owing to the great variety of metaphorical applications of which both are susceptible. The following are a few examples only, but they will indicate the manner of use better than any attempt at comprehensive definition:—

A cutcha Brick is a sun-dried brick.

„ House is built of mud, or of sun-dried brick.

„ Road is earthwork only.

„ Appointment is acting or temporary.

„ Settlement is one where the land is held without lease.

„ Account or Estimate, is one which is rough, superficial, and untrustworthy.

„ Mauud, or Seer, is the smaller, where two weights are in use, as often happens.

„ Major is a brevet or local Major.

„ Colour is one that won't wash.

„ Fever is a simple ague or a light attack.

„ Pice generally means one of those amorphous coppers, current in up-country bazars at varying rates of value.

„ Cms—see analogy under Mauud above.

„ Roof. A roof of mud laid on beams; or of thatch, &c.

„ Scoundrel, a limp and fatuous knave.

„ Seam (sildāi) is the tailor's tack for trying on.

A pukka Brick is a properly kiln-burnt brick.

„ House is of burnt brick or stone with lime, and generally with a terraced plaster roof.

„ Road is a Macadamised one.

„ Appointment is permanent.

„ Settlement is one fixed for a term of years.

„ Account, or Estimate, is carefully made, and claiming to be relied on.

„ Mauud, or Seer, is the larger of two in use.

„ Major, is a regimental Major.

„ Colour, is one that will wash.

„ Fever, is a dangerous remittent or the like (what the Italians call perniciosa).

„ Pice; a double copper coin formerly in use; also a proper pice ($\frac{1}{4}$ anna) from the Govt. mints.

„ Cms—see under Mauud above.

„ Roof; a terraced roof made with cement.

„ Scoundrel, one whose motto is "Thorough."

„ Seam is the definite stitch of the garment.

1763.—"Il parait que les catcha cosses sont plus en usage que les autres cosses dans le gouvernement du Decan."—Lettres Edifiantes, xv. 190.

1863.—"In short, in America, where they cannot get a pukka railway they take a kutchha one instead. This, I think, is what we must do in India."—Lord Elgin, in Letters and Journals, 432.

Captain Burton, in a letter dated Aug. 26, 1879, and printed in the "Academy" (p. 177), explains the gypsy word gorgio, for a Gentile or non-Rommany, as being kachhā or cutcha. This may be, but it does not carry conviction.

CUTCHA-PUCKA, adj. This term is applied in Bengal to a mixt kind of building in which burnt brick is used, but which is cemented with mud instead of lime-mortar.

CUTCHERRY, and in Madras CUT'CHERY, s. An office of administration, a court-house. Hind. kachahrī; used also in Ceylon. The word is not usually now, in Bengal, applied to a merchant's counting-house, which is called dufter, but it is applied to the office of an Indigo-Planter or a Zemindar, the business in which is more like that of a Magistrate's or Collector's Office. In the service of Tippoo Sahib cutcherry was used in peculiar senses besides the ordinary one. In the civil administration it seems to have been used for something like what we should now call Department (see e.g. Tippoo's Letters, 292); and in the army for a division or large brigade (e.g. ibid. 332; and see under JYSHE and quotation from Wilks below).

1610.—“Over against this seat is the Cichery or Court of Rolls, where the King's Viseer sits every morning some three houres, by whose hands passe all matters of Rents, Grants, Lands, Firmans, Debts, &c.”—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 439.

1673.—“At the lower End the Royal Exchange or Queshery . . . opens its folding doors.”—Fryer, 261.

[1702. — “But not makeing an early escape themselves were carried into the Cacherra or publick Gaol.”—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cvi.]

1763. — “The Secretary acquaints the Board that agreeably to their orders of the 9th May, he last Saturday attended the Court of Cutcherry, and acquainted the Members with the charge the President of the Court had laid against them for non-attendance.”—In Long, 316.

„ “The protection of our Gomastahs and servants from the oppression and jurisdiction of the Zemindars and their Cutcheries has been ever found to be a liberty highly essential both to the honour and interest of our nation.”—From the Chief and Council at Dacca, in Van Sittart, i. 247.

c. 1765.—“We can truly aver that during almost five years that we presided in the Cutchery Court of Calcutta, never any murder or atrocious crime came before us but it was proved in the end a Bramin was at the bottom of it.”—Holwell, Interesting Historical Events, Pt. II. 152.

1783.—“The moment they find it true that the English Government shall remain as it is, they will divide sugar and sweetmeats among all the people in the Cutcheree; then every body will speak sweet words.”—Native Letter, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 227.

1786.—“You must not suffer any one to come to your house; and whatever business you may have to do, let it be transacted in our Kuchurry.”—Tippoo's Letters, 303.

1791.—“At Seringapatam General Matthews was in confinement. James Skurry was sent for one day to the Kutcherry there, and some pewter plates with marks on them were shown to him to explain; he saw on them words to this purport, ‘I am indebted to the Malabar Christians on account of the Public Service 40,000 Rs.; the Company owes me (about) 30,000 Rs.; I have taken Poison and am now within a short time of Death; whoever communicates this to the Bombay Govt. or to my wife will be amply rewarded. (Signed) Richard Matthews.”—Narrative of Mr. William Drake, and other Prisoners (in Mysore), in Madras Courier, 17th Nov.

c. 1796.—“... the other Asof Mirán Hussoin, was a low fellow and a debauchee, . . . who in different . . . towns was carried in his palkí on the shoulders of dancing girls as ugly as demons to his Kutcheri or hall of audience.”—H. of Tipú Sultán, E.T. by Miles, 246.

„ “... the favour of the Sultan towards that worthy man (Dundia Wágh) still continued to increase . . . but although, after a time, a Kutcheri, or brigade, was named after him, and orders were issued for his release, it was to no purpose.”—Ibid. 248.

[c. 1810.—“Four appears to have been the fortunate number (with Tippoo; four companies (yenz), one battalion (teep), four teejs one cushoon (see KOSHOO): . . . four cushoons, one Cutcherry. The establishment . . . of a cutcherry . . . 5,688, but these numbers fluctuated with the Sultaun's caprices, and at one time a cushoon, with its cavalry attached, was a legion of about 3,000.”—Wilks, Mysore, ed. 1869, ii. 132.]

1834.—“I mean, my dear Lady Wroughton, that the man to whom Sir Charles is most heavily indebted, is an officer of his own Kucheree, the very sircar who cringes to you every morning for orders.”—The Baboo, ii. 126.

1860.—“I was told that many years ago, what remained of the Dutch records were removed from the record-room of the Colonial Office to the Cutcherry of the Government Agent.”—Tennent's Ceylon, i. xxviii.

1873.—“I'd rather be out here in a tent any time . . . than be stewing all day in a stuffy Kutcherry listening to Ram Buksh and Co. perjuring themselves till they are nearly white in the face.”—The True Reformer, i. 4.

1883.—“Surrounded by what seemed to me a mob of natives, with two or three dogs at his feet, talking, writing, dictating,—in short doing Cutcherry.”—C. Raikes, in Bosworth Smith's Lord Lawrence, i. 59.

CUTCHNAR, s. Hind. kachnār, Skt. kānchanāra (kānchana, ‘gold’) the beautiful flowering tree Bauhinia variegata, L., and some other species of the same genus (N. O. Leguminosae).

1855. — “Very good fireworks were exhibited . . . among the best was a sort of maypole hung round with minor fireworks which went off in a blaze and roll of smoke, leaving disclosed a tree hung with quivering flowers of purple flame, evidently intended to represent the Kachnar of the Burmese forests.”—Iule, Mission to Ava, 95.

CUTTACK, of Orissa, and attached. From army, a camp, name Al-kataka.

Batuta in the 14th century was at Cuttack in the Deccan (iv. 46), or at least was a part of the town adjoining that ancient fortress.

c. 1567.—"Citta di Cathaca."—Orario Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 392. [Catecha, in Hakl. ii. 358.]

[c. 1590.—"Attack on the Indus is called Atak Benarus in contra distinction to Katak Benarus in Orissa at the opposite extremity of the Empire."—Ata, ed. Jarrett, ii. 311.]

1633.—"The 30 of April we set forward in the Morning for the City of Cotecha (it is a city of seven miles in compass, and it standeth a mile from Malcandy where the Court is kept."—Brutus, in Hakl. v. 49.

1726.—"Cuttak."—Valentya, v. 158.

CUTTANEE, a. Some kind of piece-goods, apparently either of silk or mixed silk and cotton. Kuttan, Pera, is flax or linen cloth. This is perhaps the word. [Kattan is now used in India for the waste selva in silk weaving, which is sold to Patwas, and used for stringing ornaments, such as joshans (armlets of gold or silver beads) bāsābands (armlets with folding bands), &c. (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 66).] Cuttanees appear in Milburn's list of Calcutta piece-goods.

[1596.—"Cotonias, which are like canvas."—Lincolnton, Hak. Soc. i. 60.]

[1648.—"Contentia." See under AL-CATIF.

[1673.—"Cuttanee breeches." See under ATLAS.

[1690.—" . . . rich Silks, such as Atlases, Cuttanees . . ."—See under ALLEJA.

[1734.—"They manufacture . . . in cotton and silk called Cuttanees."—A. Hamilton, i. 126; ed. 1744.]

CUTTRY. See KHUTTRY.

CYRUS, SYRAS, SARUS, &c. A common corruption of Hind. sāras, [Skt. sarasa, the 'lake bird,'] or (corruptly) sārhas, the name of the great gray crane, Grus Antigone, L., generally found in pairs, held almost sacred in some parts of India, and whose "fine trumpet-like call, uttered when alarmed or on the wing, can be heard a couple of miles off" (Serdon). [The British soldier calls the bird a "Serious," and is fond of shooting him for the pot.]

their long throats with great deepatch."—Williamson, Or. Field Sports, 27.

[1809.—"Sarus." See under COOLUNG.]

1813.—In Forbes's Or. Mem. (ii. 277 seq. ; 2nd ed. i. 502 seq.), there is a curious story of a Cyrus or Sarus (as he writes it) which Forbes had tamed in India, and which nine years afterwards recognised its master when he visited General Conway's menagerie at Park Place near Henley.

1840.—"Bands of gobbling pelicans" (see this word, probably ADJUTANTS are meant) "and groups of tall cyruses in their half-Quaker, half-lancer plumage, consulted and conferred together, in seeming perplexity as to the nature of our intentions."—Mrs. Macbride, Morins and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, i. 106.

D

DABUL, n.p. Dabhol. In the later Middle Ages a famous port of the Konkan, often coupled with Ohoul (q.v.), carrying on extensive trade with the West of Asia. It lies in the modern dist. of Ratnagiri, in lat. 17° 34', on the north bank of the Anjanwel or Vashishti R. In some maps (e.g. A. Arrowsmith's of 1816, long the standard map of India), and in W. Hamilton's Gazetteer, it is confounded with Dāpoli, 12 m. north, and not a seaport.

c. 1475.—"Dabul is also a very extensive seaport, where many horses are brought from Mysore,* Rabast [Arabistan? i.e. Arabia], Khorassan, Turkistan, Nephostan."—Nikita, p. 20. "It is a very large town, the great meeting-place for all nations living along the coast of India and of Ethiopia."—Ibid. 30.

1502.—"The gale abated, and the caravels reached land at Dabul, where they rigged their lateen sails, and mounted their artillery."—Correa, Three Voyages of V. da Gama, Hak. Soc. 308.

1510.—"Having seen Coval and its customs, I went to another city, distant from it two days journey, which is called Dabul. . . . There are Moorish merchants here in very great numbers."—Varthema, 114.

* Mysore is nonsense. As suggested by Sir J. Campbell in the Bombay Gazetteer, Mer (Egypt) is probably the word.

1516.—“This Dabul has a very good harbour, where there always congregate many Moorish ships from various ports, and especially from Mekkah, Aden, and Ormuz with horses, and from Cambay, Diu, and the Malabar country.”—Barbosa, 72.

1554.—“23d Voyage, from Dābul to Aden.”—The Mokit, in J. As. Soc. Beng., v. 464.

1572.—See Camões, x. 72.

[c. 1665.—“The King of Bijapur has three good ports in this kingdom: these are Rajapur, Dabhol, and Kareputtun.”—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 181 seq.]

DACCA, n.p. Properly Dhākā, [‘the wood of dhāk (see DHAWK) trees’; the Imp. Gaz. suggests Dhakeswarī, ‘the concealed goddess’]. A city in the east of Bengal, once of great importance, especially in the later Mahommedan history; famous also for the “Dacca muslins” woven there, the annual advances for which, prior to 1801, are said to have amounted to £250,000. [Taylor, Descr. and Hist. Account of the Cotton Manufacture of Dacca in Bengal]. Dāka is throughout Central Asia applied to all muslins imported through Kabul.

c. 1612.—“... liberos Osmanis assecutus vivos cepit, eosque cum elephantis et omnibus thesauris defuncti, post quam Daack Bengalae metropolim est reversus, misit ad regem.”—De Laet, quoted by Blochmann, Atn., i. 521.

[c. 1617.—“Dekaka” in Sir T. Roe’s List, Hak. Soc. ii. 538.]

c. 1660.—“The same Robbers took Sultan-Sujah at Daka, to carry him away in their Galeasses to Rakan. . . .”—Bernier, E.T. 55; [ed. Constable, 109].

1665.—“Daca is a great Town, that extends itself only in length; every one coveting to have an House by the Ganges side. The length . . . is above two leagues. . . . These Houses are properly no more than paltry Huts built up with Bambouc’s, and daub’d over with fat Earth.”—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 55; [ed. Ball, i. 128].

1682.—“The only expedient left was for the Agent to go himself in person to the Nabob and Duan at Decca.”—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 33].

DACOIT, DACOO, s. Hind. dakait, dākāyat, dākū; a robber belonging to an armed gang. The term, being current in Bengal, got into the Penal Code. By law, to constitute dacoity, there must be five or more in the gang committing the crime. Beames derives the word from dāknd, ‘to shout,’ a sense not in Shakespeare’s Dict. [It is to be found in Platts, and Fallon gives it as used in E. H. It appears to be connected with Skt. dashta, ‘pressed together.’]

1810.—“Decoits, or water-robbers.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 396.

1812.—“Dacoits, a species of depredators who infest the country in gangs.”—Fifth Report, p. 9.

1817.—“The crime of dacoity” (that is, robbery by gangs), says Sir Henry Strachey, “. . . has, I believe, increased greatly since the British administration of justice.”—Mill, H. of B. I., v. 466.

1834.—“It is a conspiracy! a false warrant!—they are Dakoos! Dakoos!!”—The Baboo, ii. 202.

1872.—“Daroga! Why, what has he come here for? I have not heard of any dacoity or murder in the Village.”—Gorinda Samanta, i. 264.

DADNY, s. H. dādnī, [P. dādan, ‘to give’]; an advance made to a craftsman, a weaver, or the like, by one who trades in the goods produced.

1678.—“Wee met with Some trouble About y^e Investment of Taffaties wch hath Continued ever Since, Soe y^t wee had not been able to give out any daudne on Muxadavad Side many weauours absenting themselves. . . .”—MS. Letter of 3d June, from Cassumbazar Factory, in India Office.

1683.—“Chuttermull and Deepchund, two Cassumbazar merchants this day assured me Mr. Charnock gives out all his new Sicca Rupees for Dadny at 2 per cent., and never gives the Company credit for more than 1½ rupee—by which he gains and putts in his own pocket Rupees ¾ per cent. of all the money he pays, which amounts to a great Summe in ye Yeare: at least £1,000 sterling.”—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 121, also see i. 83].

1748.—“The Sets being all present at the Board inform us that last year they dissented to the employment of Fillick Chund, Gosserain, Occore, and Otteram, they being of a different caste, and consequently they could not do business with them, upon which they refused Dadney, and having the same objection to make this year, they propose taking their shares of the Dadney.”—Pt. William Cons., May 23. In Long, p. 9.

1772.—“I observe that the Court of Directors have ordered the gomastahs to be withdrawn, and the investment to be provided by Dadney merchants.”—Warren Hastings to J. Purling, in Gleig, i. 227.

DALOYET, DELOYET, s. An armed attendant and messenger, the same as a Peon. H. dhalait, dhaldyat, from dhal, 'a shield.' The word is never now used in Bengal and Upper India.

1772.—"Suppose every farmer in the province was enjoined to maintain a number of good serviceable bullocks . . . obliged to furnish the Government with them on a requisition made to him by the Collector in writing (not by sepoy, delects (sic), or hercarras" (see HURCARRA).—*W. 1809.—"As it was very hot, I immediately employed my delogets to keep off the crowd."—Id. Valentia, i. 339. The word here and elsewhere in that book is a misprint for deloyets.

DAM, s. H. dām. Originally an actual copper coin, regarding which we find the following in the Āin, i. 31, ed. Blochmann:—"1. The Dām weighs 5 tānks, i.e. 1 tolah, 8 māshas, and 7 surkhs; it is the fortieth part of a rupee. At first this coin was called Paisah, and also Bahloli; now it is known under this name (dām). On one side the place is given where it was struck, on the other the date. For the purpose of calculation, the dām is divided into 25 parts, each of which is called a jētal. This imaginary division is only used by accountants.

"2. The adhelah is half of a dām.
3. The Pāulah is a quarter of a dām.
4. The damrī is an eighth of a dām."

It is curious that Akbar's revenues were registered in this small currency, viz. in laks of dāms. We may compare the Portuguese use of reis [see REAS].

The tendency of denominations of coins is always to sink in value. The jētal [see JEETUL], which had become an imaginary money of account in Akbar's time, was, in the 14th century, a real coin, which Mr. E. Thomas, chief of Indian numismatologists, has unearthed [see Chron. Pathan Kings, 231]. And now the dām itself is imaginary. According to Elliot the people of the N.W.P. not long ago calculated 25 dāms to the paish, which would be 1600 to a rupee. Carnegy gives the Oudh popular currency table as :

26 kauris	=	1 damrī
1 damrī	=	3 dām
20 "	=	1 dnd
25 dām	=	1 pice.

But the Calcutta Glossary says the dām is in Bengal reckoned $\frac{1}{8}$ of an dnd, i.e. 320 to the rupee. ["Most things of little value, here as well as in Bhagalpur (writing of Behar) are sold by an imaginary money called Takā, which is here reckoned equal to two Paysas. There are also imaginary monies called Chaddām and Damrī; the former is equal to 1 Paysa or 25 cowries, the latter is equal to one-eighth of a Paysa" (Buchanan, Eastern Ind. i. 382 seq.)]. We have not in our own experience met with any reckoning of dāms. In the case of the damrī the denomination has increased instead of sinking in relation to the dām. For above we have the damrī = 3 dāms, or according to Elliot (Beames, ii. 296) = $3\frac{1}{4}$ dāms, instead of $\frac{1}{8}$ of a dām as in Akbar's time. But in reality the damrī's absolute value has remained the same. For by Carnegy's table 1 rupee or 16 anas would be equal to 320 damrīs, and by the Āin, 1 rupee = 40×8 damrīs = 320 damrīs. Damrī is a common enough expression for the infinitesimal in coin, and one has often heard a Briton in India say: "No, I won't give a dumree!" with but a vague notion what a damrī meant, as in Scotland we have heard, "I won't give a plack," though certainly the speaker could not have stated the value of that ancient coin. And this leads to the suggestion that a like expression, often heard from coarse talkers in England as well as in India, originated in the latter count that whatever profanity there may be in the animus, there is none in the etymology, when such an one blurts out "I don't care a dām!" i.e. in other words, "I don't care a brass farthing!"

If the Gentle Reader deems this a far-fetched suggestion, let us back it by a second. We find in Chaucer (The Miller's Tale):

"—ne raught he not a kers," which means, "he recked not a cress" (ne flocci quidem); an expression which is also found in Piers Plowman:

"Wisdom and witte is nowe not worthe a kerse."

And this we doubt not has given rise to that other vulgar expression, "I don't care a curse";—curiously parallel in its corruption to that in illustration of which we quote it.

[This suggestion about dām was made by a writer in Asiat. Res., ed. 1803, vii. 461: "This word was perhaps in use even among our forefathers, and may innocently account for the expression 'not worth a fig,' or a dam, especially if we recollect that ba-dam, an almond, is to-day current in some parts of India as small money. Might not dried figs have been employed anciently in the same way, since the Arabic word *fooloo*s, a halfpenny, also denotes a cassia bean, and the root *ful*s means the scale of a fish. Mankind are so apt, from a natural depravity, that 'flesh is heir to,' in their use of words, to pervert them from their original sense, that it is not a convincing argument against the present conjecture our using the word curse in vulgar language in lieu of dam." The N.E.D. disposes of the matter: "The suggestion is ingenious, but has no basis in fact." In a letter to Mr. Ellis, Macaulay writes: "How they settle the matter I care not, as the Duke says, one twopenny damn"; and Sir G. Trevelyan notes: "It was the Duke of Wellington who invented this oath, so disproportioned to the greatness of its author." (Life, ed. 1878, ii. 257.)]

1628.—"The revenue of all the territories under the Emperors of Delhi amounts, according to the Royal registers, to 6 arbs and 30 krors of dāms. One arb is equal to 100 krors (a kror being 10,000,000), and a hundred krors of dāms are equal to 2 krors and 50 lacs of rupees."—Muhammad Sharif Hanijī, in Elliot, vii. 138.

c. 1840.—"Charles Greville saw the Duke soon after, and expressing the pleasure he had felt in reading his speech (commending the conduct of Capt. Charles Elliot in China), added that, however, many of the party were angry with it; to which the Duke replied,—'I know they are, and I don't care a damn. I have no time to do what is right.'

"A twopenny damn was, I believe, the form usually employed by the Duke, as an expression of value: but on the present occasion he seems to have been less precise."—Autobiography of Sir Henry Taylor, i. 296. The term referred to seems curiously to preserve an unconscious tradition of the pecuniary, or what the idiotical jargon of our time calls the 'monetary,' estimation contained in the expression.

1881.—"A Bavarian printer, jealous of the influence of capital, said that 'Cladstone baid millions of money to the beeble to fote for him, and Beegonsfeel would not bay them a tam, so they fote for Cladstone.'"—A Socialistic Picnic, in St. James's Gazette, July 6.

[1900.—"There is not, I dare wager, a single bishop who cares one 'twopenny-halfpenny dime' for any of that plenteousness for himself."—H. Bell, Vicar of Muncester, in Times, Aug. 31.]

DAMAN, n.p. Damān, one of the old settlements of the Portuguese which they still retain, on the coast of Guzerat, about 100 miles north of Bombay; written by them Damão.

1554.—". . . the pilots said: 'We are here between Diu and Daman; if the ship sinks here, not a soul will escape; we must make sail for the shore.'—Sidi 'Alī, 80.

[1607-8.—"Then that by no means or ships or men can goe saffellie to Suratt, or theare expect any quiett trade for the many dangers likelie to happen vnto them by the Portugals Cheef Comanders of Diu and Demon and places there aboute. . . ."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 247.]

DAMANI, s. Applied to a kind of squall. (See ELEPHANTA.)

DAMMER, s. This word is applied to various resins in different parts of India, chiefly as substitutes for pitch. The word appears to be Malayo-Javanese damar, used generically for resins, a class of substances the origin of which is probably often uncertain. [Mr. Skeat notes that the Malay damar means rosin and a torch made of rosin, the latter consisting of a regular cylindrical case, made of bamboo or other suitable material, filled to the top with rosin and ignited.] To one of the dammer-producing trees in the Archipelago the name Dammara alba, Rumph. (N. O. Coniferae), has been given, and this furnishes the 'East India Dammer' of English varnish-makers. In Burma the dammer used is derived from at least three different genera of the N. O. Dipterocarpeae; in Bengal it is derived from the sdl tree (see SAUL-WOOD) (Shorea robusta) and other Shoreae, as well as by importation from transmarine sources. In S. India "white dammer," "Dammer Pitch," or Piney resin, is the produce of Vateria indica, and "black dammer" of Canarium strictum; in Cutch the dammer used is stated by Lieut. Leech (Bombay Selections, No. xv. p. 215-216) to be made from chandrūz (or chandras = copal) boiled with an equal quantity of oil. This is probably Fryer's 'rosin taken out of the sea' (infra). [On the other hand Mr. Pringle (Diary, &c., Fort St. George, 1st ser. iv. 178) quotes Crawford (Malay Archip. i. 455): (Dammer) "exudes through the bark, and is either found adhering to the trunk and branches in large lumps, or in masses on the ground, under the trees. As these often grow near the sea-side or on banks of rivers, the damar is frequently floated away and collected at different places as drift"; and adds: "The dammer used for caulking the masula boats at Madras when Fryer was there, may have been, and probably was, imported from the Archipelago, and the fact that the resin was largely collected as drift may have been mentioned in answer to his enquiries."] Some of the Malay dammer also seems, from Major M'Nair's statement, to be, like copal, fossil. [On this Mr. Skeat says: "It is true that it is sometimes dug up out of the ground, possibly because it may form on the roots of certain trees, or because a great mass of it will fall and partially bury itself in the ground by its own weight, but I have never heard of its being found actually fossilised, and I should question the fact seriously."]

The word is sometimes used in India [and by the Malays, see above] for 'a torch,' because torches are formed of rags dipped in it. This is perhaps the use which accounts for Haex's explanation below.

1584. — "Demnar (for demmar) from Siacca and Blinton" (i.e. Siak and Billiton). — Barret, in Hakl. ii. 43.

1631. — In Haex's Malay Vocabulary: "Damar, Lumen quod accenditur."

1673. — "The Boat is not strengthened with Knee-Timbers as ours are, the bended Planks are sowed together with Rope-yarn of the Cocoe, and calked with Dammar (a sort of Rosin taken out of the sea)."—Fryer, 37.

"The long continued Current from the Inland Parts (at Surat) through the vast Wildernesses of huge Woods and Forests, wafts great Rafts of Timber for Shipping and Building: and Damar for Pitch, the finest sented Bitumen (if it be not a gum or Rosin) I ever met with."—Ibid. 121.

1727. — "Damar, a gum that is used for making Pitch and Tar for the use of Shipping."—A. Hamilton, ii. 73; [ed. 1744, ii. 72].

c. 1755. "A Demar-Boy (Torch-boy)." — Ives, 50.

1878. — "This dammar, which is the general Malayan name for resin, is dug out of the forests by the Malays, and seems to be the fossilised juices of former growth of jungle."—McNair, Perak, &c., 188.

1885. — "The other great industry of the place (in Sumatra) is dammar collecting. This substance, as is well known, is the resin which exudes from notches made in various species of coniferous and dipterocarpous trees . . . out of whose stem . . . the native cuts large notches up to a height of 40 or 50 feet from the ground. The tree is then left for 3 or 4 months when, if it be a very healthy one, sufficient dammar will have exuded to make it worth while collecting; the yield may then be as much as 94 Amsterdam pounds."—H. O. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 135.

DANA, s. H. ddna, literally 'grain,' and therefore the exact translation of gram in its original sense (q.v.). It is often used in Bengal as synonymous with gram, thus: "Give the horse his dāna." We find it also in this specific way by an old traveller:

1616. — "A kind of graine called Donna, somewhat like our Pease, which they boyle, and when it is cold give them mingled with course Sugar, and twise or thrise in the Weeke, Butter to scour their Bodies." — Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

DANCING-GIRL, s. This, or among the older Anglo-Indians, Dancing-Wench, was the representative of the (Portuguese Bailadeira) Bayadère, or Nautch-girl (q.v.), also Cunchunea. In S. India dancing-girls are all Hindus, [and known as Devaddai or Bhogam-ddai;] in N. India they are both Hindu, called Rdmjani (see RUM-JOHNNY), and Mussulman, called Kanchanī (see CUNCHUNEE). In Dutch the phrase takes a very plain-spoken form, see quotation from Valentijn; [others are equally explicit, e.g. Sir T. Roe (Hak. Soc. i. 145) and P. della Valle, ii. 282.]

1606.—See description by Gouvea, f. 39.

1673.—“After supper they treated us with the Dancing Wenches, and good soops of Brandy and Delf Beer, till it was late enough.”—Fryer, 152.

1701.—“The Governor conducted the Nabob into the Consultation Room . . . after dinner they were diverted with the Dancing Wenches.”—In Wheeler, i. 377.

1726.—“Wat de dans-Hoeren (anders Devataschi (Deva-dāsi) . . . genaamd, en an de Goden hunner Pagoden als getrouwd) belangd.”—Valentijn, Chor. 54.

1763-78.—“Mandelslow tells a story of a Nabob who cut off the heads of a set of dancing girls . . . because they did not come to his palace on the first summons.”—Orme, i. 28 (ed. 1803).

1789.—“. . . dancing girls who display amazing agility and grace in all their motions.”—Munro, Narrative, 73.

c. 1812.—“I often sat by the open window, and there, night after night, I used to hear the songs of the unhappy dancing girls, accompanied by the sweet yet melancholy music of the cithāra.”—Mrs. Sherwood's Autobiog. 423.

[1813.—Forbes gives an account of the two classes of dancing girls, those who sing and dance in private houses, and those attached to temples.—Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 61.]

1815.—“Dancing girls were once numerous in Persia; and the first poets of that country have celebrated the beauty of their persons and the melody of their voices.”—Malcolm, H. of Persia, ii. 587.

1838.—“The Maharajah sent us in the evening a new set of dancing girls, as they were called, though they turned out to be twelve of the ugliest old women I ever saw.”—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh, 154.

1843.—“We decorated the Temples of the false gods. We provided the dancing girls. We gilded and painted the images to which our ignorant subjects bowed down.”—Macaulay's Speech on the Somnauth Proclamation.

DANDY, s.

(a). A boatman. The term is peculiar to the Gangetic rivers. H. and Beng. dāndī, from dānd or dand, ‘a staff, an oar.’

1685.—“Our Dandees (or boatmen) boyled their rice, and we supped here.”—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 175].

1763.—“The oppressions of your officers were carried to such a length that they put a stop to all business, and plundered and seized the Dandies and Mangies’ [see MANJEE] vessel.”—W. Hastings to the Nawab, in Long, 347.

1809.—“Two naked dandys paddling at the head of the vessel.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 67.

1824.—“I am indeed often surprised to observe the difference between my dandees (who are nearly the colour of a black teapot) and the generality of the peasants whom we meet.”—Bp. Heber, i. 149 (ed. 1844).

— (b). A kind of ascetic who carries a staff. Same etymology. See Solvyns, who gives a plate of such an one.

[1828.—“. . . the Dandi is distinguished by carrying a small Dand, or wand, with several processes or projections from it, and a piece of cloth dyed with red ochre, in which the Brahmanical cord is supposed to be enshrined, attached to it.”—H. H. Wilson, Sketch of the Religious Sects of the Hindus, ed. 1861, i. 193.]

— (c). H. same spelling, and same etymology. A kind of vehicle used in the Himālaya, consisting of a strong cloth slung like a hammock to a bamboo staff, and carried by two (or more) men. The traveller can either sit sideways, or lie on his back. It is much the same as the Malabar muncheel (q.v.), [and P. della Valle describes a similar vehicle which he says the Portuguese call Rete (Hak. Soc. i. 183)].

[1875.—“The nearest approach to travelling in a dandi I can think of, is sitting in a half-reefed top-sail in a storm, with the head and shoulders above the yard.”—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 103.]

1876.—“In the lower hills when she did not walk she travelled in a dandy.”—Kinloch, Large Game Shooting in Thibet, 2nd S., p. vii.

DANGUR, n.p. H. Dhāngar, the name by which members of various tribes of Chūtiā Nāgpūr, but especially of the Orāons, are generally known when they go out to distant provinces to seek employment as labourers (“coolies”). A very large proportion of those who emigrate to the tea-plantations of E. India, and also to Mauritius and other colonies, belong to the Orāon tribe. The etymology of the term Dhāngar is doubtful. The late Gen. Dalton says: “It is a word that from its apparent derivation (dāng or dhāng, ‘a hill’) may mean any hillman; but amongst several tribes of the Southern tributary Mahāls, the terms Dhāngar and Dhāngarin mean the youth of the two sexes, both in highland and lowland villages, and it cannot be considered the national designation of any particular tribe." (Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal, 245) (and see Risley, Tribes and Castes, i. 219).

DARCHEENEE, a. P. dar-chini, 'China-stick,' i.e. cinnamon.

1563. — "... The people of Ormus, because this bark was brought for sale there by those who had come from China, called it dar-chini, which in Persian means 'wood of China,' and so they sold it in Alexandria. . . ."—Garcia, f. 59-60.

1621. — "As for cinnamon which you wrote was called by the Arabs dar-sini, I assure you that the dar-sini, as the Arabs say, or dar-chini as the Persians and Turks call it, is nothing but our ordinary cassia."—P. della Valle, ii. 206-7.

DARJEELING, DĀRJĪLING, n.p. A famous sanitarium in the Eastern Himalaya, the cession of which was purchased from the Raja of Sikkim in 1835; a tract largely added to by annexation in 1849, following on an outrage committed by the Sikkim Minister in imprisoning Dr. (afterwards Sir) Joseph Hooker and the late Dr. A. Campbell, Superintendent of Darjeeling. The sanitarium stands at 6500 to 7500 feet above the sea. The popular Tibetan spelling of the name is, according to Jñeshcke, rDor-rye-glin, 'Land of the Dorje,' i.e. 'of the Adamant or thunderbolt,' the ritual sceptre of the Lamas. But 'according to several titles of books in the Petersburg list of MSS. it ought properly to be spelt Dar-rgyas-glin' (Tib. Eng. Dict. p. 287).

DARŪGA, a. P. and H. darogha. This word seems to be originally Mongol (see Kovalevsky's Dict. No. 1672). In any case it is one of those terms brought by the Mongol hosts from the far East. In their nomenclature it was applied to a Governor of a province or city, and in this sense it continued to be used under Timur and his immediate successors. But it is the tendency of official titles, as of denominations of coin, to descend in value; and that of darogha has in later days been bestowed on a variety of humbler persons. Wilson defines the word thus: "The chief native officer in various departments under the native government, a superintendent, a manager; but in later times he is especially the head of a police, customs, or excise station." Under the British Police system, from 1793 to 1862-63, the Darogha was a local Chief of Police, or Head Constable, [and this is still the popular title in the N.W.P. for the officer in charge of a Police Station.] The word occurs in the sense of a Governor in a Mongol inscription, of the year 1314, found in the Chinese Province of Shensi, which is given by Pauthier in his Manc. Pol., p. 773. The Mongol Governor of Moscow, during a part of the Tartar domination in Russia, is called in the old Russian Chronicles Doroga (see Hammer, Golden Horde, 284). And according to the same writer the word appears in a Byzantine writer (unnamed) as Δαργας (ibid. 238-9). The Byzantine form and the passages below of 1404 and 1665 seem to imply some former variation in pronunciation. But Clavijo has also darroga in § clii.

c. 1220. — "Tuli Khan named as Darugha at Merv one called Barman, and himself marched upon Nishapur."—Abulghazi, by Demaisson, 135.

1404. — "And in this city (Tauris) there was a kinsman of the Emperor as Magistrate thereof, whom they call Darroga, and he treated the said Ambassadors with much respect."—Clavijo, § lxxxii. (Comp. Mart-ham, 90.)

1441. — "... I reached the city of Kerman. . . . The daroghah (governor) the Emir Hadji Mohamed Kamschirin, being then absent. . . ."—Abderrazzak, in India in the XVth Cent., p. 5.

c. 1590. — "The officers and servants attached to the Imperial Stables. 1. The Atlegi. . . . 2. The Daroghah. There is one appointed for each stable. . . ."—Alia, tr. Blochmann, i. 137.

1621. — "The 10th of October, the darogā, or Governor of Ispahan, Mir Abdulaasim, the King's son-in-law, who, as was afterwards seen in that charge of his, was a downright madman. . . ."—P. della Valle, ii. 166.

1665. — "There stands a Daroga, upon each side of the River, who will not suffer any person to pass without leave."—Tavernier, E.T., ii. 52; [ed. Hall, i. 117].

1673. "The Droger, or Mayor of the City, or Captain of the Watch, or the Rounds; It is his duty to preside with the Main Guard a-nights before the Palace-gates."—Fryer, 339.

1673.—“The Droger being Master of his Science, persists; what comfort can I reap from your Disturbance?”—Fryer, 389.

1682.—“I received a letter from Mr. Hill at Rajemaul advising ye Droga of ye Mint would not obey a Copy, but required at least a sight of ye Originall.”—Hedges, Diary, Dec. 14; [Hak. Soc. i. 57].

c. 1781.—“About this time, however, one day being very angry, the Darogha, or master of the mint, presented himself, and asked the Nawaub what device he would have struck on his new copper coinage. Hydur, in a violent passion, told him to stamp an obscene figure on it.”—Hydur Naik, tr. by Miles, 488.

1812.—“Each division is guarded by a Darogha, with an establishment of armed men.”—Fifth Report, 44.

DATCHIN, s. This word is used in old books of Travel and Trade for a steelyard employed in China and the Archipelago. It is given by Leyden as a Malay word for ‘balance,’ in his Comp. Vocab. of Barma, Malay and Thai, Serampore, 1810. It is also given by Crawford as dachin, a Malay word from the Javanese. There seems to be no doubt that in Peking dialect ch’eng is ‘to weigh,’ and also ‘steelyard’; that in Amoy a small steelyard is called ch’in; and that in Canton dialect the steelyard is called t’okch’ing. Some of the Dictionaries also give ta’chéng, ‘large steelyard.’ Datchin or dotchin may therefore possibly be a Chinese term; but considering how seldom traders’ words are really Chinese, and how easily the Chinese monosyllables lend themselves to plausible combinations, it remains probable that the Canton word was adopted from foreigners. It has sometimes occurred to us that it might have been adopted from Achin (d’Achin); see the first quotation. [The N.E.D., following Prof. Giles, gives it as a corruption of the Cantonese name toh-ch’ing (in Court dialect to-ch’éng) from toh ‘to measure,’ ch’ing, ‘to weigh.’ Mr. Skeat notes: “The standard Malay is daching, the Javanese dachin (v. Klinkert, s.v.). He gives the word as of Chinese origin, and the probability is that the English word is from the Malay, which in its turn was borrowed from the Chinese. The final suggestion, d’Achin, seems out of the question.] Favre’s Malay Dict. gives (in French) “daxing (Ch. pa-tchen), steelyard, balance,” also “ber-daxing, to weigh,” and Javan. “daxin, a weight of 100 kātis.” Gericke’s

Javan. Dict. also gives “datsin-Picol,” with a reference to Chinese. [With reference to Crawford’s statement quoted above, Mr. Pringle (Diary, Ft. St. George, 1st ser. iv. 179) notes that Crawford had elsewhere adopted the view that the yard and the designation of it originated in China and passed from thence to the Archipelago (Malay Archip. i. 275). On the whole, the Chinese origin seems most probable.]

1554.—At Malacca. “The baar of the great Dachem contains 200 cates, each cate weighing two arratels, 4 ounces, 5 eighths, 15 grains, 3 tenths. . . . The Baar of the little Dachem contains 200 cates; each cate weighing two arratels.”—A. Nunes, 39.

[1684-5.—“. . . he replied That he was now Content yt ye Honble Company should solely enjoy ye Customes of ye Place on condition yt ye People of ye Place be free from all dutys & Customes and yt ye Profit of ye Dutchin be his. . . .”—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 12.]

1696.—“For their Dotchin and Ballance they use that of Japan.”—Bowyear’s Journal at Cochin-China, in Dalrymple, O. R. i. 88.

1711.—“Never weigh your Silver by their Dotchins, for they have usually two Pair, one to receive, the other to pay by.”—Lockyer, 113.

“In the Dotchin, an expert Weigher will cheat two or three per cent. by placing or shaking the Weight, and minding the Motion of the Pole only.”—Ibid. 115.

“. . . every one has a Chopchin and Dotchin to cut and weigh silver.”—Ibid. 141.

1748.—“These scales are made after the manner of the Roman balance, or our English Stilliards, called by the Chinese Litang, and by us Dot-chin.”—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748, &c., London, 1762, p. 324. The same book has, in a short vocabulary, at p. 265, “English scales or dodgeons . . . Chinese Litang.”

DATURA, s. This Latin-like name is really Skt. dhattūra, and so has passed into the derived vernaculars. The widely-spread Datura Stramonium, or Thorn-apple, is well known over Europe, but is not regarded as indigenous to India; though it appears to be wild in the Himālaya from Kashmīr to Sikkim. The Indian species, from which our generic name has been borrowed, is Datura alba, Nees (see Hanbury and Flückiger, 415) (D. fastuosa, L.). Garcia de Orta mentions the common use of this by thieves in India. Its effect on the victim was to produce temporary alienation of mind, and laughter, permitting the thief unopposed. He describes his practice in dealing with such which he had always found such Datura was also often given practical joke, whence the Port called it Burladora ('Joker'). Orta strongly disapproves of pranks. The criminal use of it by a class of Thugs is rife in our time. One of the present writs judicially convicted many, returning with fortunes from colonies often become the victims of such crimes. [See details in Ind. Med. Jurispr. 179 seqq.]

1563.—"Maidervast. A black of the house has been giving datur mistresses: she stole the keys, and that my mistress had on her neck her jewel box, and has made off with it. It would be a kindness to her help."—Harcu, Colloquius, l. 83.

1578.—"They call this plant Malabar tongue un mata raja [amma . . . in Canarese Datyro. . .]."—Costa, 81.

c. 1580.—"Nascitur et . . . Datura Indorum, quarum ex seminibus Latrones bellaria parant, quas in caravanas mercatoribus exhibentes largumque somnum, profundumque inducentes aurum gummasque surripiunt et abeunt."—Prosper Alpianus, Pt. I. 180-1.

1596.—"They name [have] likewise an herbe called Dentroa, which beareth a seede, wherof bruising out the saye, they put it into a cup, or other vessell, and give it to their husbands, eyther in wine or drinke, and presently therewith the Man is as though hee were half out of his wite."—Linachden, 60; [Hak. Soc. i. 209].

1608-10.—"Mais ainsi de mesme les femmes quand elles scauent que leur maris en entretionnent quelqu'autre, elles s'en desfont par poison ou autrement, et se servent fort à cela de la semence de Datura, qui est d'une estrange vertu. C'est Datura ou Duroa, espèce de Stramonium, est une plante grande et haute qui porte des fleurs blanches en Campan, comme le Campele, mais plus grande."—Mocquet, l'ouvrage, 312.

[1610.—"In other parts of the Indies it is called Dutroa."—Pyrard de Larat, Hak. Soc. ii. 111.

[1621.—"Garcias ab Horto . . . makes mention of an herbe called Datura, which, if it be eaten, for 24 hours following, takes away all sense of grief, makes them incline to laughter and mirth."—Burton, Anatomy of Mel., Pt. 2. Sec. 5 Mem. l. Subs. 5.]

1673.—"Dutry, the deadliest sort of Solanum (Nidarium) or Nightshade."—Fryer, 32.

Hedibras, Pt. iii. Canto 1.

—"And many of them (the Moors) liberty of mixing Dutra and Water to drink . . . which will intoxicate o Madness."—Orington, 236.

—"The datura that grows in every India."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 135.

—"Datura. This plant, a native of India, and of Abyssinia, more century ago had spread as a naturalist through every country in Europe Sweden, Lapland, and Norway, the aid of gipsy quacks, who used it as anti-spasmodic, or for more able purposes."—R. Brown in Geng. v. i. 371. Note.—The statements from Hambury and Flückiger in the text of this article disagree with this as to the origin of the European and the identity of the Indian plant. As to the birthplace of the species of the genus remain in fact mined. [See the discussion in Wat. i. iii. 29 seqq.]

DATURA, YELLOW, and YELLOW THISTLE. These are Bombay names for the Argemone mexicana, fico del inferno of Spaniards, introduced accidentally from America, and now an abundant and pestilent weed all over India.

DAWK, s. H. and Muhr. dak, 'Post,' i.e. properly transport by relays of men and horses, and thence 'the mail' or letter-post, as well as any arrangements for travelling, or for transmitting articles by such relays. The institution was no doubt imitated from the barid, or post, established throughout the empire of the Caliphs by Mo'awia. The barid is itself connected with the Latin verēdus, and verēdinus.

1310.—"It was the practice of the Sultan (Alā-uddīn) when he sent an army on an expedition to establish posts on the road, wherever posts could be maintained. . . . At every half or quarter kas runners were posted . . . the securing of accurate intelligence from the court on one side and the army on the other was a great public benefit."—Zā-uddin Barī, in Elliot, iii. 203.

c. 1340.—"The foot-post (in India) is thus arranged: every mile is divided into three equal intervals which are called Dāwah, which is as much as to say 'the third part of a mile' (the mile itself being called in India Koruk). At every third of a mile there is a village well inhabited, outside of [1568.—“No Christian shall call an infidel Daya at the time of her labour.”—Archic. Port. Orient. fasc. iv. p. 25.]

1578.—“The whole plant is commonly known and used by the Dayas, or as we call them comadres” (“gossips,” midwives).—Acosta, Tractado, 282.

1613.—“The medicines of the Malays . . . ordinarily are roots of plants . . . horns and claws and stones, which are used by their leeches, and for the most part by Dayas, which are women physicians, excellent herbalists, apprentices of the schools of Java Major.”—Godinho de Eredia, f. 37.

1782.—In a Table of monthly Wages at Calcutta, we have:—

“Dy (Wet-nurse) 10 Rs.”

India Gazette, Oct. 12.

1808.—“If the bearer hath not strength what can the Dace (midwife) do!”—Guzerati Proverb, in Drummond's Illustrations, 1803.

1810.—“The Dhye is more generally an attendant upon native ladies.”—Williamson, V.M. i. 341.

1883.—“. . . the ‘dyah’ or wet-nurse is looked on as a second mother, and usually provided for for life.”—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.

[1887.—“I was much interested in the Dhais (‘midwives’) class.”—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life in India, 337.]

DEANER, s. This is not Anglo-Indian, but it is a curious word of English Thieves’ cant, signifying ‘a shilling.’ It seems doubtful whether it comes from the Italian danaro or the Arabic dinār (q.v.); both eventually derived from the Latin denarius.

DEBAL, n.p. See DIUL-SIND.

DECCAN, n.p. and adj. Hind. Dakhin, Dakkhin, Dakhan, Dakkhan; dakkhina, the Prakr. form of Skt. dakshina, ‘the South’; originally ‘on the right hand’; compare dexter, δεξιός. The Southern part of India, the Peninsula, and especially the Table-land between the Eastern and Western Ghauts. It has been often applied also, politically, to specific States in that part of India, e.g. by the Portuguese in the 16th century to the Mahommedan Kingdom of Bījapur, and in more recent times by ourselves to the State of Hyderabad. In Western India the Deccan stands opposed to the Concan (q.v.), i.e. the table-land of the interior to the maritime plain; in Upper India the Deccan stands opposed to Hindūstān, i.e. roundly speaking, the country south of the Nerbudda to that north of it. The term frequently occurs in the Skt. books in the form dakshinpatha (‘Southern region,’ whence the Greek form in our first quotation), and dakshindtya (‘Southern’—qualifying some word for ‘country’). So, in the Pañchatantra: “There is in the Southern region (dakshindtya janapada) a town called Mihilāropya.”

c. A.D. 80-90.—“But immediately after Barygaza the adjoining continent extends from the North to the South, wherefore the region is called Dachinabadēs (Δαχινabadēs), for the South is called in their tongue Dachanos (Δάχανος).”—Periplus M.E., Geog. Gr. Min. i. 254.

1510.—“In the said city of Decan there reigns a King, who is a Mahommedan.”—Varthema, 117. (Here the term is applied to the city and kingdom of Bījapur).

1517.—“On coming out of this Kingdom of Guzarat and Cambay towards the South, and the inner parts of India, is the Kingdom of Dacani, which the Indians call Decan.”—Barbosa, 69.

1552.—“Of Decani or Daquē as we now call it.”—Castanheda, ii. 50.

„ “He (Mahmūd Shāh) was so powerful that he now presumed to style himself King of Canara, giving it the name of Decan. And the name is said to have been given to it from the combination of different nations contained in it, because Decani in their language signifies ‘mongrel.’”—De Barros, Dec. II. liv. v. cap. 2. (It is difficult to discover what has led astray here the usually well-informed De Barros).

1608.—“For the Portugals of Daman had wrought with an ancient friend of theirs a Raga, who was absolute Lord of a Prouince (between Daman, Guzerat, and Decan) called Cruly, to be readie with 200 Horsemen to stay my passage.”—Capt. W. Harkins, in Purchas, i. 209.

[1612.—“The Desanins, a people bordering on them (Portuguese) have besieged six of their port towns.”—Danvers, Letters, i. 258.]

1616.—“. . . his son Sultan Coron, who he designed, should command in Deccan.”—Sir T. Roe.

[„ “There is a resolution taken that Sultan Caronne shall go to the Decan Warres.”—Ibid. Hak. Soc. i. 192.

[1623.—“A Moor of Dacan.”—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 225.]

1667.—

“But such as at this day, to Indians known, In Malabar or Decan spreads her arms.”

Paradise Lost, ix. [1102-3].

1726.—“Decan [as a division] includes Decan, Cunkum, and Balagutta.”—Valentijn, v. 1.

c. 1750.—“... alors le Nababe d'Arcate, tout petit Seigneur qu'il étoit, comparé au Souba du Dekam dont il n'étoit que le Fermier traiter (sic) avec nous comme un Souverain avec ses sujets.”—Letter of M. Bussy, in Cambridge's War in India, p. xxix.

1870.—“In the Deccan and in Ceylon trees and bushes near springs, may often be seen covered with votive flowers.”—Lubbock, Origin of Civilization, 200. N.B.—This is a questionable statement as regards the Deccan.

DECCANY, adj., also used as subst. Properly dakhinī, dakkhinī, dakhnī. Coming from the Deccan. A (Mahomedan) inhabitant of the Deccan. Also the very peculiar dialect of Hindustani spoken by such people.

1516.—“The Decani language, which is the natural language of the country.”—Barbosa, 77.

1572.—“...
Decanys, Orias, que e esperança
Tem de sua salvação nas resonantes Aguas do Gange. . . .”—Cambes, vii. 20.

1578.—“The Decanins (call the Betel-leaf) Pan.”—Acosta, 139.

c. 1590.—“Hence Dak'hinis are notorious in Hindústán for stupidity. . . .”—Author quoted by Blochmann, Aīn, i. 443.

[1813.—“... and the Decanne-bean (butea superba) are very conspicuous.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd. ed. i. 195.]

1861.—
“Ah, I rode a Deccanee charger, with a saddle-cloth gold laced,
And a Persian sword, and a twelve-foot spear, and a pistol at my waist.”
Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

DECK, s. A look, a peep. Imp. of Hind. dekh-nā, ‘to look.’

[1830.—“When on a sudden, coming to a check, Thompson's mahout called out, ‘Dekh! Sahib, Dekh!’”—Or. Sporting Mag., ed. 1873, i. 350.]

1854.—“... these formed the whole assemblage, with the occasional exception of some officer, stopping as he passed by, returning from his morning ride ‘just to have a dekh at the steamer.’ . . .”—W. Arnold, Oakfield, i. 85.

c. 1580.—“... crying, as is their way, Dim, Dim, Mafamede, so that they filled earth and air with terror and confusion.”—Primor e Honra, &c., f. 19.

[c. 1760.—“The sound of ding Mahomed.”—Orme, Military Trans. Madras reprint, ii. 339.

[1764.—“When our seapoys observed the enemy they gave them a ding or huzza.”—Carraccioli, Life of Clive i. 57.]

DELHI, n.p. The famous capital of the great Moghuls, in the latter years of that family; and the seat under various names of many preceding dynasties, going back into ages of which we have no distinct record. Dillī is, according to Cunningham, the old Hindu form of the name; Dihlī is that used by Mahomedans. According to Panjab Notes and Queries (ii. 117 seq.), Dilpat is traditionally the name of the Dillī of Prithvī Rāj. Dil is an old Hindi word for an eminence; and this is probably the etymology of Dilpat and Dillī. The second quotation from Correa curiously illustrates the looseness of his geography. [The name has become unpleasantly familiar in connection with the so-called ‘Delhi boil,’ a form of Oriental sore, similar to Biskra Button, Aleppo Evil, Lahore or Multan Sore (see Delhi Gazetteer, 15, note).]

1205.—(Muhammad Ghori marched) “towards Dehli (may God preserve its prosperity, and perpetuate its splendour!), which is among the chief (mother) cities of Hind.”—Hasan Nizāmi, in Elliot, ii. 216.

c. 1321.—“Hanc terram (Tana, near Bombay) regunt Sarraceni, nunc subjacentes dal dili. . . . Audiens ipse imperator dol Dali. . . . misit et ordinavit ut ipse Lomelic penitus caperetur. . . .”—Fr. Odoric. See Cathay, &c., App., pp. v. and x.

c. 1330.—“Dilli. . . a certain traveller relates that the brick-built walls of this great city are loftier than the walls of Hamath; it stands in a plain on a soil of mingled stones and sand. At the distance of a parasang runs a great river, not so big, however, as Euphrates.”—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 189 seq.

c. 1334.—“The wall that surrounds Dihli has no equal. . . . The city of Dihli has 28 gates. . . .”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 147 seqq.

c. 1375.—The Carta Catalana of the French Library shows ciutat de Dilli and also Lo Rey Dilli, with this rubric below it: “Aci esta un soldā gran e podaros molt rich. Aquest soldā ha DCC orifans e o millia homens a cavall sot lo seu imperi. Ha encora paons sens nombre. . . .”

1516.—“This king of Dely confines with Tatars, and has taken many lands from the King of Cambay; and from the King of Dacan, his servants and captains with many of his people, took much, and afterwards in time they revolted, and set themselves up as kings."—Barboza, p. 100.

1533.—"And this kingdom to which the Badur proceeded was called the Dely; it was very great, but it was all disturbed by wars and the risings of one party against another, because the King was dead, and the sons were fighting with each other for the sovereignty."—Correa, iii. 506.

"This Kingdom of Dely is the greatest that is to be seen in these parts, for one point that it holds is in Persia, and the other is in contact with the Loochoos (or Lequios) beyond China."—Ibid. iii. 572.

c. 1568.—"About sixteen yeeres past this King (of Cuttack), with his Kingdome, were destroyed by the King of Patane, which was also King of the greatest part of Bengala . . . but this tyrant enjoyed his Kingdome but a small time, but was conquered by another tyrant, which was the great Mogol King of Agra, Delly, and of all Cambaia."—Cæsar Frederike in Hakl. ii. 358.

1611.—"On the left hand is seene the car-kasse of old Dely, called the nine castles and fiftie-two gates, now inhabited onely by Googers. . . . The city is 2^e betweene Gate and Gate, begirt with a strong wall, but much ruinate. . . ."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 430.

DELING, s. This was a kind of hammock conveyance, suspended from a pole, mentioned by the old travellers in Pegu. The word is not known to Burmese scholars, and is perhaps a Persian word. Meninski gives "deleng, adj. pendulus, suspensus." The thing seems to be the Malayālam Manchil. (See MUNCHEEL and DANDY).

1569.—"Carried in a closet which they call Deling, in the which a man shall be very well accommodated, with cushions under his head."—Cæsar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 367.

1585.—"This Delingo is a strong cotton cloth doubled, . . . as big as an ordinary rug, and having an iron at each end to attach it by, so that in the middle it hangs like a pouch or purse. These irons are attached to a very thick cane, and this is borne by four men. . . . When you go on a journey, a cushion is put at the head of this Delingo, and you get in, and lay your head on the cushion," &c.—Gasparo Balbi, f. 99b.

1587.—"From Cirion we went to Macao, which is a pretie towne, where we left our boats and Paroes, and in the morning taking Delingeges, which are a kind of Coches made of cords and cloth quilted, and carried vpon a stang betweene 3 and 4 men: we came to Pegu the same day."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 391.

DELLY, MOUNT, n.p. Port. Monte Eli. A mountain on the Malabar coast which forms a remarkable object from seaward, and the name of which occurs sometimes as applied to a State or City adjoining the mountain. It is prominently mentioned in all the old books on India, though strange to say the Map of India in Keith Johnstone's Royal Atlas has neither name nor indication of this famous hill. [It is shown in Constable's Hand Atlas.] It was, according to Correa, the first Indian land seen by Vasco da Gama. The name is Malayāl. Eli mala, 'High Mountain.' Several erroneous explanations have however been given. A common one is that it means 'Seven Hills.' This arose with the compiler of the local Skt. Mahātmya or legend, who rendered the name Saptaśaila, 'Seven Hills,' confounding ēli with ēlu, 'seven,' which has no application. Again we shall find it explained as 'Rat-hill'; but here ēli is substituted for ēli. [The Madras Gloss. gives the word as Mal. ezhimala, and explains it as 'Rat-hill,' "because infested by rats."] The position of the town and port of Ely or Hili mentioned by the older travellers is a little doubtful, but see Marco Polo, notes to Bk. III. ch. xxiv. The Ely-Maide of the Peutingerian Tables is not unlikely to be an indication of Ely.

c. 1330.—"Three days journey beyond this city (Manjarūr, i.e. Mangalore) there is a great hill which projects into the sea, and is descried by travellers from afar, the promontory called Hili."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 185.

c. 1343.—"At the end of that time we set off for Hili, where we arrived two days later. It is a large well-built town on a great bay (or estuary) which big ships enter."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 81.

c. 1440.—"Proceeding onwards he . . . arrived at two cities situated on the sea shore, one named Pacamuria, and the other Helly."—Nicolo Conti, in India in the XVth Cent. p. 6.

1516.—"After passing this place along the coast is the Mountain Dely, on the edge of the sea; it is a round mountain, very lofty, in the midst of low land; all the ships of the Moors and the Gentiles . . .

sight this mountain . . . and make their reckoning by it."—Barbosa, 149.

c. 1562.—"In twenty days they got sight of land, which the pilots foretold before that they saw it, this was a great mountain which is on the coast of India, in the Kingdom of Cananor, which the people of the country in their language call the mountain Dely, elly meaning 'the rat,'* and they call it Mount Dely, because in this mountain there are so many rats that they could never make a village there."—Correa, Three Voyages, &c., Hak. Soc. 145.

1579.—". . . Malik Ben Habeeb . . . proceeded first to Quilon . . . and after erecting a mosque in that town and settling his wife there, he himself journeyed on to [Hili Marāwi]. . . ."—Rowlandson's Tr. of Tohfut-ul-Mujahideen, p. 54. (Here and elsewhere in this ill-edited book Hili Marāwi is read and printed Hubae Murawee).

[1623.—". . . a high Hill, inland near the seashore, call'd Monte Dell."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 355].

1638.—"Sur le midy nous passames à la veüe de Monte-Leone, qui est vne haute montagne dont les Malabares descouurent de loin les vaisseaux, qu'ils peuuent attaquer avec aduantage."—Mandelslo, 275.

1727.—"And three leagues south from Mount Dely is a spacious deep River called Balliapatam, where the English Company had once a Factory for Pepper."—A. Hamilton, i. 291; [ed. 1744, ii. 293].

1759.—"We are further to remark that the late troubles at Tellicherry, which proved almost fatal to that settlement, took rise from a dispute with our linguist and the Prince of that Country, relative to lands he, the linguist, held at Mount Dilly."—Court's Letter of March 23. In Long, 198.

DELOLL, s. A broker; H. from Ar. dallāl; the literal meaning being one who directs (the buyer and seller to their bargain). In Egypt the word is now also used in particular for a broker of old clothes and the like, as described by Lane below. (See also under NEELAM.)

[c. 1665.—"He spared also the house of a deceased Delale or Gentile broker, of the Dutch."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 188. In the first English trans. this passage runs: "He has also regard to the House of the Deceased De Lale."]

1684.—"Five Delolls, or Brokers, of Decca, after they had been with me went to Mr. Beard's chamber. . . ."—Hedges, Diary, July 25; [Hak. Soc. i. 152].

1754.—"Mr. Baillie at Jugdea, accused by these villains, our dulols, who carried on for a long time their most flagrant rascality. The Dulols at Jugdea found to charge the Company 15 per cent. beyond the price of the goods."—Fort Wm. Cons. In Long, p. 50.

1824.—"I was about to answer in great wrath, when a dalal, or broker, went by, loaded with all sorts of second-hand clothes, which he was hawking about for sale."—Hajji Baba, 2d ed. i. 183; [ed. 1851, p. 81].

1835.—"In many of the sooks in Cairo, auctions are held . . . once or twice a week. They are conducted by 'dellāls' (or brokers). . . . The 'dellāls' carry the goods up and down, announcing the sums bidden by the cries of 'harág.'"—Lane, Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1860, p. 317; [5th ed. ii. 13].

DEMIJOHN, s. A large glass bottle holding 20 or 30 quarts, or more. The word is not Anglo-Indian, but it is introduced here because it has been supposed to be the corruption of an Oriental word, and suggested to have been taken from the name of Damaghān in Persia. This looks plausible (compare the Persian origin of carboy, which is another name for just the same thing), but no historical proof has yet been adduced, and it is doubted by Mr. Marsh in his Notes on Wedgwood's Dictionary, and by Dozy (Sup. aux Dict. Arabes). It may be noticed, as worthy of further enquiry, that Sir T. Herbert (192) speaks of the abundance and cheapness of wine at Damaghān. Niebuhr, however, in a passage quoted below, uses the word as an Oriental one, and in a note on the 5th ed. of Lane's Mod. Egyptians, 1860, p. 149, there is a remark quoted from Hammer-Purgstall as to the omission from the detail of domestic vessels of two whose names have been adopted in European languages, viz. the garra or jarra, a water 'jar,' and the demigān or demijān, 'la dame-jeanne.' The word is undoubtedly known in modern Arabic. The Mohit of B. Bistānī, the chief modern native lexicon, explains Dāmijāna as 'a great glass vessel, big-bellied and narrow-necked, and covered with wicker-work; a Persian word.* The vulgar use the forms damajāna and damanjāna. Dame-jeanne appears in P. Richelet, Dict. de la Langue Franc. (1759), with this definition: "[Lagena amplior] Nom que les matelots donnent à une grande bouteille couverte de natte." It is not in the great Castilian Dict. of 1729, but it is in those of the last century, e.g. Dict. of the Span. Academy, ed. 1869. "Damajuana, f. Prov(incia de) And(alucia, CASTAÑA . . ."—and castaña is explained as a "great vessel of glass or terra cotta, of the figure of a chestnut, and used to hold liquor." [See N.E.D. which believes the word adopted from dame-jeanne, on the analogy of 'Bel-larmine' and 'Greybeard.']

* A correction is made here on Lord Stanley's translation.

* Probably not much stress can be laid on this last statement. [The N.E.D. thinks that the Arabic word came from the West].

DENGUE, s. The name applied to a kind of fever. The term is of West Indian, not East Indian, origin, and has only become known and familiar in India within the last 30 years or more. The origin of the name which seems to be generally accepted is, that owing to the stiff unbending carriage which the fever induced in those who suffered from it, the negroes in the W. Indies gave it the name of 'dandy fever'; and this name, taken up by the Spaniards, was converted into dengy or dengue. [But according to the N.E.D. both 'dandy' and 'dengue' are corruptions of the Swahili term, ka dinga pepo, 'sudden cramp-like seizure by an evil spirit.'] Some of its usual characteristics are the great suddenness of attack; often a red eruption; pain amounting sometimes to anguish in head and back, and shifting pains in the joints; excessive and sudden prostration; after-pains of rheumatic character. Its epidemic occurrences are generally at long intervals.

Omitting such occurrences in America and in Egypt, symptoms attach to an epidemic on the Coromandel coast about 1780 which point to this disease; and in 1824 an epidemic of the kind caused much alarm and suffering in Calcutta, Berhampore, and other places in India. This had no repetition of equal severity in that quarter till 1871-72, though there had been a minor visitation in 1853, and a succession of cases in 1868-69. In 1872 it was so prevalent in Calcutta that among those in the service of the E. I. Railway Company, European and native, prior to August in that year, 70 per cent. had suffered from the disease; and whole households were sometimes attacked at once. It became endemic in Lower Bengal for several seasons. When the present writer (H. Y.) left India (in 1862) the name dengue may have been known to medical men, but it was quite unknown to the lay European public.

1885.—THE CONTAGION OF DENGUE FEVER. "In a recent issue (March 14th, p. 551) under the heading 'Dengue Fever in New Caledonia,' you remark that, although there had been upwards of nine hundred cases, yet, 'curiously enough,' there had not been one death. May I venture to say that the 'curiosity' would have been much greater had there been a death? For, although this disease is one of the most infectious, and as I can testify from unpleasant personal experience, one of the most painful that there is, yet death is a very rare occurrence. In an epidemic at Bermuda in 1882, in which about five hundred cases came under my observation, not one death was recorded. In that epidemic, which attacked both whites and blacks impartially, inflammation of the cellular tissue, affecting chiefly the face, neck, and scrotum, was especially prevalent as a sequela, none but the lightest cases escaping. I am not aware that this is noted in the text-books as a characteristic of the disease; in fact, the descriptions in the books then available to me, differed greatly from the disease as I then found it, and I believe that was the experience of other medical officers at the time. . . . During the epidemic of dengue above mentioned, an officer who was confined to his quarters, convalescing from the disease, wrote a letter home to his father in England. About three days after the receipt of the letter, that gentleman complained of being ill, and eventually, from his description, had a rather severe attack of what, had he been in Bermuda, would have been called dengue fever. As it was, his medical attendant was puzzled to give a name to it. The disease did not spread to the other members of the family, and the patient made a good recovery.—Henry J. Barnes, Surgeon, Medical Staff, Fort Pitt, Chatham." From British Medical Journal, April 25.

DEODAR, s. The Cedrus deodara, Loud., of the Himālaya, now known as an ornamental tree in England for some seventy-five years past. The finest specimens in the Himālaya are often found in clumps shadowing a small temple. The Deodar is now regarded by botanists as a variety of Cedrus Libani. It is confined to the W. Himālaya from Nepāl to Afghanistan; it reappears as the Cedar of Lebanon in Syria, and on through Cyprus and Asia Minor; and emerges once more in Algeria, and thence westwards to the Riff Mountains in Morocco, under the name of C. Atlantica. The word occurs in Avicenna, who speaks of the Deiudar as yielding a kind of turpentine (see below). We may note that an article called Deodar-wood Oil appears in Dr. Forbes Watson's "List of Indian Products" (No. 2941) [and see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 235].

Deodar is by no means the universal name of the great Cedar in the Himālay. It is called so (Deoddār, Didr, or Dydr [Drew, Jummoo, 100]) in Kashmīr, where the deoddār pillars of the great mosque of Srinagar date from A.D. 1401. The name, indeed (deva-ddru, 'timber of the gods'), is applied in different parts of India to different trees, and even in the Himālaya to more than one. The list just referred to (which however has not been revised critically) gives this name in different modifications as applied also to the pencil Cedar (Juniperus excelsa), to Guatteria (or Uvaria) longifolia, to Sethia Indica, to Erythroxylon areolatum, and (on the Rāvi and Sutlej) to Cupressus torulosa.

The Deoddār first became known to Europeans in the beginning of the last century, when specimens were sent to Dr. Roxburgh, who called it a Pinus. Seeds were sent to Europe by Capt. Gerard in 1819; but the first that grew were those sent by the Hon. W. Leslie Melville in 1822.

c. 1030.—"Deiudar (or rather Diudar) est ex genere abhel (i.e. juniper) quae dicitur pinus Inda, et Syr deiudar (Milk of Deodar) est ejus lac (turpentine)."—Avicenna, Lat. Transl. p. 297.

c. 1220.—"He sent for two trees, one of which was a . . . white poplar, and the other a deoddār, that is a fir. He planted them both on the boundary of Kashmīr."—Chach Nāmah in Elliot, i. 144.

DERRISHACST, adj. This extraordinary word is given by C. B. P. (MS.) as a corruption of P. daryd-shikast, 'destroyed by the river.'

DERVISH, s. P. darvesh; a member of a Mahomedan religious order. The word is hardly used now among Anglo-Indians, fakīr [see FAKEER] having taken its place. On the Mahomedan confraternities of this class, see Herklots, 179 seqq.; Lane,

The regular title of this chief appears to be Sar-Desāi.

DESTOOR, s. A Parsee priest; P. dastūr, from the Pahlavi dastōbar, 'a prime minister, councillor of State . . . a high priest, a bishop of the Parsees; a custom, mode, manner' (Haug, Old Pahlavi and Pazand Glossary). [See DUSTOOR.]

1660.—"The Devil-Bird, is not an owl . . . its ordinary note is a magnificent clear shout like that of a human being, and which can be heard at a great distance. It has another cry like that of a hen just caught, but the sounds which have earned for it its bad name . . . are indescribable, the most appalling that can be imagined, and scarcely to be heard without shuddering; I can only compare it to a boy in torture, whose screams are being stopped by being strangled."—Mr. Mitford's Note in Tennent's Ceylon, i. 167.

DEVIL'S REACH, n.p. This was the old name of a reach on the Hoogly R. a little above Pulta (and about 15 miles above Calcutta). On that reach are several groups of dewals, or idol-temples, which probably gave the name.

1684.—"August 28.—I borrowed the late Dutch Fiscal's Budgero (see BUDGEROW), and went in Company with Mr. Beard, Mr. Littleton" (etc.) "as far as y^e Devil's Reach, where I caused y^e tents to be pitched in expectation of y^e President's arrivall and lay here all night."—Halges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 166.

1711.—"From the lower Point of Devil's Reach you must keep mid-channel, or nearest the Starboard Shore, for the Larkboard is shoal until you come into the beginning of Pulta or Pontto Reach, and there abreast of a single great Tree, you must edge over to the East Shore below Pulta."—The English Pilot, 54.

DEVIL WORSHIP. This phrase is a literal translation of bhūta-pūjā, i.e. worship of bhūtas [see BHOOT], a word which appears in slightly differing forms in various languages of India including the Tamil country. A bhūta or as in Tamil more usually, pēy, is a malignant being which is conceived to arise from the person of anyone who has come to a violent death. This superstition, in one form or another, seems to have formed the religion of the Dravidian tribes of S. India before the introduction of Brahmanism, and is still the real religion of nearly all the low castes in that region, whilst it is often patronized also by the higher castes. These superstitions, and especially the demonolatrous rites called 'devil-dancing,' are identical in character with those commonly known as Shamanism [see SHAMAN], and which are spread all over Northern Asia among the red races of America, and among a vast variety of tribes in Ceylon and in Indo-China, not excluding the Burmese. A full account of the demon-worship of Tinnevely was given by Jp. Caldwell in a small pamphlet on the "Tinnevely Shanars" (Madras 849), and interesting evidence of its identity with the Shamanism of other regions will be found in his Comparative Grammar (2nd ed. 579 seq.); see also Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 79 seq.; Oppert, Orig. Inhabit. of Bharatavarsha, 554 seq.]

DÉWAL, DÉWALÉ, s. H. dewal, Skt. deva-dāya; a Temple or pagoda. This, or Dewalgarh, is the phrase commonly used in the Bombay territory for a Christian church. In Ceylon Déwale is a temple dedicated to a Hindu god.

1681.—"The second order of Priests are those called Koppuks, who are the Priests that belong to the Temples of the other Gods (i.e. other than Boddou, or Buddha). Their Temples are called Dewals."—Knorr, Ceylon, 79.

[1797.—"The Company will settle . . . the dewal or temple charge."—Treaty, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 235.

[1813.—"They plant it (the nayna tree) near the dewals or Hindoo temples, improperly called Pagodas."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 15].

DEWALEEA, s. H. dīwālīyā, 'a bankrupt,' from dīwālī, 'bankruptcy,' and that, though the etymology is disputed, is alleged to be connected with dīpa, 'a lamp'; because "it is the custom . . . when a merchant finds himself failing, or failed, to set up a blazing lamp in his house, shop, or office, and abscond therefrom for some time until his creditors are satisfied by a disclosure of his accounts or dividend of assets."—Drummond's Illustrations (s.v.).

DEWALLY, s. H. dīwālī, from Skt. dīpa-dīkā, 'a row of lamps,' i.e. an illumination. An autumnal feast attributed to the celebration of various divinities, as of Lakshmi and of Bhavānī, and also in honour of Krishna's slaying of the demon Naraka, and the release of 16,000 maidens, his prisoners. It is held on the last two days of the dark half of the month Āshvina or Āśan, and on the new moon and four following days of Kartika, i.e.

usually some time in October. But there are variations of Calendar in different parts of India, and feasts will not always coincide, e.g. at the three Presidency towns, nor will any curt expression define the dates. In Bengal the name Diwālī is not used; it is Kālī Pūjā, the feast of that grim goddess, a midnight festival on the most moonless nights of the month, celebrated by illuminations and fireworks, on land and river, by feasting, carousing, gambling, and sacrifice of goats, sheep, and buffaloes.

[1623.—“October the four and twentieth was the Davāli, or Feast of the Indian Gentiles.”—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 206.]

1651.—“In the month of October, eight days after the full moon, there is a feast held in honour of Vistnou, which is called Dipāwālī.”—A. Rogerius, De Open-Deure.

[1671.—“In October they begin their yeare with great feasting, Jollity, Sending Presents to all they have any busynes with, which time is called Dually.”—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxiv.]

1673.—“The first New Moon in October is the Banyan's Dually.”—Fryer, 110.

1690.—“... their Grand Festival Season, called the Dually Time.”—Ovington, 401.

1820.—“The Dewalee, Deepaullee, or Time of Lights, takes place 20 days after the Dussera, and lasts three days; during which there is feasting, illumination, and fireworks.”—T. Coats, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., ii. 211.

1843.—“Nov. 5. The Diwālī, happening to fall on this day, the whole river was bright with lamps. . . . Ever and anon some votary would offer up his prayers to Lakshmi the Fortuna, and launch a tiny raft bearing a cluster of lamps into the water,—then watch it with fixed and anxious gaze. If it floats on till the far distance hides it, thrice happy he . . . but if, caught in some wild eddy of the stream, it disappears at once, so will the bark of his fortunes be engulfed in the whirlpool of adversity.”—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 84.

1883.—“The Divālī is celebrated with splendid effect at Benares. . . . At the approach of night small earthen lamps, fed with oil, are prepared by millions, and placed quite close together, so as to mark out every line of mansion, palace, temple, minaret, and dome in streaks of fire.”—Monier Williams, Religious Thought and Life in India, 432.

DEWAUN, s. The chief meanings of this word in Anglo-Indian usage are :

(1) Under the Mahomedan Governments which preceded us, “the head financial minister, whether of the state or a province . . . charged, in the latter, with the collection of the revenue, the remittance of it to the imperial treasury, and invested with extensive judicial powers in all civil and financial causes” (Wilson). It was in this sense that the grant of the Dewauny (q.v.) to the E. I. Company in 1765 became the foundation of the British Empire in India. (2) The prime minister of a native State. (3) The chief native officer of certain Government establishments, such as the Mint; or the native manager of a Zemindary. (4) (In Bengal) a native servant in confidential charge of the dealings of a house of business with natives, or of the affairs of a large domestic establishment. These meanings are perhaps all reducible to one conception, of which ‘Steward’ would be an appropriate expression. But the word has had many other ramifications of meaning, and has travelled far.

The Arabian diwān is, according to Lane, an Arabicized word of Persian origin (though some hold it for pure Arabic), and is in original meaning nearly equivalent to Persian daftar (see DUFTER), i.e. a collection of written leaves or sheets (forming a book for registration); hence ‘a register of accounts’; a ‘register of soldiers or pensioners’; a ‘register of the rights or dues of the State, or relating to the acts of government, the finances and the administration’; also any book, and especially a collection of the poems of some particular poet. It was also applied to signify ‘an account’; then a ‘writer of accounts’; a ‘place of such writers of accounts’; also a ‘council, court, or tribunal’; and in the present day, a ‘long seat formed of a mattress laid along the wall of a room, with cushions, raised or on the floor’; or ‘two or more of such seats.’ Thus far (in this paragraph) we abstract from Lane.

The Arabian historian Bilādūrī (c. 860) relates as to the first introduction of the diwān that, when ‘Omar was discussing with the people how to divide the enormous wealth derived from the conquests in his time, Walīd bin Hishām bin Moghaira said to the caliph, ‘I have been in Syria, and saw that its kings make a diwān; do thou the like.’ So ‘Omar accepted via advice, and sent for two men of the Persian tongue, and said to them: 'Write down the people according to their rank' (and corresponding pensions).*

We must observe that in the Mahomedan States of the Mediterranean the word diwān became especially applied to the Custom-house, and thus passed into the Romance languages as aduana, douane, dogana, &c. Littré indeed avoids any decision as to the etymology of douane, &c. And Hyde (Note on Abr. Peritsol, in Syntagma Dissertt. i. 101) derives dogana from docān (i.e. P. dukān, 'officina, a shop'). But such passages as that below from Ibn Jubair, and the fact that, in the medieval Florentine treaties with the Mahomedan powers of Barbary and Egypt, the word diwān in the Arabic texts constantly represents the dogana of the Italian, seem sufficient to settle the question (see Amari, Diplomi Arabi del Real Archivio, &c.; e.g. p. 104, and (Latin) p. 305, and in many other places).† The Spanish Dict. of Cobarvías (1611) quotes Urrea as saying that, "from the Arabic noun Diuanum, which signifies the house where the duties are collected, we form diuana, and thence adiuana, and lastly aduana."

At a later date the word was re-imported into Europe in the sense of a hall furnished with Turkish couches and cushions, as well as of a couch of this kind. Hence we get cigar-divans, et hoc genus omne. The application to certain collections of poems is noticed above. It seems to be especially applied to assemblages of short poems of homogeneous character. Thus the Odes of Horace, the Sonnets of Petrarch, the In Memoriam of Tennyson, answer to the character of Diwān so used. Hence also Goethe took the title of his West-Östliche Divan.

At length, in the 2nd or 3rd year of his Caliphate, Omar determined that the distribution should be regulated on a fixed and systematic scale. . . . To carry out this vast design, a Register had to be drawn and kept up of every man, woman, and child, entitled to a stipend from the State. . . . In the following quotations the identity of dīwān and douane or dogana is shown more or less clearly.

A. D. 1178.—“The Moslem were ordered to disembark their goods (at Alexandria), and what remained of their stock of provisions; and on the shore were officers who took them in charge, and carried all that was landed to the Diwān. They were called forward one by one; the property of each was brought out, and the Diwān was straitened with the crowd. The search fell on every article, small or great; one thing got mixt up with another, and hands were thrust into the midst of the packages to discover if anything were concealed in them. Then, after this, an oath was administered to the owners that they had nothing more than had been found. Amid all this, in the confusion of hands and the greatness of the crowd many things went amissing. At length the passengers were dismissed after a scene of humiliation and great ignominy, for which we pray God to grant an ample recompense. But this, past doubt, is one of the things kept hidden from the great Sultan Salāh-ud-dīn, whose well-known justice and benevolence are such that, if he knew it, he would certainly abolish the practice” [ciz. as regards Mecca pilgrims].*—Ibn Jubair, orig. in Wright's ed., p. 36.

c. 1340.—“Doana in all the cities of the Saracens, in Sicily, in Naples, and throughout the Kingdom of Apulia . . . Dazio at Venice; Gabella throughout Tuscany; . . . Costuma throughout the Island of England. . . . All these names mean duties which have to be paid for goods and wares and other things, imported to, or exported from, or passed through the countries and places detailed.”—Francesco Balducci Pegolotti, see Cathay, &c., ii. 285-6.

c. 1348.—“They then order the skipper to state in detail all the goods that the vessel contains. . . . Then everybody lands, and the keepers of the custom-house (al-dīwān) sit and pass in review whatever one has.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 265.

The following medieval passage in one of our note-books remains a fragment without date or source :

* The present generation in England can have no conception how closely this description applies to what took place at many an English port before Sir Robert Peel's great changes in the import tariff. The present writer, in landing from a P. & O. steamer at Portsmouth in 1843, after four or five days' quarantine in the Solent, had to go through five to six hours of such treatment as Ibn Jubair describes, and his feelings were very much the same as the Moor's.—[H. A Council Hall :

1367.—“Hussyn, fearing for his life, came down and hid himself under the tower, but his enemies . . . surrounded the mosque, and having found him, brought him to the (Dyvan-Khane) Council Chamber.”—Mem. of Timur, tr. by Stewart, p. 130.

1554.—“Utcunque sit, cum mane in Divanum (is concilii vt alias dixi locus est) imprudens omnium venisset. . . .”—Busbequi Epistolae, ii. p. 138.

A place, fitted with mattresses, &c., to sit in :

1676.—“On the side that looks towards the River, there is a Divan, or a kind of out-jutting Balcony, where the King sits.”—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 49; [ed. Ball, i. 108].

[1785.—“It seems to have been intended for a Duan Konna, or eating room.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 393.]

A Collection of Poems :

1783.—“One (writer) died a few years ago at Benares, of the name of Souda, who composed a Dewan in Moors.”—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 105.

DEWAUNY, DEWANNY, &c., s. Properly, dīwānī; popularly, deodnī. The office of dīwān (Dewaun); and especially the right of receiving as dīwān the revenue of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, conferred upon the E. I. Company by the Great Mogul Shāh 'Ālam in 1765. Also used sometimes for the territory which was the subject of that grant.

1765.—(Lord Clive) “visited the Vezir, and having exchanged with him some sumptuous entertainments and curious and magnificent presents, he explained the project he had in his mind, and asked that the Company should be invested with the Divanship (no doubt in orig. Diwānī) of the three provinces. . . .”—Seir Mutaqherin, ii. 384.

1783.—(The opium monopoly) “is stated to have begun at Patna so early as the year 1761, but it received no considerable degree of strength until the year 1765; when the acquisition of the Duane opened a wide field for all projects of this nature.”—Report of a Committee on Affairs of India, in Burke's Life and Works, vi. 447.

DEWAUNY, DEWANNY, adj. Civil, as distinguished from Criminal; e.g. Diwānī 'Adālat as opposite to Faujdārī Adālat. (See ADAWLUT). The use of Diwānī for civil as opposed to criminal is probably modern and Indian. For Kaempfer in his account of the Persian administration at the end of the 17th century, has: "Diwaen begi, id est, Supremus criminalis Judicii Dominus . . . de latrociniis et homicidiis non modo in hac Regiā metropoli, verum etiam in toto Regno disponendi facultatem habet."—Amoenit. Exot. 80.

DHALL, DOLL, s. Hind. dal, a kind of pulse much used in India, both by natives as a kind of porridge, and by Europeans as an ingredient in kedgeroe (q.v.), or to mix with rice as a breakfast dish. It is best represented in England by what are called 'split pease.' The proper dal, which Wilson derives from the Skt. root dal, 'to divide' (and which thus corresponds in meaning also to 'split pease'), is, according to the same authority, Phaseolus aureus: but, be that as it may, the dāls most commonly in use are varieties of the shrubby plant Cajanus Indicus, Spreng., called in Hind. arhar, rahar, &c. It is not known where this is indigenous; [De Candolle thinks it probably a native of tropical Africa, introduced perhaps 3,000 years ago into India;] it is cultivated throughout India. The term is also applied occasionally to other pulses, such as mūng, urd, &c. (See MOONG, OORD.) It should also be noted that in its original sense dāl is not the name of a particular pea, but the generic name of pulses prepared for use by being broken in a hand-mill; though the peas named are those commonly used in Upper India in this way.

1673.—"At their coming up out of the Water they bestow the largess of Rice or Doll (an Indian Bean)."—Fryer, 101.

1690.—"Kitcheree . . . made of Doll, that is, a small round Pea, and Rice boiled together, and is very strengthening, tho' not very savoury."—Ovington, 310.

1727.—"They have several species of Legumen, but those of Doll are most in use, for some Doll and Rice being mingled together and boiled, make Kitcheree."—A. Hamilton, i. 162; [ed. 1744].

1776.—"If a person hath bought the seeds of . . . doll . . . or such kinds of Grain, without Inspection, and in ten Days discovers any Defect in that Grain, he may return such Grain."—Halhed, Code, 178.

1778.—". . . the essential articles of a Sepoy's diet, rice, doll (a species of pea), ghee (an indifferent kind of butter), &c., were not to be purchased."—Acc. of the Gallant Defence made at Mangalore.

1809.—". . . dol, split country peas."—Maria Graham, 25.

[1813.—"Tuar (Cytisus cajan, Lin.) . . . is called Dohll. . . ."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 35.]

DHAWK, s. Hind. dhak; also called palds. A small bushy tree, Butea frondosa (N. O. Leguminosae), which forms large tracts of jungle in the Punjab, and in many dry parts of India. Its deep orange flowers give a brilliant aspect to the jungle in the early part of the hot weather, and have suggested the occasional name of 'Flame of the Forest.' They are used for dyeing basanto, basanti, a fleeting yellow; and in preparing Holi (see HOOLY) powder. The second of the two Hindī words for this tree gave a name to the famous village of Plassy (Palāśī), and also to ancient Magadha or Behār as Palāśa or Parāśa, whence Parāśiya, a man of that region, which, if Gen. Cunningham's suggestion be accepted, was the name represented by the Prasii of Strabo, Pliny, and Arrian, and the Pharrasii of Curtius (Anc. Geog. of India, p. 454). [The derivation of the word from Skt. Prāchyās 'Inhabitants of the east country,' is supported by McCrindle, Ancient India, 365 seq. So the dhak tree possibly gave its name to Dacca.]

1761.—"The pioneers, agreeably to orders, dug a ditch according to custom, and placed along the brink of it an abattis of dhāk trees, or whatever else they could find."—Saiyid Ghulām 'Alī, in Elliot, viii. 400.

DHOBY, DOBIE, s. A washerman; H. dhobī, [from dhondā, Skt. dhāv, 'to wash.'] In colloquial Anglo-Indian use all over India. A common H. proverb runs: Dhobī kā kutā kā sā, na ghar kā na ghāt kū, i.e. "Like a Dhoby's dog belonging neither to the house nor to the river side." [Dhoby's itch is a troublesome cutaneous disease supposed to be communicated by clothes from the wash, and Dhoby's earth is a whitish-grey sandy efflorescence, found in many places, from which by boiling and the addition of quicklime an alkali of considerable strength is obtained.

[c. 1804.—“Dobes.” See under DIB-ZEE].

DHOOPLY, DOOLIE, s. A covered litter; Hind. doli. It consists of a cot or frame, suspended by the four corners from a bamboo pole, and is carried by two or four men (see figure in Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, pl. vii. fig. 4). Doli is from dolnd, ‘to swing.’ The word is also applied to the meat- (or milk-) safe, which is usually slung to a tree, or to a hook in the verandah. As it is lighter and cheaper than a palankin it costs less both to buy or hire and to carry, and is used by the poorer classes. It also forms the usual ambulance of the Indian army. Hence the familiar story of the orator in Parliament who, in celebrating a battle in India, spoke of the “ferocious Doolies rushing down from the mountain and carrying off the wounded”; a story which, to our regret, we have not been able to verify. [According to one account the words were used by Burke: “After a sanguinary engagement, the said Warren Hastings had actually ordered ferocious Doolys to seize upon the wounded” (2nd ser. Notes & Queries, iv. 367).

c. 1343.—“The principal vehicle of the people (of Malabar) is a dūla, carried on the shoulders of slaves and hired men. Those who do not ride in a dūla, whoever they may be, go on foot.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 73.

c. 1590.—“The Kahars or Palki-bearers. They form a class of foot servants peculiar to India. With their palkis . . . and dūlis, they walk so evenly that the man inside is not inconvenienced by any jolting.”—Āin, i. 254; [and see the account of the sukhāsan, ibid. ii. 122].

1609.—“He turned Moore, and bereaved his elder Brother of this holde by this stratageme. He invited him and his women to a Banquet, which his Brother requiting with like inuitation of him and his, in steed of women he sends choice Souldiers well appointed, and close couered, two and two in a Dowle.”—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 435.

1662.—“The Rājah and the Phūkans travel in singhāsans, and chiefs and rich people in dūlis, made in a most ridiculous way.”—Mir Jumlah's Invasion of Asam, tr. by Blockmann, in J. As. Soc. Ben., xli., pt. I. 80.

1702.—“. . . un Douli, c'est une voiture moins honorable que le palanquin.”—Lettres Edif. xi. 143.

c. 1760.—“Doolies are much of the same material as the andolas [see ANDOR]; but made of the meanest materials.”—Grose, i. 155.

c. 1768.—“. . . leaving all his wounded . . . on the field of battle, telling them to be of good cheer, for that he would send Doolies for them from Astara. . . .”—H. of Hydur Naik, 226.

1774.—“If by a dooley, chairs, or any other contrivance they can be secured from the fatigues and hazards of the way, the expense is to be no objection.”—Letter of W. Hastings, in Markham's Tibet, 18.

1785.—“You must despatch Doolies to Dhārwar to bring back the wounded men.”—Letters of Tippoo, 133.

1789.—“. . . doolies, or sick beds, which are a mean representation of a palanquin: the number attached to a corps is in the proportion of one to every ten men, with four bearers to each.”—Munro, Narrative, 184.

1845.—“Head Qrs., Kurrachee, 27 Decr., 1845.

“The Governor desires that it may be made known to the Doolee-wallas and Camel-men, that no increase of wages shall be given to them. They are very highly paid. If any man deserts, the Governor will have him pursued by the police, and if caught he shall be hanged.”—G. O. by Sir Charles Napier, 113.

1872.—“At last . . . a woman arrived from Dargānagar with a dūli and two bearers, for carrying Mālāti.”—Jorinda Samantu, ii. 7.

1880.—“The consequence of holding that this would be a Trust enforceable in a Court of Law would be so monstrous that persons would be probably startled . . . if it be a Trust, then every one of those persons in England or in India—from persons of the highest rank down to the lowest dhoolie-bearer, might file a bill for the administration of the Trust.”—Ld. Justice James, Judgment on the Kirwee and Banda Prize Appeal, 13th April.

1883.—“I have great pleasure here in bearing my testimony to the courage and devotion of the Indian dhooly-bearers. I . . . never knew them shrink from the dangers of the battle-field, or neglect or forsake a wounded European. I have several times seen one of these bearers killed and many of them disabled while carrying a wounded soldier out of action.”—Surgeon-

General Munro, C.B., Reminiscences of Mil. Service with the 93rd Sutherland Highlanders, p. 193.

DHOON, s. Hind. dūn. A word in N. India specially applied to the flat valleys, parallel to the base of the Himālaya, and lying between the rise of that mountain mass and the low tertiary ranges known as the sub-Himālayan or Siwālik Hills (q.v.), or rather between the interior and exterior of these ranges. The best known of these valleys is the Dūn of Dehra, below Mussooree, often known as "the Dhoon"; a form of expression which we see by the second quotation to be old.

1526.—"In the language of Hindustān they call a Jālga (or dale) Dūn. The finest running water in Hindustān is that in this Dūn."—Baber, 299.

1654-55.—"Khalilu-lla Khan . . . having reached the Dūn, which is a strip of country lying outside of Srinagar, 20 kos long and 5 broad, one extremity of its length being bounded by the river Jumna, and the other by the Ganges."—Shāh-Jahān-Nāma, in Elliot, vii. 106.

1814.—"Me voici in the far-famed Dhoon, the Tempe of Asia. . . . The fort stands on the summit of an almost inaccessible mountain . . . it will be a tough job to take it; but by the 1st proximo I think I shall have it, auspice Deo."—In Asiatic Journal, ii. 151; ext. of letter from Sir Rollo Gillespie before Kalanga, dated 29th Oct. He fell next day.

1879.—"The Sub-Himalayan Hills . . . as a general rule . . . consist of two ranges, separated by a broad flat valley, for which the name 'dūn' (Doon) has been adopted. . . . When the outer of these ranges is wanting, as is the case below Naini Tal and Darjiling, the whole geographical feature might escape notice, the inner range being confounded with the spurs of the mountains."—Manual of the Geology of India, 521.

DHOTY, s. Hind. dhotī. The loin-cloth worn by all the respectable Hindu castes of Upper India, wrapt round the body, the end being then passed between the legs and tucked in at the waist, so that a festoon of calico hangs down to either knee. [It is mentioned, not by name, by Arrian (Indika, 16) as "an under garment of cotton which reaches below the knee, half way to the ankle"; and the Orissa dhotī of 1200 years ago, as shown on the monuments, does not differ from the mode of the present time, save that men of rank wore a jewelled girdle with a pendant in front. (Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 187).] The word duttees in old trade lists of cotton goods is possibly the same; [but at the present time a coarse cotton cloth woven by Dhers in Surat is known as Doti.]

[1609.—"Here is also a strong sort of cloth called Dhootie."—Danvers, Letters, i. 29.

[1614.—"20 corge of strong Dutties, such as may be fit for making and mending sails."—Forster, Letters, ii. 219.

[1615.—"200 peeces Dutta."—Cocks's Diary, i. 83.]

1622.—"Price of calicoes, duttees fixed."

* * * * *

"List of goods sold, including diamonds, pepper, bastas, (read baftas), duttees, and silks from Persia."—Court Minutes, &c., in Sainsbury, iii. 24.

1810.—". . . a dotee or waist-cloth."—Williamson, V. M. i. 247.

1872.—"The human figure which was moving with rapid strides had no other clothing than a dhuti wrapped round the waist, and descending to the knee-joints."—Govinda Samanta, i. 8.

DHOW, DOW, s. The last seems the more correct, though not perhaps the more common. The term is common in Western India, and on various shores of the Arabian sea, and is used on the E. African coast for craft in general (see Burton, in J.R.G.S. xxix. 239); but in the mouths of Englishmen on the western seas of India it is applied specially to the old-fashioned vessel of Arab build, with a long grab stem, i.e. rising at a long slope from the water, and about as long as the keel, usually with one mast and lateen-rig. There are the lines of a dow, and a technical description, by Mr. Edie, in J. R. As. Soc., vol. i. p. 11. The slaving dow is described and illustrated in Capt. Colomb's Slave-catching in the Indian Ocean; see also Capt. W. F. Owen's Narrative (1833), p. 385, [i. 384 seq.]. Most people suppose the word to be Arabic, and it is in (Johnson's) Richardson (dāo) as an Arabic word. But no Arabic scholar whom we have consulted admits it to be genuine Arabic. Can it possibly have been taken from Pers. dar, 'running'? [The N.E.D. remarks that if Tava (in Ath. Nikitin, below) be the same, it would tend to localise the word at Ormus in the Persian Gulf.] Capt. Burton identifies it with the word zabra applied in the Roteiro of Vasco's Voyage (p. 37) to a native vessel at Mombasa. But zabra or zarra was apparently a Basque name for a kind of craft in Biscay (see s.v. Bluteau, and the Dicc. de la Lingua Castel., vol. vi. 1739). Ddo or Ddva is indeed in Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. as a word in that language, but this gives no assurance of origin. Anglo-Indians on the west coast usually employ dhow and buggalow interchangeably. The word is used on Lake V. Nyanza.

c. 1470.—“I shipped my horses in a Tava, and sailed across the Indian Sea in ten days to Moshkat.”—Atk. Nikitin, p. 8, in India in XVth Cent.

“So I embarked in a tava, and settled to pay for my passage to Hormuz two pieces of gold.”—Ibid. 30.

1785.—“A Dow, the property of Rutn Jee and Jeewun Doss, merchants of Muscat, having in these days been dismasted in a storm, came into Byte Koal (see BATCUL), a seaport belonging to the Sircar. . . .”—Tippoo's Letters, 181.

1786.—“We want 10 shipwrights acquainted with the construction of Dows. Get them together and despatch them hither.”—Tippoo to his Agent at Muskat, ibid. 234.

1810.—“Close to Calcutta, it is the busiest scene we can imagine; crowded with ships and boats of every form,—here a fine English East Indiaman, there a grab or a dow from Arabia.”—Maria Graham, 142.

1814.—“The different names given to these ships (at Jedda), as Say, Seume, Merkab, Sambouk [see SAMBOOK], Dow, denote their size; the latter only, being the largest, perform the voyage to India.”—Burckhardt, Tr. in Arabia, 1829, 4to, p. 22.

1837.—“Two young princes . . . nephews of the King of Hinzuan or Joanna . . . came in their own dhow on a visit to the Government.”—Smith, Life of Dr. J. Wilson, 253.

1844.—“I left the hospitable village of Takaungu in a small boat, called a ‘Daw’ by the Suahilis . . . the smallest sea-going vessel.”—Krapf, p. 117.

1865.—“The goods from Zanzibar (to the Seychelles) were shipped in a dhow, which ran across in the month of May; and this was, I believe, the first native craft that had ever made the passage.”—Pelly, in J.R.G.S. xxxv. 234.

1873.—“If a pear be sharpened at the thin end, and then cut in half longitudinally, two models will have been made, resembling in all essential respects the ordinary slave dhow.”—Colomb, 35.

“Dhow Chasing in Zanzibar Waters and on the Eastern Coast of Africa . . . by Capt. G. L. Sullivan, R.N.,” 1873.

1880.—“The third division are the Mozambiques or African slaves, who have been brought into the country from time immemorial by the Arab slave-trading *dhow*s.”—Sibree's Great African Island, 182.

1883.—“Dhau is a large vessel which is falling into disuse. . . . Their origin is in the Red Sea. The word is used vaguely, and is applied to baghlas (see BUGGALOW).”—Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. 717 seq.

DHURMSALLA, s. H. and Mahr. dharm-sāla, ‘pious edifice’; a rest-house for wayfarers, corresponding to the S. Indian Choultry or Chuttrum (q.v.).

1826.—“We alighted at a durhmsallah where several horsemen were assembled.”—Pandurang Hari, 254; [ed. 1873, ii. 66].

DHURNA, TO SIT, v. In H. dhurnā dand or baithnd, Skt. dhri, ‘to hold.’ A mode of extorting payment or compliance with a demand, effected by the complainant or creditor sitting at the debtor's door, and there remaining without tasting food till his demand shall be complied with, or (sometimes) by threatening to do himself some mortal violence if it be not complied with. Traces of this custom in some form are found in many parts of the world, and Sir H. Maine (see below) has quoted a remarkable example from the Irish Brehon Laws. There was a curious variety of the practice, in arrest for debt, current in S. India, which is described by Marco Polo and many later travellers (see M. P., 2nd ed., ii. 327, 335, [and for N. India, Crooke, Pop. Rel. and Folklore, ii. 42, seq.]). The practice of dhurnā is made an offence under the Indian Penal Code. There is a systematic kind of dhurnā practised by classes of beggars, e.g. in the Punjab by a class called Tasmīwālds, or ‘strap-riggers,’ who twist a leather strap round the neck, and throw themselves on the ground before a shop, until alms are given; [Dorīwālds, who threaten to hang themselves: Dandīwālds, who rattle sticks, and stand cursing till they get alms; Urinūds, who simply stand before a shop all day, and Gurzmāds and Chharimāds, who cut themselves with knives and spiked clubs] (see Ind. Antiq. i. 162, [Herklots, Qanoone-Islam, ed. 1863, p. 193 seq.]). It appears from Elphinstone (below) that the custom sometimes received the A-

Pers. name of takdza, 'dunning' or 'importunity.'

c. 1747.—"While Nundi Raj, the Dulwai (see DALAWAY), was encamped at Sutti Mangul, his troops, for want of pay, placed him in Dhurna. . . . Hurree Singh, forgetting the ties of salt or gratitude to his master, in order to obtain his arrears of pay, forbade the sleeping and eating of the Dulwai, by placing him in Dhurna. . . . and that in so great a degree as even to stop the water used in his kitchen. The Dulwai, losing heart from this rigour, with his clothes and the vessels of silver and gold used in travelling, and a small sum of money, paid him off and discharged him."—H. of Hydur Naik, 41 seq.

c. 1794.—"The practice called dharna, which may be translated caption, or arrest."—Sir J. Shore, in As. Res. iv. 144.

1808.—"A remarkable circumstance took place yesterday. Some Sirdars put the Maharaja (Sindia) in dhurna. He was angry, and threatened to put them to death. Bhugwunt Ras Byse, their head, said, 'Sit still; put us to death.' Sindia was enraged, and ordered him to be paid and driven from camp. He refused to go. . . . The bazaars were shut the whole day; troops were posted to guard them and defend the tents. . . . At last the mutineers marched off, and all was settled."—Elphinstone's Diary, in Life, i. 179 seq.

1809.—"Seendhiya (i.e. Sindia), who has been lately plagued by repeated D'hurnas, seems now resolved to partake also in the active part of the amusement: he had permitted this same Patunkur, as a signal mark of favour, to borrow 50,000 rupees from the Khasree, or private treasury. . . . The time elapsed without the agreement having been fulfilled; and Seendhiya immediately dispatched the treasurer to sit D'hurna on his behalf at Patunkur's tents."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, 169 seq.; [ed. 1892, 127].

1819.—"It is this which is called tukaza * by the Mahrattas. . . . If a man have demand from (? upon) his inferior or equal, he places him under restraint, prevents his leaving his house or eating, and even compels him to sit in the sun until he comes to some accommodation. If the debtor were a superior, the creditor had first recourse to supplications and appeals to the honour and sense of shame of the other party; he laid himself on his threshold, threw himself in his road, clamoured before his door, or he employed others to do this for him; he would even sit down and fast before the debtor's door, during which time the other was compelled to fast also; or he would appeal to the gods, and invoke their curses upon the person by whom he was injured."—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 87.

1837.*—"Whoever voluntarily causes or attempts to cause any person to do anything which that person is not legally bound to do . . . by inducing . . . that person to believe that he . . . will become . . . by some act of the offender, an object of the divine displeasure if he does not do the thing . . . shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

1875.—"If you have a legal claim against a man of a certain rank and you are desirous of compelling him to discharge it, the Senchus Mor tells you 'to fast upon him.' . . . The institution is unquestionably identical with one widely diffused throughout the East, which is called by the Hindoos 'sitting dharna.' It consists in sitting at the debtor's door and starving yourself till he pays. From the English point of view the practice has always been considered barbarous and immoral, and the Indian Penal Code expressly forbids it. It suggests, however, the question—what would follow if the debtor simply allowed the creditor to starve? Undoubtedly the Hindoo supposes that some supernatural penalty would follow; indeed, he generally gives definiteness to it by retaining a Brahmin to starve himself vicariously, and no Hindoo doubts what would come of causing a Brahmin's death."—Maine, Hist. of Early Institutions, 40. See also 297-304.

1885.—"One of the most curious practices in India is that still followed in the native states by a Brahman creditor to compel payment of his debt, and called in Hindi dharna, and in Sanskrit achurita, 'customary proceeding,' or Prāyopaveśana, 'sitting down to die by hunger.' This procedure has long since been identified with the practice of 'fasting upon' (troscud for) a debtor to God or man, which is so frequently mentioned in the Irish so-called Brehon Laws. . . . In a MS. in the Bodleian . . . there is a Middle-Irish legend which tells how St. Patrick 'fasted upon' Loegaire, the unbelieving over-king of Ireland. Loegaire's pious queen declares that she will not eat anything while Patrick is fasting. Her son Enna seeks for food. 'It is not fitting for thee,' says his mother, 'to eat food while Patrick is fasting upon you.' . . . It would seem from this story that in Ireland the wife and children of the debtor, and, a fortiori, the debtor himself, had to fast so long as the creditor fasted."—Letter from Mr. Whitley Stokes, in Academy, Sept. 12th.

A striking story is told in Forbes's Rās Milla (ii. 393 seq.; [ed. 1878, p. 657]) of a farther proceeding following upon an unsuccessful dharnā, put in practice by a company of Chārāns, or bards, in Kathiawār, to enforce payment of a debt by a chief of Jailā to one of their number. After fasting three days in vain, they proceeded from dharnā to the further rite of trāgā (q.v.). Some hacked their own arms; others decapitated three old women of their party, and hung their heads up as a garland at the gate. Certain of the women cut off their own breasts. The bards also pierced the throats of four of the older men with spikes, and took two young girls and dashed their brains out against the town-gate. Finally the Chāran creditor soaked his quilted clothes in oil, and set fire to himself. As he burned to death he cried out, 'I am now dying, but I will become a headless ghost (Karīs) in the Palace, and will take the chief's life, and cut off his posterity!'

DIAMOND HARBOUR, n.p. An anchorage in the Hoogly below Calcutta, 30 m. by road, and 41 by river. It was the usual anchorage of the old Indiamen in the mercantile days of the E. I. Company. In the oldest charts we find the "Diamond Sand," on the western side of what is now called Diamond Harbour, and on some later charts, Diamond Point.

1683.—"We anchored this night on ye head of ye Diamond Sand.

"Jan. 26. This morning early we weighed anchor . . . but got no further than the Point of Kegaria Island" (see KEDGEREE).—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 61. (See also ROGUE'S RIVER.)

DIDWAN, s. P. dūlbān, didwān, 'a look-out,' 'watchman,' 'guard,' 'messenger.'

[1679.—See under AUMILDAR, TRIPLICANE.

[1680.—See under JUNCAMEER.

[1683-4.—". . . three yards of Ordinary Broadcloth and five Pagodas to the Dithwan that brought the Phirmaund. . . ."—Pringle, Diary of Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. iii. 4.]

DIGGORY, DIGRĪ, DEGREE, s. Anglo-Hindustani of law-court jargon for 'decree.'

[1866.—"This is grand, thought bold Bhuwanee Singh, diggree to pāh, lekin roopya to morpās bah, 'He has got his decree, but I have the money.'"—Confessions of an Orderly, 138.]

DIKK, s. Worry, trouble, botheration; what the Italians call seccatura. This is the Anglo-Indian use. But the word is more properly adjective, Ar.-P.-H. dik, dikk, 'vexed, worried,' and so dikk honā, 'to be worried.' [The noun dikk-dārī, 'worry,' in vulgar usage, has become an adjective.]

1873.—

"And Beaufort learned in the law,
And Atkinson the Sage,
And if his locks are white as snow,
'Tis more from dikk than age!"

Wilfrid Heeley, A Lay of Modern Darjeeling.

[1889.—"Were the Company's pumps to be beaten by the vagaries of that dikhdari, Tarachunda nuddee?"—R. Kipling, In Black and White, 52.]

DINAPORE, n.p. A well-known cantonment on the right bank of the Ganges, being the station of the great city of Patna. The name is properly Dūdnpur. Ives (1755) writes Dunapoor (p. 167). The cantonment was established under the government of Warren Hastings about 1772, but we have failed to ascertain the exact date. [Cruso, writing in 1785, speaks of the cantonments having cost the Company 25 lakhs of rupees. (Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 445). There were troops there in 1773 (Gleig, Life of Warren Hastings, i. 297.)]

DĪNĀR, s. This word is not now in any Indian use. But it is remarkable as a word introduced into Skt. at a comparatively early date. "The names of the Arabic pieces of money . . . are all taken from the coins of the Lower Roman Empire. Thus, the copper piece was called fals from folles; the silver dirham from drachma, and the gold dīnār, from denarius, which, though properly a silver coin, was used generally to denote coins of other metals, as the denarius aeris, and the denarius auri, or aureus" (James Prinsep, in Essays, &c., ed. by Thomas, i. 19). But it was long before the rise of Islām that the knowledge and name of the denarius as applied to a gold coin had reached India. The inscription on the east gate of the great tope at Sanchi is probably the oldest instance preserved, though the date of that is a matter greatly disputed. But in the Amarakosha (c. A.D. 500) we have 'dīnāre 'pi cha nishkah,' i.e. 'a nishkah (or gold coin) is the same as dīnāra.' And in the Kalpasūtra of Bhadrabāhu (of about the same age) § 36, we have 'dīnāra mālaya,' 'a necklace of dīnārs,' mentioned (see Max Müller below). The dīndr in modern Persia is a very small imaginary coin, of which 10,000 make a tomaun (q.v.). In the Middle Ages we find Arabic writers applying the term dīndr both to the staple gold coin (corresponding to the gold mohr of more modern times) and to the staple silver coin (corresponding to what has been called since the 16th century the rupee). [Also see Yule, Cathay, ii. 439 seqq. See DEANER.]

A.D. (?) "The son of Amuka . . . having made salutation to the eternal gods and goddesses, has given a piece of ground purchased at the legal rate; also five temples, and twenty-five (thousand ?) dīnārs . . . as an act of grace and benevolence of the great emperor Chandragupta."—Inscription on Gateway at Sanchi (Prinsep's Essays, i. 246).

A.D. (?) "Quelque temps après, à Pataliputra, un autre homme dévoué aux Brahmanes renversa une statue de Bouddha aux pieds d'un mendiant, qui la mit en pièces. Le roi (Açoka) . . . fit proclamer cet ordre : Celui qui m'apportera la tête d'un mendiant brahmanique, recevra de moi un Dīnāra."—Tr. of Dirya avadāna, in Burnouf, Int. à l'Hist. du Bouddhisme Indien, p. 422.

c. 1333.—"The lak is a sum of 100,000 dīnārs (i.e. of silver); this sum is equivalent to 10,000 dīnārs of gold, Indian money; and the Indian (gold) dīnār is worth 2½ dīnārs in money of the West (Maghrab)."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 106.

1859.—"Cosmas Indicopleustes remarked that the Roman denarius was received all over the world; * and how the denarius came to mean in India a gold ornament we may learn from a passage in the 'Life of Mahāvira.' There it is said that a lady had around her neck a string of grains and golden dīnārs, and Stevenson adds that the custom of stringing coins together, and adorning with them children especially, is still very common in India."—Max Müller, Hist. of Sanskrit Literature, 247.

DINGY, DINGHY, s. Beng. dingī; [H. dingī, dengī, another form of dongī, Skt. drona, 'a trough.'] A small boat or skiff; sometimes also 'a canoe,' i.e. dug out of a single trunk. This word is not merely Anglo-Indian; it has become legitimately incorporated in the vocabulary of the British navy, as the name of the smallest ship's boat; [in this sense, according to the N.E.D., first in Midshipman Easy (1836)]. Dingā occurs as the name of some kind of war-boat used by the Portuguese in the defence of Hugli in 1631 ("Sixty-four large dīngas"; Elliot, vii. 34). The word dingī is also used for vessels of size in the quotation from Tippoo. Sir J. Campbell, in the Bombay Gazetteer, says that dhangī is a large vessel belonging to the Mekrān coast; the word is said to mean 'a log' in Bilūchī. In Guzerat the larger vessel seems to be called dangā; and besides this there is dhangī, like a canoe, but built, not dug out.

[1610.—"I have brought with me the pinnace and her ginge for better performance."—Danvers, Letters, i. 61.]

1705.—". . . pour aller à terre on est obligé de se servir d'un petit Bateau dont les bords sont très hauts, qu'on appelle Dingues. . . ."—Luiller, 39.

1785.—"Propose to the merchants of Muscat . . . to bring hither, on the Dingies, such horses as they may have for sale; which, being sold to us, the owner can carry back the produce in rice."—Letters of Tippoo, 6.

1810.—"On these larger pieces of water there are usually canoes, or dingies."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 59.

[1813.—"The Indian pomegranates . . . are by no means equal to those brought

* The passage referred to is probably that where Cosmas relates an adventure of his friend Sopatrus, a trader in Taprobane, or Ceylon, at the king's court. A Persian present brags of the power and wealth of his own monarch. Sopatrus says nothing till the king calls on him for an answer. He appeals to the king to compare the Roman gold denarius (called by Cosmas νόμισμα), and the Persian silver drachma, both of which were at hand, and to judge for himself which suggested the greater monarch. "Now the nomisma was a coin of right good ring and fine ruddy gold, bright in metal and elegant in execution, for such coins are picked on purpose to take thither, whilst the miliaresion (or drachma), to say it in one word, was of silver, and of course bore no comparison with the gold coin," &c. In another passage he says that elephants in Taprobane were sold at from 50 to 100 nomismata and more, which seems to imply that the gold denarii were actually current in Ceylon. See the passages at length in Cathay, &c., pp. clxxix-clxxx.

DIU.

DIUL-SIND, n.p. A name by which Sind is often called in early European narratives, taken up by the authors, no doubt, like so many other prevalent names, from the Arab traders who had preceded them. Dewal or Daibul was a once celebrated city and seaport of Sind, mentioned by all the old Arabian geographers, and believed to have stood at or near the site of modern Karāchī. It had the name from a famous temple (devālyā), probably a Buddhist shrine, which existed there, and which was destroyed by the Mahommedans in 711. The name of Dewal long survived the city itself, and the specific addition of Sind or Sindī being added, probably to distinguish it from some other place of resembling name, the name of Dewal-Sind or Sindī came to be attached to the delta of the Indus.

c. 700.—The earliest mention of Dewal that we are aware of is in a notice of Chinese Voyages to the Persian Gulf under the T'ang dynasty (7th and 8th centuries) quoted by Deguignes. In this the ships, after leaving Tiyu (Diu) sailed 10 days further to another Tiyu near the great river Milan or Sinteu. This was, no doubt, Dewal near the great Mihrān or Sindhu, i.e. Indus.—Mém. de l'Acad. des Insc. xxxii. 367.

c. 880.—“There was at Debal a lofty temple (budd) surmounted by a long pole, and on the pole was fixed a red flag, which when the breeze blew was unfurled over the city . . . Muhammad informed Hajjāj of what he had done, and solicited advice. . . . One day a reply was received to this effect:—‘Fix the manjansk . . . call the manjansk-master, and tell him to aim at the flag-staff of which you have given a description.’ So he brought down the flagstaff, and it was broken; at which the infidels were sore afflicted.”—Bilāduri, in Elliot, i. 120.

c. 900.—“From Nārmāsīrā to Debal is 8 days’ journey, and from Debal to the junction of the river Mihrān with the sea, is 2 parasangs.”—Ibn Khordādbah, in Elliot, i. 15.

976.—“The City of Debal is to the west of the Mihrān, towards the sea. It is a large mart, and the port not only of this, but of the neighbouring regions. . . .”—Ibn Haukal, in Elliot, i. 37.

c. 1150.—“The place is inhabited only because it is a station for the vessels of Sind and other countries . . . ships laden with the productions of ‘Umān, and the vessels of China and India come to Debal.”—Idrisi, in Elliot, i. p. 77.

1228.—“All that country down to the seashore was subdued. Malik Sinān-ud-dīn Habsh, chief of Dewal and Sind, came and did homage to the Sultan.”—Tabakāt-i-Nāsiri, in Elliot, ii. 326.

[1513.—“And thence we had sight of Diulcindy.”—Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 239.]

1516.—“Leaving the Kingdom of Ormuz . . . the coast goes to the South-east for 172 leagues as far as Diulcinde, entering the Kingdom of Ulcinde, which is between Persia and India.”—Barbosa, 49.

1553.—“From this Cape Jasque to the famous river Indus are 200 leagues, in which space are these places Guadel, Calara, Calamente, and Diul, the last situated on the most westerly mouth of the Indus.”—De Barros, Dec. I. liv. ix. cap. i.

c. 1554.—“If you guess that you may be drifting to Jaked . . . you must try to go to Karāushi, or to enter Khur (the estuary of) Diul Sind.”—The Mohit, in J. As. Soc. Ben. v. 463.

“He offered me the town of Lahori, i.e. Diuli Sind, but as I did not accept it I begged him for leave to depart.”—Sidi ‘Alī Kapudān, in Journ. As. 1st Ser. tom. ix. 131.

[1557.—Couto says that the Italians who travelled overland before the Portuguese discovered the sea route ‘found on the other side on the west those people called Diulis, so called from their chief city named Diul, where they settled, and whence they passed to Cinde.’]

1572.—

“Olha a terra de Ulcinde fertilissima
E de Jaquete a intima enseada.”

Camões, x. cvi.

1614.—“At Diulsinde the Expedition in her former Voyage had deliuered Sir Robert Sherley the Persian Embassadour.”—Capt. W. Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

[1616.—“The riuer Indus doth not powre himself into the sea by the bay of Cambaya, but far westward, at Sindu.”—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 122.]

1638.—“Les Perses et les Arabes donnent au Royaume de Sindo le nom de Diul.”—Mandelslo, 114.

c. 1650.—Diul is marked in Blaeu’s great Atlas on the W. of the most westerly mouth of the Indus.

c. 1666.—“. . . la ville la plus Méridionale est Diul. On la nomme encore Diul-Sind, et autrefois on l’a appelée Dobil. . . . Il y a des Orientaux qui donnent le nom de Diul au País de Sinde.”—Thevenot, v. 158.

1727.—“All that shore from Jasques to Sindy, inhabited by uncivilized People, who admit of no Commerce with Strangers, tho’ Guaddel and Diul, two Sea-ports, did about a Century ago afford a good Trade.”—A. Hamilton, i. 115; [ed. 1744].

1753.—“Celui (le bras du Sind) de la droite, après avoir passé à Fairuz, distant ce Mansora de trois journées selon Edrisi, se rend à Debil ou Diul, au quel nom on ajoûte quelque fois celui de Sindi. . . . La ville est située sur une langue de terre en forme de péninsule, d’où je pense que lui vient son nom actuel de Diul ou Diul, DONDERA HEAD.

DONEY, DHONY, s. In S. India, a small native vessel, properly formed (at least the lower part of it) from a single tree. Tamil. tōni. Dr. Gundert suggests as the origin Skt. drona, 'a wooden vessel.' But it is perhaps connected with the Tamil tonduga, 'to scoop out'; and the word would then be exactly analogous to the Anglo-American 'dug-out.' In the J.R.A.S. vol. i. is a paper by Mr. Edye, formerly H.M.'s Master Shipwright in Ceylon, on the native vessels of South India, and among others he describes the Doni (p. 13), with a drawing to scale. He calls it "a huge vessel of ark-like form, about 70 feet long, 20 feet broad, and 12 feet deep; with a flat bottom or keel part, which at the broadest place is 7 feet; . . . the whole equipment of these rude vessels, as well as their construction, is the most coarse and unseaworthy that I have ever seen." From this it would appear that the doney is no longer a 'dug-out,' as the suggested etymology, and Pyrard de Laval's express statement, indicate it to have been originally.

1552.—Castanheda already uses the word as Portuguese: "foy logo cōtra ho tone."—iii. 22.

1553.—"Vasco da Gama having started . . . on the following day they were becalmed rather more than a league and a half from Calicut, when there came towards them more than 60 tonés, which are small vessels, crowded with people."—Barros, I. iv., xi.

1561.—The word constantly occurs in this form (toné) in Correa, e.g. vol. i. pt. 1, 403, 502, &c.

[1598.—". . . certaine scutes or Skiffes called Tones."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 56.]

1606.—There is a good description of the vessel in Gouvea, f. 29.

c. 1610.—"Le basteau s'appelloit Donny, c'est à dire oiseau, pource qu'il estoit proviste de voiles."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 65; [Hak. Soc. i. 86].

„ "La plupart de leurs vaisseaux sont d'une seule piece, qu'ils appellent Tonny, et les Portugais Almediés (Almadia)."—Ibid. i. 278; [Hak. Soc. i. 389].

1644.—"They have in this city of Cochin certain boats which they call Tones, in which they navigate the shallow rivers, which have 5 or 6 palms of depth, 15 or 20 cubits in length, and with a broad parana of 5 or 6 palms, so that they build above an upper story called Baylen, like a little house, thatched with Ola (Ollah), and closed at the sides. This contains many passengers, who go to amuse themselves on the rivers, and there are spent in this way many thousands of cruzados."—Bocarro MS.

1666.—". . . with 110 paraos, and 100 catures (see PROW, CATUR) and 80 tonées of broad beam, full of people . . . the enemy displayed himself on the water to our caravels."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Portug. i. 66.

1672.—". . . four fishermen from the town came over to us in a Tony."—Baldacus, Ceylon (Dutch ed.), 89.

[1821.—In Travels on Foot through the Island of Ceylon, by J. Haafner, translated from the Dutch (Phillip's New Voyages and Travels, v. 6, 79), the words "thonij," "thony's" of the original are translated Funny, Funnies; this is possibly a misprint for Tunnies, which appears on p. 66 as the rendering of "thonij's." See Notes and Queries, 9th ser. iv. 183.]

1860.—"Amongst the vessels at anchor (at Galle) lie the dows of the Arabs, the Patamars of Malabar, the dhoneys of Coromandel."—Tennant's Ceylon, ii. 103.

DOOB, s. H. dūb, from Skt. dūrva. A very nutritious creeping grass (Cynodon dactylon, Pers.), spread very generally in India. In the hot weather of Upper India, when its growth is scanty, it is eagerly sought for horses by the 'grass-cutters.' The natives, according to Roxburgh, quoted by Drury, cut the young leaves and make a cooling drink from the roots. The popular etymology, from dhūp, 'sunshine,' has no foundation. Its merits, its lowly gesture, its spreading quality, give it a frequent place in native poetry.

1810.—"The doob is not to be found everywhere; but in the low countries about Dacca . . . this grass abounds; attaining to a prodigious luxuriance."—Williamson, V. M. i. 259.

DOOCAUN, s. Ar. dukkān, Pers. and H. dukān, 'a shop'; dukāndār, 'a shopkeeper.'

1554.—"And when you buy in the dukāns (nos ducōes), they don't give picotaa (see PICOTA), and so the Dukāndārs (as Ducamdares) gain. . . ."—A. Nunes, 22.

1810.—"L'estrade élevée sur laquelle le marchand est assis, et d'où il montre sa marchandise aux acheteurs, est proprement ce qu'on appelle dukān; mot qui signifie, suivant son étymologie, une estrade ou plateforme, sur laquelle on se peut tenir assis, et que nous traduisons improprement par boutique."—Note by Silvestre de Sacy, in Relation de l'Egypte, 304.

[1832.—"The Dukhauns (shops) small, with the whole front open towards the street."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, ii. 36.]

1885.—“The shop (dookhān) is a square room, or cell, generally about 8 or 7 feet high. . . . Its floor is even with the top of a mustabāh, or raised seat of stone or brick, built against the front.”—Lane's Med. Egyptians, ed. 1898, ii. 9.

DOOMBUR, s. The name commonly given in India to the fat-tailed sheep, breeds of which are spread over West Asia and East Africa. The word is properly Pera. dumba, dumba; dumb, ‘tail,’ or especially this fat tail. The old story of little carts being attached to the quarters of these sheep to bear their tails is found in many books, but it is difficult to trace any modern evidence of the fact. We quote some passages bearing on it:

c. A.D. 250.—“The tails of the sheep (of India) reach to their feet. . . . The shepherds . . . cut open the tails and take out the tallow, and then sew it up again. . . .”—Adrian, De Nat. Animal. iv. 32.

1296.—“Then there are sheep here as big as asses; and their tails are so large and fat, that one tail shall weigh some 30 lbs. They are fine fat beasts, and afford capital mutton.”—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 18.

1486.—“Their iijth kinde of beasts are sheepe, which be unreasonable great, longe legged, longe woll, and great tayles, that waie about xijl. a piece. And some such I have seene as have drawen a wheele afre them, their tayles being holden vp.”—Jos. Barbaro, Hak. Soc. 21.

c. 1520.—“These sheep are not different from others, except as regards the tail, which is very large, and the fatter the sheep is the bigger is his tail. Some of them have tails weighing 10 and 20 pounds, and that will happen when they get fat of their own accord. But in Egypt many persons make a business of fattening sheep, and feed them on bran and wheat, and then the tail gets so big that the sheep can't stir. But those who keep them tie the tail on a kind of little cart, and in this way they move about. I saw one sheep's tail of this kind at Asiot, a city of Egypt 150 miles from Cairo, on the Nile, which weighed 80 lbs., and many people asserted that they have seen such tails that weighed 150 lbs.”—Leo Africanus, in Ramusio, i. f. 92v.

[c. 1510.—“The tails of rams and ewes are wondrous big and heavy; one we weighed (in the Island of St. Lawrence) turned 28 pounds.”—Pyrard de Laui, i. 36.

[1612.—“Goodly Barbary sheep with great rumps.”—Danvers, Letters, i. 178.]

1828.—“We had a Doomba ram at Prag. The Doomba sheep are difficult to keep alive in this climate.”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 28.

1846.—“I was informed by a person who possessed large flocks, and who had no reason to deceive me, that sometimes the tail of the Tymnanee doombas increased to such a size, that a cart or small truck on wheels was necessary to support the weight, and that without it the animal could not wander about; he declared also that he had produced tails in his flock which weighed 12 Tubroori munda, or 48 seris puckah, equal to about 96 lbs.”—Captain Hutton, in Four As. Soc. Beng. xv. 160.

DOOPUTTY, s. Hind. do-pattah, dupatta, &c. A piece of stuff of ‘two breadths,’ a sheet. “The principal or only garment of women of the lower orders” (in Bengal—Wilson). [“Formerly these pieces were woven narrow, and joined alongside of one another to produce the proper width; now, however, the dupatta is all woven in one piece. This is a piece of cloth worn entire as it comes from the loom. It is worn either round the head or over the shoulders, and is used by both men and women, Hindu and Muham-madan” (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 71).] Applied in S. India by native servants, when speaking their own language, to European bed-sheets.

[1615.—“ . . . dubeties gouserama.”—Forster, Letters, iii. 156.]

DOORGA POOJA, s. Skt. Durgā-pūjā, ‘Worship of Durga.’ The chief Hindu festival in Bengal, lasting for 10 days in September–October, and forming the principal holiday-time of all the Calcutta offices. (See DUSSEERA.) [The common term for these holidays nowadays is ‘the Poojahs.’]

c. 1835.—

“And every Doorga Pooja would good Mr. Simms explore
The famous river Hoogly up as high as Barrackpore.”

Lines in honour of the late Mr. Simms, Bote Ponjia, 1857, ii. 220.

[1900.—“Calcutta has been in the throes of the Pujahs since yesterday.”—Pioneer Mail, Oct. 5.]

DOORSUMMUND, n.p. Dūra-samand; a corrupt form of Dudra-Samudra (Gate of the Sea), the name of the capital of the Balālās, a medieval dynasty in S. India, who ruled a country generally corresponding with Mysore. [See Rice, Mysore, ii. 353.] The city itself is identified with the fine ruins at Halabidu [Hale-bidu, ‘old capital’], in the Hassan district of Mysore.

c. 1300.—“There is another country called Deogir. Its capital is called Dūrū Samundūr.”—Rashidudin, in Elliot, i. 73. (There is confusion in this.)

1309.—“The royal army marched from this place towards the country of Dūr Samun.”—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 49.

1310.—“On Sunday, the 23rd . . . he took a select body of cavalry with him, and on the 5th Shawwāl reached the fort of Dhūr Samund, after a difficult march of 12 days.”—Amir Khusrū, ibid. 88. See also Notices et Extraits, xiii. 171.

DORADO, s. Port. A kind of fish; apparently a dolphin (not the cetaceous animal so called). The Coryphaena hippurus of Day's Fishes is called by Cuvier and Valenciennes C. dorado. See also quotation from Drake. One might doubt, because of the praise of its flavour in Bontius, whilst Day only says of the C. hippurus that “these dolphins are eaten by natives.” Fryer, however, uses an expression like that of Bontius:—“The Dolphin is extolled beyond these,”—i.e. Bonito and Albicore (p. 12).

1578.—“When he is chased of the Bonito, or great mackrel (whom the Aurata or Dolphin also pursueth).”—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc. 32.

1631.—“Pisces Dorados dicti a Portugalensibus, ab aureo quem ferunt in cute colore . . . hic piscis est longe optimi saporis, Bonitas bonitate excellens.”—Jac. Bontii, Lib. V. cap. xix. 73.

DORAY, DURAI, s. This is a South Indian equivalent of Sāhib (q.v.); Tel. dora, Tam. turai, ‘Master.’ Sinnaturai, ‘small gentleman’ is the equivalent of Chhota Sāhib, a junior officer; and Tel. dorasāni, Tam. turaisāni (corruptly doresāni) of ‘Lady’ or ‘Madam.’

1680.—“The delivery of three Iron guns to the Deura of Ramacole at the rate of 15 Pagodas per candy is ordered . . . which is much more than what they cost.”—Fort St. Geo. Cons., Aug. 5. In Notes and Extracts, No. iii. p. 31.

1837.—“The Vakeels stand behind their masters during all the visit, and discuss with them all that A— says. Sometimes they tell him some barefaced lie, and when they find he does not believe it, they turn to me grinning, and say, ‘Ma’am, the Doory plenty cunning gentleman.’”—Letters from Madras, 86.

1882.—“The appellation by which Sir T. Munro was most commonly known in the Ceded Districts was that of ‘Colonel Dora.’ And to this day it is considered a sufficient answer to inquiries regarding the reason for any Revenue Rule, that it was laid down by the Colonel Dora.”—Arbuthnot's Memoir of Sir T. M., p. xcvi.

“A village up the Godavery, on the left bank, is inhabited by a race of people known as Doraylu, or ‘gentlemen.’ That this is the understood meaning is shown by the fact that their women are called Doresandlu, i.e. ‘ladies.’ These people rifle their arrow feathers, i.e. give them a spiral.” (Reference lost.) [These are perhaps the Kois, who are called by the Telingas Koidhoras, “the word dhora meaning ‘gentleman’ or Sāhib.”—(Central Prov. Gaz. 500; also see Ind. Ant. viii. 34)].

DORIA, s. H. doriya, from dor, dorī, ‘a cord or leash’; a dog-keeper.

1781.—“Stolen . . . The Dog was taken out of Capt. Law's Baggage Boat . . . by the Durreer that brought him to Calcutta.”—India Gazette, March 17.

[Doriya is also used for a kind of cloth. “As the characteristic pattern of the charkhna is a check, so that of the doriya is stripes running along the length of the thdn, i.e. in warp threads. The doriya was originally a cotton fabric, but it is now manufactured in silk, silk-and-cotton, tasar, and other combinations” (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 94).

[c. 1590.—In a list of cotton cloths, we have “Doriyah, per piece, 6R. to 2M.”—Āin, i. 95.

[1683.—“ . . . 3 pieces Dooreas.”—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.]

DOSOOTY, s. H. do-sūtī, do-sūtd, ‘double thread,’ a kind of cheap cotton stuff woven with threads doubled.

[1843.—“The other pair (of travelling baskets) is simply covered with dosootee (a coarse double-threaded cotton).”—Davidson, Diary in Upper India, i. 10.]

DOUBLE-GRILL, s. Domestic H. of the kitchen for ‘a devil’ in the culinary sense.

DOUR, s. A foray, or a hasty expedition of any kind. H. daur, ‘a run.’ Also to dour, ‘to run,’ or ‘to make such an expedition.’

1853.—“‘Halloa! Oakfield,’ cried Perkins, as he entered the mess tent . . . ‘don’t look down in the mouth, man; Attok taken, Chutter Sing dauring down like the devil—march to-morrow. . . .’”—Oakfield, ii. 67.

DOW, s. H. ddo, [Skt. datra, da, ‘to cut’]. A name much used on the Eastern frontier of Bengal as w^r —

by Europeans in Burma, for the hewing knife or bill, of various forms, carried by the races of those regions, and used both for cutting jungle and as a sword. Dhā is the true Burmese name for their weapon of this kind, but we do not know if there is any relation but an accidental one with the Hind. word. [See drawing in Egerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, p. 84.]

[1870.—“The Dao is the hill knife. . . . It is a blade about 18 inches long, narrow at the haft, and square and broad at the tip; pointless, and sharpened on one side only. The blade is set in a handle of wood; a bamboo root is considered the best. The fighting dao is differently shaped; this is a long pointless sword, set in a wooden or ebony handle; it is very heavy, and a blow of almost incredible power can be given by one of these weapons. . . . The weapon is identical with the ‘parang latok’ of the Malays. . . .”—Lewin, Wild Races of S.E. India, 35 seq.]

DOWLE, s. H. daul, daulā. The ridge of clay marking the boundary between two rice fields, and retaining the water; called commonly in S. India a bund. It is worth noting that in Sussex dool is “a small conical heap of earth, to mark the bounds of farms and parishes in the downs” (Wright, Dict. of Obs. and Prov. English). [The same comparison was made by Sir H. Elliot (Supp. Gloss, s.v. Doula); the resemblance is merely accidental; see N.E.D. s.v. Dool.]

1851.—“In the N.W. corner of Suffolk, where the country is almost entirely open, the boundaries of the different parishes are marked by earthen mounds from 3 to 6 feet high, which are known in the neighbourhood as dools.”—Notes and Queries, 1st Series, vol. iv. p. 161.

DOWRA, s. A guide. H. daurādhā, daurahā, daurā, ‘a village runner, a guide,’ from daurnā, ‘to run,’ Skt. drava, ‘running.’

[DRABI, DRABY, s. The Indian camp-followers’ corruption of the English ‘driver.’

[1900.—“The mule race for Drabis and grass-cutters was entertaining.”—Pioneer Mail, March 16.]

DRAVIDIAN, adj. The Skt. term Drāvida seems to have been originally the name of the Conjevaram Kingdom (4th to 11th cent. A.D.), but in recent times it has been used as equivalent to ‘Tamil.’ About A.D. 700 Kumārila Bhaṭṭa calls the language of the South Andhradrāvida-bhāṣā, meaning probably, as Bishop Caldwell suggests, what we should now describe as ‘Telegu-Tamil-language.’ Indeed he has shown reason for believing that Tamil and Drāvida, of which Dramida (written Tiramida), and Dramila are old forms, are really the same word. [Also see Oppert, Orig. Inhab. 25 seq., and Draviru, in a quotation from Al-biruni under MALABAR.] It may be suggested as possible that the Tropina of Pliny is also the same (see below). Dr. Caldwell proposed Dravidian as a convenient name for the S. Indian languages which belong to the Tamil family, and the cultivated members of which are Tamil, Malayālam, Canarese, Tulu, Kudagu (or Coorg), and Telegu; the uncultivated Tuda, Kōta, Gōṇḍ, Khond, Orāon, Rājmahāli. [It has also been adopted as an ethnological term to designate the non-Aryan races of India (see Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. Intro. xxxi.).]

c. A.D. 70.—“From the mouth of Ganges where he entereth into the sea unto the cape Calington, and the town Dandagula, are counted 725 miles; from thence to Tropina where standeth the chiefe mart or towne of merchandise in all India, 1225 miles. Then to the promontorie of Perimula they reckon 750 miles, from which to the towne abovesaid Patale . . . 620.”—Pliny, by Phil. Holland, vi. chap. xx.

A.D. 404.—In a south-western direction are the following tracts . . . Surashtrians, Bādaras, and Drāvidas.—Varāha-mihira, in J.R.A.S., 2nd ser. v. 84.

“The eastern half of the Narbadda district . . . the Pulindas, the eastern half of the Drāvidas . . . of all these the Sun is the Lord.”—Ibid. p. 231.

c. 1045.—“Moreover, chief of the sons of Bharata, there are, the nations of the South, the Drāvidas . . . the Karnātakas, Māhishakas. . . .”—Vishnu Purāna, by H. H. Wilson, 1865, ii. 177 seq.

1856.—“The idioms which are included in this work under the general term ‘Dravidian’ constitute the vernacular speech of the great majority of the inhabitants of S. India.”—Caldwell, Comp. Grammar of the Dravidian Languages, 1st ed.

1869.—“The people themselves arrange their countrymen under two heads; five termed Panch-gaura, belonging to the Hindi, or as it is now generally called, the Aryan group, and the remaining five, or Panch-Dravida, to the Tamil type."—Sir W. Elliot, in J. Ethn. Soc. N.S. i. 94.

DRAWERS, LONG, s. An old-fashioned term, probably obsolete except in Madras, equivalent to pyjamas (q.v.).

1794.—"The contractor shall engage to supply . . . every patient . . . with . . . a clean gown, cap, shirt, and long drawers."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 115.

DRESSING-BOY, DRESS-BOY, s. Madras term for the servant who acts as valet, corresponding to the bearer (q.v.) of N. India.

1837.—See Letters from Madras, 106.

DRUGGERMAN, s. Neither this word for an 'interpreter,' nor the Levantine dragoman, of which it was a quaint old English corruption, is used in Anglo-Indian colloquial; nor is the Arab tarjūmān, which is the correct form, a word usual in Hindustāni. But the character of the two former words seems to entitle them not to be passed over in this Glossary. The Arabic is a loan-word from Aramaic targēmdn, me-targēmdn, 'an interpreter'; the Jewish Targums, or Chaldee paraphrases of the Scriptures, being named from the same root. The original force of the Aramaic root is seen in the Assyrian ragāmu, 'to speak,' rigmu, 'the word.' See Proc. Soc. Bibl. Arch., 1883, p. 73, and Delitsch, The Hebrew Lang. viewed in the Light of Assyrian Research, p. 50. In old Italian we find a form somewhat nearer to the Arabic. (See quotation from Pegolotti below.)

c. 1150?—"Quorum lingua cum prae-nominato Iohanni, Indorum patriarchae, nimis esset obscura, quod neque ipse quod Romani dicerent, neque Romani quod ipse diceret intelligerent, interprete interposito, quem Achivi drogomanum vocant, de mutuo statu Romanorum et Indicae regionis ad invicem querere coeperunt."—De Adventu Patriarchae Indorum, printed in Zarncke, Der Priester Johannes, i. 12. Leipzig, 1879.

c. 1270.—"After this my address to the assembly, I sent my message to Elx by a dragoman (trujaman) of mine."—Chron. of James of Aragon, tr. by Foster, ii. 538.

Villehardouin, early in the 13th century, uses drughement, [and for other early forms see N.E.D. s.v. Dragoman.]

c. 1309.—"Il avoit gens illec qui savoient le Sarrasinnois et le françois que l'on apelle drugemens, qui enromancoient le Sarrasinnois au Conte Perron."—Joinville, ed. de Wailly, 182.

c. 1343.—"And at Tana you should furnish yourself with dragomans (turci-manni)."—Pegolotti's Handbook, in Cathay, &c., ii. 291, and App. iii.

1404.—". . . el maestro en Theologia dixo por su Truximan que dicesse al Señor q̄ aquella carta que su fijo el rey le embiara non la sabia otro leer, salvo el. . . ."—Clavijo, 446.

1585.—". . . e dopo m'esservi prouisto di vn buonissimo dragomano, et interprete, fu inteso il suono delle trombette le quali annuntianano l'udienza del Rè" (di Pegù).—Gasparo Balbi, f. 102r.

1613.—"To the Trojan Shoare, where I landed Feb. 22 with fourteene English men more, and a Iew or Druggerman."—T. Coryat, in Purchas, ii. 1813.

1615.—"E dietro, a cavallo, i dragomanni, cioè interpreti della repubblica e con loro tutti i dragomanni degli altri ambasciatori ai loro luoghi."—P. della Valle, i. 89.

1738.—
"Till I cried out, you prove yourself so able,
Pity! you was not Druggerman at Babel!
For had they found a linguist half so good,
I make no question that the Tower had stood."—Pope, after Donne, Sat. iv. 81.

Other forms of the word are (from Span. trujaman) the old French truchement, Low Latin drocmandus, turchimannus, Low Greek δραγούμανος, &c.

DRUMSTICK, s. The colloquial name in the Madras Presidency for the long slender pods of the Moringa pterygosperma, Gaertner, the Horse-Radish Tree (q.v.) of Bengal.

c. 1790.—"Mon domestique étoit occupé à me préparer un plat de morungas, qui sont une espèce de fèves longues, auxquelles les Européens ont donné, à cause de leur forme, le nom de baguettes à tambour. . ."—Haafner, ii. 25.

DUB, s. Telugu dabbu, Tam. idappu; a small copper coin, the same as the doody (see CASH), value 20 cash; whence it comes to stand for money in general. It is curious that we have also an English provincial word, "Dubs = money, E. Sussex" (Holloway, Gen. Dict. of Provincialisms, Lewes, 1838). And the slang 'to dub up,' for to pay up, is common (see Slang Dict.).

1781.—“In ‘Table of Prison Expenses and articles of luxury only to be attained by the opulent, after a length of saving’ (i.e. in captivity in Mysore), we have—“Eight cheroots . . . 0 1 0.

“The prices are in fanams, dubs, and cash. The fanam changes for 11 dubs and 4 cash.”—In Lives of the Lindsays, iii.

c. 1790.—“J’eus pour quatre dabous, qui font environ cinq sous de France, d’excellent poisson pour notre souper.”—Haafner, ii. 75.

DUBASH, DOBASH, DEBASH,

s. H. dubhāshiyā, dobāshī (lit. ‘man of two languages’), Tam. tupāshi. An interpreter; obsolete except at Madras, and perhaps there also now, at least in its original sense; [now it is applied to a dressing-boy or other servant with a European.] The Dubash was at Madras formerly a usual servant in every household; and there is still one attached to each mercantile house, as the broker transacting business with natives, and corresponding to the Calcutta banyan (q.v.). According to Drummond the word has a peculiar meaning in Guzerat: “A Doobasheo in Guzerat is viewed as an evil spirit, who by telling lies, sets people by the ears.” This illustrates the original meaning of dubash, which might be rendered in Bunyan’s fashion as Mr. Two-Tongues.

[1566.—“Bring toopaz and interpreter, Antonio Fernandes.”—India Office MSS. Gaveta’s agreement with the jangadas of the fort of Quilon, Aug. 13.

[1664.—“Per nossa conta a ambos por manilha 400 fanoim e ao tupay 50 fanoim.”—Letter of Zamorin, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 1.]

1673.—“The Moors are very grave and haughty in their Demeanor, not vouchsafing to return an Answer by a slave, but by a Deubash.”—Fryer, 30.

[1679.—“The Dubass of this Factory having to regain his freedom.”—S. Master, in Man. of Kistna Dist. 133.]

1693.—“The chief Dubash was ordered to treat . . . for putting a stop to their proceedings.”—Wheeler, i. 279.

1780.—“He ordered his Dubash to give the messenger two pagodas (sixteen shillings);—it was poor reward for having received two wounds, and risked his life in bringing him intelligence.”—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 26.

1800.—“The Dubash there ought to be hanged for having made difficulties in collecting the rice.”—Letter of Sir A. Wellesley, in do. 259.

c. 1804.—“I could neither understand them nor they me; but they would not give me up until a Debash, whom Mrs. Sherwood had hired . . . came to my relief with a palanquin.”—Autobiog. of Mrs. Sherwood, 272.

1809.—“He (Mr. North) drove at once from the coast the tribe of Aumils and Debashes.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 315.

1810.—“In this first boat a number of debashes are sure to arrive.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 133.

“The Dubashes, then all powerful at Madras, threatened loss of caste, and absolute destruction to any Bramin who should dare to unveil the mysteries of their sacred language.”—Morton’s Life of Leyden, 30.

1860.—“The moodliars and native officers . . . were superseded by Malabar Dubashes, men aptly described as enemies to the religion of the Singhalese, strangers to their habits, and animated by no impulse but extortion.”—Tennent’s Ceylon, ii. 72.

DUBBER, s. P.—H. dabīr, ‘a writer or secretary.’ It occurs in Pehlevi as debīr, connected with the old Pers. dipi, ‘writing.’ The word is quite obsolete in Indian use.

1760.—“The King . . . referred the adjustment to his Dubbeer, or minister, which, amongst the Indians, is equivalent to the Duan of the Mahomedan Princes.”—Orme, ii. § ii. 601.

DUBBER, s. Hind. (from Pers.) dabbah; also, according to Wilson, Guzerāti dabaro; Mahr. dabara. A large oval vessel, made of green buffalo-hide, which, after drying and stiffening, is used for holding and transporting ghee or oil. The word is used in North and South alike.

1554.—“Butter (a māmteiga, i.e. ghee) sells by the maund, and comes hither (to Ormuz) from Bacoraa and from Reyxel (see RESH-IRE); the most (however) that comes to Ormuz is from Diul and from Mangalor, and comes in certain great jars of hide, dabaas.”—A. Nunes, 23.

1673.—“Did they not boil their Butter it would be rank, but after it has passed the Fire they keep it in Duppers the year round.”—Fryer, 118.

1727.—(From the Indus Delta.) “They export great quantities of Butter, which they gently melt and put up in Jars called Duppas, made of the Hides of Cattle, almost in the Figure of a Glob, with a Neck and Mouth on one side.”—A. Hamilton, i. 126; [ed. 1744, i. 127].

1808.—“Purbhoodas Shet of Broach, in whose books a certain Mahratta Sirdar is said to stand debtor for a Crore of Rupees . . . in early life brought . . . ghee in dubbers upon his own head hither from Baroda, and retailed it . . . in open Bazar.”—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

1810.—“... dubbahs or bottles made of green hide.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 139.

1845.—“I find no account made out by the prisoner of what became of these dubbas of ghee.”—G. O. by Sir C. Napier, in Sind, 35.

DUCKS, s. The slang distinctive name for gentlemen belonging to the Bombay service; the correlative of the Mulls of Madras and of the Qui-His of Bengal. It seems to have been taken from the term next following.

1803.—“I think they manage it here famously. They have neither the comforts of a Bengal army, nor do they rough it, like the Ducks.”—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 53.

1860.—“Then came Sire Jhone by Waye of Baldagh and Hormuz to yē Costys of Ynde . . . And atte what Place yē Knyghte came to Londe, theyre yē ffolke clepen Duckys (quasi DUCES INDIAE).”—Extract from a MS. of the Travels of Sir John Maunde vill in the E. Indies, lately discovered (Calcutta).

[In the following the word is a corruption of the Tam. tūtku, a weight equal to $1\frac{1}{4}$ viss, about 3 lbs. 13 oz.

[1787.—“We have fixed the produce of each vine at 4 ducks of wet pepper.”—Purwannah of Tippoo Sultan, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 125.]

DUCKS, BOMBAY. See BUM-MELO.

1860.—“A fish nearly related to the salmon is dried and exported in large quantities from Bombay, and has acquired the name of Bombay Ducks.”—Mason, Burmah, 273.

DUFFADAR, s. Hind. (from Arabo-Pers.) daf'adār, the exact rationale of which name it is not easy to explain, [daf'a, ‘a small body, a section,’ daf'adār, ‘a person in charge of a small body of troops’]. A petty officer of native police (v. burkundauze, v.); and in regiments of Irregular Cavalry, a non-commissioned officer corresponding in rank to a corporal or naik.

1803.—“The pay . . . for the duffadars ought not to exceed 35 rupees.”—Wellington, ii. 242.

DUFTER, s. Ar.—H. daftar. Colloquially ‘the office,’ and interchangeable with cutcherry, except that the latter generally implies an office of the nature of a Court. Daftar-khāna is more accurate, [but this usually means rather a record-room where documents are stored]. The original Arab. daftar is from the Greek διφθέρα = membranum, ‘a parchment,’ and thin ‘paper’ (whence also diphtheria), and was applied to loose sheets filed on a string, which formed the record of accounts; hence daftar becomes ‘a register,’ a public record. In Arab. any account-book is still a daftar, and in S. India daftar means a bundle of connected papers tied up in a cloth, [the basta of Upper India].

c. 1590.—“Honest experienced officers upon whose forehead the stamp of correctness shines, write the agreement upon loose pages and sheets, so that the transaction cannot be forgotten. These loose sheets, into which all sanads are entered, are called the daftar.”—Āin, i. 260, and see Blochmann's note there.

[1757.—“... that after the expiration of the year they take a discharge according to custom, and that they deliver the accounts of their Zemindarry agreeable to the stated forms every year into the Dufter Cana of the Sircar. . . .”—Sunnud for the Company's Zemindarry, in Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 147.]

DUFTERDAR, s. Ar. — P. — H. daftardār, is or was “the head native revenue officer on the Collector's and Sub-Collector's establishment of the Bombay Presidency” (Wilson). In the provinces of the Turkish Empire the Daftardār was often a minister of great power and importance, as in the case of Mahommed Bey Daftardār, in Egypt in the time of Mahommed 'Ali Pasha (see Lane's Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1860, pp. 127-128). The account of the constitution of the office of Daftardār in the time of the Mongol conqueror of Persia, Hulāgū, will be found in a document translated by Hammer-Purgstall in his Gesch. der Goldenen Horde, 497-501.

DUFTERY, s. Hind. daftari. A servant in an Indian office (Bengal), whose business it is to look after the condition of the records, dusting and binding them; also to pen-mending, paper-ruling, making of envelopes, &c. In Madras these offices are done by a Moochy. [For the military sense of the word in Afghanistan, see quotation from Ferrier below.]

1810.—“The Duftoree or office-keeper attends solely to those general matters in an office which do not come within the notice of the crannies, or clerks.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 275.

[1858.—“The whole Afghan army consists of the three divisions of Kabul, Kandahar, and Herat; of these, the troops called Deferis (which receive pay), present the following effective force.”—Ferrier, H. of the Afghans, 315 seq.]

DUGGIE, s. A word used in the Pegu teak trade, for a long squared timber. Milburn (1813) says: “Duggies are timbers of teak from 27 to 30 feet long, and from 17 to 24 inches square.” Sir A. Phayre believes the word to be a corruption of the Burmese htdp-gyī. The first syllable means the ‘cross-beam of a house,’ the second, ‘big’; hence ‘big-beam.’

DUGONG, s. The cetaceous mammal, Halicore dugong. The word is Malay dūyung, also Javan. duyung; Macassar, ruyung. The etymology we do not know. [The word came to us from the name Dugung, used in the Philippine island of Leyte, and was popularised in its present form by Buffon in 1765. See N.E.D.]

DUMBCOW, v., and DUMB-COWED, participle. To brow-beat, to cow; and cowed, brow-beaten, set-down. This is a capital specimen of Anglo-Indian dialect. Dam khānā, ‘to eat one’s breath,’ is a Hind. idiom for ‘to be silent.’ Hobson-Jobson converts this into a transitive verb, to damkhāo, and both spelling and meaning being affected by English suggestions of sound, this comes in Anglo-Indian use to imply cowing and silencing. [A more probable derivation is from Hind. dhamkūnā, ‘to chide, scold, threaten, to repress by threats or reproof’ (Platts, H. Dict.).]

DUMDUM, n.p. The name of a military cantonment $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles N.W. of Calcutta, which was for seventy years (1783-1853) the head-quarters of that famous corps the Bengal Artillery. The name, which occurs at intervals in Bengal, is no doubt P.—H. dam-dama, ‘a mound or elevated battery.’ At Dumdum was signed the treaty which restored the British settlements after the re-capture of Calcutta in 1757. [It has recently given a name to the dumdum or expanding bullet, made in the arsenal there.]

[1830.—Prospectus of the “Dumdum Golfing Club.”—“We congratulate them on the prospect of seeing that noble and gentleman-like game established in Bengal.”—Or. Sport. Mag., reprint 1873, i. 407.

1848.—“‘Pooh! nonsense,’ said Joe, highly flattered. ‘I recollect, sir, there was a girl at Dumdum, a daughter of Cutler of the Artillery . . . who made a dead set at me in the year ‘4.’”—Vanity Fair, i. 25, ed. 1867.

[1886.—“The Kiranchi (see CRANCHEE) has been replaced by the ordinary Dumdummer, or Palki carriage ever since the year 1856.”—Sat. Review, Jan. 23.

[1900.—“A modern murderer came forward proudly with the dumdum.”—Ibid. Aug. 4.]

DUMPOKE, s. A name given in the Anglo-Indian kitchen to a baked dish, consisting usually of a duck, boned and stuffed. The word is Pers. dampukht, ‘air-cooked,’ i.e. baked. A recipe for a dish so called, as used in Akbar’s kitchen, is in the first quotation:

c. 1590.—“Dampukht. 10 sers meat; 2 s. ghi; 1 s. onions; 11 m. fresh ginger; 10 m. pepper; 2 d. cardamoms.”—Ain, i. 61.

1673.—“These eat highly of all Flesh Dumpoked, which is baked with Spice in Butter.”—Fryer, 93.

“Baked Meat they call Dumpoke which is dressed with sweet Herbs and Butter, with whose Gravy they swallow Rice dry Boiled.”—Ibid. 404.

1689.—“. . . and a dumpoked Fowl, that is boil’d with Butter in any small Vessel, and stuff with Raisins and Almonds is another (Dish).”—Ovington, 397.

DUMREE, s. Hind. damrī, a copper coin of very low value, not now existing. (See under DAM).

1823.—In Malwa “there are 4 cowries to a gunda; 3 gundas to a dumrie; 2 dumries to a chedaum; 3 dumries to a tundumrie; and 4 dumries to an adillah or half pice.”—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. ii. 194; [86 note].

DUNGAREE, s. A kind of coarse and inferior cotton cloth; the word is not in any dictionary that we know. [Platts gives H. dungrī, ‘a coarse kind of cloth.’ The Madras Gloss. gives Tel. dangidi, which is derived from Dāngidi, a village near Bombay. Molesworth in his Mahr. Dict. gives: “Dongarī Kāpar. a term originally for the common country cloth sold in the quarter contiguous to the Dongarī Killa (Fort George, Bombay), applied now to poor and low-priced cotton cloth. Hence in the corruption Dun- DURIAN, DORIAN, s. Malay duren, Molucca form duriyān, from durī, 'a thorn or prickle, [and ān, the common substantival ending; Mr. Skeat gives the standard Malay as duriyan or durian]; the great fruit of the tree (N. O. Bombaceae) called by botanists Durio zibethinus, D. C. The tree appears to be a native of the Malay Peninsula, and the nearest islands; from which it has been carried to Tenasserim on one side and to Mindanao on the other.

1878.—“The Durian will grow as large as a man's head, is covered closely with terribly sharp spines, set hexagonally upon its hard skin, and when ripe it falls; if it should strike any one under the tree, severe injury or death may be the result.”—M'Nair, Perak, 60.

1885.—“I proceeded . . . under a continuous shade of tall Durian trees from 35 to 40 feet high. . . . In the flowering time it was a most pleasant shady wood; but later in the season the chance of a fruit now and then descending on one's head would be less agreeable.” Note.—“Of this fruit the natives are passionately fond; . . . and the elephants flock to its shade in the fruiting time; but, more singular still, the tiger is said to devour it with avidity.”—Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 240.

DURJUN, s. H. darjan, a corr. of the English dozen.

DURWAUN, s. H. from P. darwadn, darbdn. A doorkeeper. A domestic servant so called is usual in the larger houses of Calcutta. He is porter at the gate of the compound (q.v.).

DURWAUZA-BUND. The formula by which a native servant in an Anglo-Indian household intimates that his master or mistress cannot receive a visitor—‘Not at home’—without the untruth. It is elliptical for darwadza band hai, ‘the door is closed.’

[1877.—“When they did not find him there, it was Darwaza bund.”—Allardycr, The City of Sunshine, i. 125.]

DUSSERA, DASSORA, DASEHRA, s. Skt. daśaharā, H. dashard, Mahr. dasrd; the ‘nine-nights’ (or ten days’) festival in October, also called Durgd-pūjā (see DOORGA-P.). In the west and south of India this holiday, taking place after the close of the wet season, became a great military festival, and the period when military expeditions were entered upon. The Mah-rattas were alleged to celebrate the occasion in a way characteristic of them, by destroying a village! The popular etymology of the word and that accepted by the best authorities, is daś, ‘ten (sins)’ and har, ‘that which takes away (or expiates).’ It is, perhaps, rather connected with the ten days’ duration of the feast, or with its chief day being the 10th of the month (Āśvina); but the origin is decidedly obscure.

c. 1590.—“The autumn harvest he shall begin to collect from the Deshereh, which is another Hindoo festival that also happens differently, from the beginning of Virgo to the commencement of Libra.”—Ayeen, tr. Gladwin, ed. 1800, i. 307; [tr. Jarrett, ii. 46].

1813.—“This being the desserah, a great Hindoo festival . . . we resolved to delay our departure and see some part of the ceremonies.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 97; [2nd ed. ii. 450].

DUSTOOR, DUSTOORY, s. P.—H. dastūr, ‘custom’ [see DESTOOR], dastūrī, ‘that which is customary.’ That commission or percentage on the money passing in any cash transaction which, with or without acknowledgment or permission, sticks to the fingers of the agent of payment. Such ‘customary’ appropriations are, we believe, very nearly as common in England as in India; a fact of which newspaper correspondence from time to time makes us aware, though Euro-

E

EAGLE-WOOD, s. The name of an aromatic wood from Camboja and some other Indian regions, chiefly trans-gangetic. It is the “odorous wood” referred to by Camões in the quotation under CHAMPA. We have somewhere read an explanation of the name as applied to the substance in question, because this is flecked and mottled, and so supposed to resemble the plumage of an eagle! [Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 395; Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 120, 150.] The word is in fact due to a corrupt form of the Skt. name of the wood, agaru, aguru. A form, probably, of this is ayil, akil, which Gundert gives as the Malayāl. word.* From this the Portuguese must have taken their aguila, as we find it in Barbosa (below), or pao (wood) d’aguila, made into aguila, whence French bois d’aigle, and Eng. eagle-wood. The Malays call it Kayū (wood)-gahru, evidently the same word, though which way the etymology flowed it is difficult to say. [Mr. Skeat writes: “the question is a difficult one. Klinkert gives garu (garoe) and gaharu (gaharoe), whence the trade names ‘Garrow’ and ‘Garroo’; and the modern standard Malay certainly corresponds to Klinkert’s forms, though I think gaharu should rather be written gharu, i.e. with an aspirated g, which is the way the Malays pronounce it. On the other hand, it seems perfectly clear that there must have been an alternative modern form agaru, or perhaps even aguru, since otherwise such trade names as ‘ugger’ and (?) ‘tugger’ could not have arisen. They can scarcely have come from the Skt. In Ridley’s Plant List we have gaharu and gagahau, which is the regular abbreviation of the reduplicated form gahru-gahru identified as Aquilaria Malaccensis, Lam.”] [See CAMBULAC.]

The best quality of this wood, once much valued in Europe as incense, is the result of disease in a tree of the N. O. Leguminosae, the Aloexylon agallochum, Loureiro, growing in Camboja and S. Cochin China, whilst an inferior kind, of like aromatic qualities, is produced by a tree of an entirely different order, Aquilaria agallocha, Roxb. (N. O. Aquilariaceae), which is found as far north as Silhet.*

Eagle-wood is another name for aloes-wood, or aloes (q.v.) as it is termed in the English Bible. [See Encycl. Bibl. i. 120 seq.] It is curious that Bluteau, in his great Portuguese Vocabulario, under Pao d’Aguila, jumbles up this aloes-wood with Socotrine Aloes. Αγάλλοχος was known to the ancients, and is described by Dioscorides (c. A.D. 65). In Liddell and Scott the word is rendered “the bitter aloe”; which seems to involve the same confusion as that made by Bluteau.

Other trade-names of the article given by Forbes Watson are Garrow- and Garroo-wood, agla-wood, ugger-, and tugger- (?) wood.

Lenho aloes verdadeiro, negro, pesado, e muito fino val 1000 (fanams).”—Barbosa (Lisbon), 393.

1563.—“R. And from those parts of which you speak, comes the true lign-aloes? Is it produced there?

“O. Not the genuine thing. It is indeed true that in the parts about C. Comorin and in Ceylon there is a wood with a scent (which we call aguila brava), as we have many another wood with a scent. And at one time that wood used to be exported to Bengala under the name of aguila brava; but since then the Bengalas have got more knowing, and buy it no longer. . . .”—Garcia, f. 119v.-120.

* We do not find information as to which tree produces the eagle-wood sold in the Tenasserim bazars. [It seems to be A. agallocha: see Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 279 seq.]

† This lign aloes, “genuine, black, heavy, very choice,” is presumably the fine kind from Champa: the aguila the inferior product.

* Royle says “Malayan agila,” but this is apparently a misprint for Malayalam.

ELEPHANT.

from other evidence that ivory was known in Egypt and Western Asia for ages before Solomon. And in other cases the Hebrew word for ivory is simply shen, corresponding to dens Indus in Ovid and other Latin writers. In Ezekiel (xxvii. 15) we find karnoth shen = 'cornua dentis.' The use of the word 'horns' does not necessarily imply a confusion of these great curved tusks with horns; it has many parallels, as in Pliny's, "cum arbore exacuant limentque cornua elephantis" (xviii. 7); in Martial's "Indicoque cornu" (i. 73); in Aelian's story, as alleged by the Mauritians, that the elephants there shed their horns every ten years ("δεκάτω ἔτει πάντως τὰ κέρατα ἐκπεσεῖν"—xiv. 5); whilst Cleasby quotes from an Icelandic saga 'olifant-horni' for 'ivory.'

We have mentioned Skt. ibha, from which Lassen assumes a compound ibhadanta for ivory, suggesting that this, combined by early traders with the Arabic article, formed al-ibha-danta, and so originated ἐλέφαντος. Pott, besides other doubts, objects that ibhadanta, though the name of a plant (Tiaridium indicum, Lehm.), is never actually a name of ivory.

Pott's own etymology is alaf-hindi, 'Indian ox,' from a word existing in sundry resembling forms, in Hebrew and in Assyrian (alif, alap).^{*} This has met with favour; though it is a little hard to accept any form like Hindī as earlier than Homer.

Other suggested origins are Pictet's from airdvata (lit. 'proceeding from water'), the proper name of the elephant of Indra, or Elephant of the Eastern Quarter in the Hindu Cosmology.[†] This is felt to be only too ingenious, but as improbable. It is, however, suggested, it would seem independently, by Mr. Kittel (Indian Antiquary, i. 128), who supposes the first part of the word to be Dravidian, a transformation from dne, 'elephant.'

up the origin of elephant. The O. T. speaks so often of ivory, and never again by this name, that habbim must be either a corruption or some trade-name, presumably for some special kind of ivory. Personally, I believe it far more likely that habbim is at bottom the same as hobnim (ebony?) associated with shen in Ezekiel xxvii. 15, and that the passage once ran 'ivory and ebony' (W. Robertson Smith); [also see Encycl. Bibl. ii. 2297 seq.].

^{*} See Zeitschr. für die Kie Kunde des Morgs, iv. 12 seqq.; also Kbehr. Schrader in Zeitsch. d. M. Gesellsch. xxvii. 706 seqq.; [Encycl. Bibl. ii. 1202].

[†] In Journ. As., ser. iv. tom. ii.

Pictet, finding his first suggestion not accepted, has called up a Singhalese word aliya, used for 'elephant,' which he takes to be from ala, 'great'; thence aliya, 'great creature'; and proceeding further, presents a combination of ala, 'great,' with Skt. phata, sometimes signifying 'a tooth,' thus ali-phata, 'great tooth' = elephantus.^{*}

Hodgson, in Notes on Northern Africa (p. 19, quoted by Pott), gives elef amegran ('Great Boar,' elef being 'boar') as the name of the animal among the Kabyles of that region, and appears to present it as the origin of the Greek and Latin words.

Again we have the Gothic ulbandus, 'a camel,' which has been regarded by some as the same word with elephantus. To this we shall recur.

Pott, in his elaborate paper already quoted, comes to the conclusion that the choice of etymologies must lie between his own alaf-hindī and Lassen's al-ibha-danta. His paper is 50 years old, but he repeats this conclusion in his Wurzel-Wörterbuch der Indo-Germanische Sprachen, published in 1871,[†] nor can I ascertain that there has been any later advance towards a true etymology. Yet it can hardly be said that either of the alternatives carries conviction.

Both, let it be observed, apart from other difficulties, rest on the assumption that the knowledge of ἐλέφας, whether as fine material or as monstrous animal, came from India, whilst nearly all the other or less-favoured suggestions point to the same assumption.

But knowledge acquired, or at least taken cognizance of, since Pott's latest reference to the subject, puts us in possession of the new and surprising fact that, even in times which we are entitled to call historic, the elephant existed wild, far to the westward of India, and not very far from the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean. Though the fact was indicated from the wall-paintings by Wilkinson some 65 years ago,[‡] and has more recently been amply displayed in historical works which have circulated by scores in popular libraries, it is singular how little attention or interest it seems to have elicited.*

The document which gives precise Egyptian testimony to this fact is an inscription (first interpreted by Ebers in 1873)† from the tomb of Amenemhib, a captain under the great conqueror Thotmes III. [Thūtnosis], who reigned B.C. c. 1600. This warrior, speaking from his tomb of the great deeds of his master, and of his own right arm, tells how the king, in the neighbourhood of Ni, hunted 120 elephants for the sake of their tusks; and how he himself (Amenemhib) encountered the biggest of them, which had attacked the sacred person of the king, and cut through its trunk. The elephant chased him into the water, where he saved himself between two rocks; and the king bestowed on him rich rewards.

The position of Ni is uncertain, though some have identified it with Nineveh.‡ [Maspero writes: "Nii, long confounded with Nineveh, after Champolion (Gram. égyptienne, p. 150), was identified by Lenormant (Les Origines, vol. iii. p. 316 et seq.) with Ninus Vetus, Membidj, and by Max Müller (Asien und Europa, p. 267) with Balis on the Euphrates: I am inclined to make it Kefer-Naya, between Aleppo and Turmanin" (Struggle of the Nations, 144, note).] It is named in another inscription between Arinath and Akerith, as, all three, cities of Naharain or Northern Mesopotamia, captured by Amenhotep II., the son of Thotmes III. Might not Ni be Nisibis? We shall find that Assyrian inscriptions of later date have been interpreted as placing elephant-hunts in the land of Harran and in the vicinity of the Chaboras.

If then these elephant-hunts may be located on the southern skirts of Taurus, we shall more easily understand how a tribute of elephant-tusks should have been offered at the court of Egypt by the people of Rutennu or Northern Syria, and also by the people of the adjacent Asebi or Cyprus, as we find repeatedly recorded on the Egyptian monuments, both in hieroglyphic writing and pictorially.*

What the stones of Egypt allege in the 17th cent. B.C., the stones of Assyria 500 years afterwards have been alleged to corroborate. The great inscription of Tighlath-Pileser I., who is calculated to have reigned about B.C. 1120-1100, as rendered by Lotz, relates:

"Ten mighty Elephants Slew I in Harran, and on the banks of the Haboras.
Four Elephants I took alive;
Their hides,
Their teeth, and the live Elephants
I brought to my city Assur."†

The same facts are recorded in a later inscription, on the broken obelisk of Assurnazirpal from Kouyunjik, now in the Br. Museum, which commemorates the deeds of the king's ancestor, Tighlath Pileser.‡

In the case of these Assyrian inscriptions, however, elephant is by no means an undisputed interpretation. In the famous quadruple test exercise on this inscription in 1857, which gave the death-blow to the doubts which some sceptics had emitted as to the genuine character of the Assyrian interpretations, Sir H. Rawlinson, in this passage, rendered the animals slain and taken alive as wild buffaloes. The ideogram given as teeth he had not interpreted. The question is argued at length by Lotz in the work already quoted, but it is a question for cuneiform experts, dealing, as it does, with the interpretation of more than one ideogram, and enveloped as yet in uncertainties. It is to be observed, that in 1857 Dr. Hincks, one of the four test-translators,§ had rendered the passage almost exactly as Lotz has done 23 years later, though I cannot see that Lotz makes any allusion to this fact. [See Encycl. Bibl. ii. 1262.] Apart from arguments as to decipherment and ideograms, it is certain that probabilities are much affected by the publication of the Egyptian inscription of Amenhotep, which gives a greater plausibility to the rendering 'elephant' than could be ascribed to it in 1857. And should it eventually be upheld, it will be all the more remarkable that the sagacity of Dr. Hincks should then have ventured on that rendering.

In various suggestions, including Pott's, besides others that we have omitted, the etymology has been based on a transfer of the name of the ox, or some other familiar quadruped. There would be nothing extraordinary in such a transfer of meaning. The reference to the *bos Luca is trite; the Tibetan word for ox (glan) is also the word for 'elephant'; we have seen how the name 'Great Boar' is alleged to be given to the elephant among the Kabyles; we have heard of an elephant in a menagerie being described by a Scotch rustic as 'a muckle sow'; Pausanias, according to Bochart, calls rhinoceroses 'Aethiopic bulls' [Bk. ix. 21, 2]. And let me finally illustrate the matter by a circumstance related to me by a brother officer who accompanied Sir Neville Chamberlain on an expedition among the turbulent Pathan tribes c. 1860. The women of the villages gathered to gaze on the elephants that accompanied the force, a stranger sight to them than it would have been to the women of the most secluded village in Scotland. 'Do you see these?' said a soldier of the Frontier Horse; 'do you know what they are? These are the Queen of England's buffaloes that give 5 maunds (about 160 quarts) of milk a day!'

Now it is an obvious suggestion, that if there were elephants on the skirts of Taurus down to B.C. 1100, or even (taking the less questionable evidence) down only to B.C. 1600, it is highly improbable that the Greeks would have had to seek a name for the animal, or its tusk, from Indian trade. And if the Greeks had a vernacular name for the elephant, there is also a probability, if not a presumption, that some tradition of this name would be found, mutatis mutandis, among other Aryan nations of Europe.

Now may it not be that ἐλέφας—phartos in Greek, and ulbandus in Moeso-Gothic, represent this vernacular name? The latter form is exactly the modification of the former which Grimm's law demands. Nor is the word confined to Gothic. It is found in the Old H. German (olpentā); in Anglo-Saxon (olfend, oluend, &c.); in Old Swedish (uelpand, alwundyr, ulfwald); in Icelandic (ulfaldi). All these Northern words, it is true, are used in the sense of camel, not of elephant. But instances already given may illustrate that there is nothing surprising in this transfer, all the less where the animal originally indicated had long been lost sight of. Further, Jülg, who has published a paper on the Gothic word, points out its resemblance to the Slav forms welbond, welblond, or wielblad, also meaning 'camel' (compare also Russian verbliud). This, in the last form (wielblad), may, he says, be regarded as resolvable into 'Great beast.' Herr Jülg ends his paper with a hint that in this meaning may perhaps be found a solution of the origin of elephant (an idea at which Pictet also transiently pointed in a paper referred to above), and half promises to follow up this hint; but in thirty years he has not done so, so far as I can discover. Nevertheless it is one which may yet be pregnant.

Nor is it inconsistent with this suggestion that we find also in some of the Northern languages a second series of names designating the elephant—not, as we suppose ulbandus and its kin to be, common vocables descending from a remote age in parallel development—but adoptions from Latin at a much more recent period. Thus, we have in Old and Middle German Elefant and Helfant, with elfenbein and helfenbein for ivory; in Anglo-Saxon, ylpend, elpend, with shortened forms ylp and elp, and ylpenban for ivory; whilst the Scandinavian tongues adopt and retain fil. [The N.E.D. regards the derivation as doubtful, but considers the theory of Indian origin improbable.]

[A curious instance of misapprehension is the use of the term 'Chain elephants.' This is a misunderstanding

Here is the origin of Tennyson's 'serpent-hands' quoted under HATTY. The title bos Luca is explained by St. Isidore:

"Hos boves Lucanos vocabant antiqui Romani: boves quia nullum animal grandius videbant: Lucanos quia in Lucania illos primus Pyrrhus in proelio objecit Romanis."—Isid. Hispal. lib. xii. Originum, cap. 2.

exist no longer. But I do remember me to have seen a certain Chapel, not to be seen now, open on the whole façade (which was more than 40 feet in length), and which along the rock formed a plinth the whole length of the edifice, fashioned like our altars both as to breadth and height; and on this plinth were many remarkable things to be seen. Among others I remember to have noticed the story of Queen Pasiphae and the bull; also the Angel with naked sword thrusting forth from below a tree two beautiful figures of a man and a woman, who were naked, as the Holy Scripture paints for us the appearance of our first parents Adam and Eve."—Couto, Dec. VII. liv. iii. cap. xi.

1644.—". . . an islet which they call Ilheo do Ellefanté. . . . In the highest part of this Islet is an eminence on which there is a mast from which a flag is unfurled when there are prows (paros) about, as often happens, to warn the small unarmed vessels to look out. . . . There is on this island a pagoda called that of the Elephant, a work of extraordinary magnitude, being cut out of the solid rock," &c.—Bocarro, MS.

1673.—". . . We steered by the south side of the Bay, purposely to touch at Elephanto, so called from a monstrous Elephant cut out of the main Rock, bearing a young one on its Back; not far from it the Effigies of a Horse stuck up to the Belly in the Earth in the Valley; from thence we clambered up the highest Mountain on the Island, on whose summit was a miraculous Piece hewed out of solid Stone: It is supported with 42 Corinthian Pillars," &c.—Fryer, 75.

1690.—"At 3 Leagues distance from Bombay is a small Island called Elephanta, from the Statue of an Elephant cut in Stone. . . . Here likewise are the just dimensions of a Horse Carved in Stone, so lively . . . that many have rather Fancied it, at a distance, a living Animal. . . . But that which adds the most Remarkable Character to this Island, is the fam'd Pagode at the top of it; so much spoke of by the Portuguese, and at present admir'd by the present Queen Dowager, that she cannot think any one has seen this part of India, who comes not Freight home with some Account of it."—Ovington, 158-9.

1712.—"The island of Elephanta . . . takes its name from an elephant in stone, with another on its back, which stands on a small hill, and serves as a sea mark. . . . As they advanced towards the pagoda through a smooth narrow pass cut in the rock, they observed another hewn figure which was called Alexander's horse."—From an account written by Captain Pyke, on board the Stringer East Indiaman, and illd. by drawings. Read by A. Dalrymple to the Soc. of Antiquaries, 10th Feb. 1780, and pubd. in Archaeologia, vii. 323 seqq. One of the plates (xxi.) shows the elephant having on its back distinctly a small elephant, whose proboscis comes down into contact with the head of the large one.

1727.—"A league from thence is another larger, called Elephanto, belonging to the Portuguese, and serves only to feed some Cattle. I believe it took its name from an Elephant carved out of a great black Stone, about Seven Foot in Height."—A. Hamilton, i. 240; [ed. 1744, i. 241].

1760.—"Le lendemain, 7 Decembre, des que le jour parut, je me transportai au bas de la seconde montagne, en face de Bombaye, dans un coin de l'Isle, où est l'Elephant qui a fait donner à Galipouri le nom d'Elephante. L'animal est de grandeur naturelle, d'une pierre noire, et detachée du sol, et paroît porter son petit sur son dos."—Anquetil du Perron, I. ccccxxiii.

1761.—". . . The work I mention is an artificial cave cut out of a solid Rock, and decorated with a number of pillars, and gigantic statues, some of which discover y^e work of a skilful artist; and I am inform'd by an acquaintance who is well read in y^e antient history, and has minutely considered y^e figures, that it appears to be y^e work of King Sesostris after his Indian Expedition."—MS. Letter of James Rennell.

1764.—"Plusieurs Voyageurs font bien mention du vieux temple Payen sur la petite Isle Elephanta près de Bombay, mais ils n'en parlent qu'en passant. Je le trouvois si curieux et si digne de l'attention des Amateurs d'Antiquités, que j'y fis trois fois le Voyage, et que j'y dessinois tout ce que s'y trouve de plus remarquable. . . ."—Carsten Niebuhr, Voyage, ii. 25.

"Pas loin du Rivage de la Mer, et en pleine Campagne, on voit encore un Elephant d'une pierre dure et noiratre . . . La Statue . . . porte quelque chose sur le dos, mais que le tems a rendu entièrement meconnoissable. . . . Quant au Cheval dont Ovington et Hamilton font mention je ne l'ai pas vu."—Ibid. 33.

1780.—"That which has principally attracted the attention of travellers is the small island of Elephanta, situated in the east side of the harbour of Bombay. . . . Near the south end is the figure of an elephant rudely cut in stone, from which the island has its name. . . . On the back are the remains of something that is said to have formerly represented a young elephant, though no traces of such a resemblance are now to be found."—Account, &c. By Mr. William Hunter, Surgeon in the E. Indies, Archaeologia, vii. 286.

1783.—In vol. viii. of the Archaeologia, p. 251, is another account in a letter from Hector Macneil, Esq. He mentions "the elephant cut out of stone," but not the small elephant, nor the horse.

1795.—"Some Account of the Caves in the Island of Elephanta. By J. Goldingham, Esq." (No date of paper). In As. Researches, iv. 409 seqq.

1813.—Account of the Cave Temple of Elephanta . . . by Wm. Erskine, Trans. Bombay Lit. Soc. i. 198 seqq. Mr. Erskine says in regard to the figure on the back of the large elephant: "The remains of its jaws, and also the junction of its belly with the larger animal, were perfectly distinct; and the appearance it offered is represented on the annexed drawing made by Captain Hall (Pl. II.),* who from its appearance conjectured that it must have been a tiger rather than an elephant; an idea in which I feel disposed to agree."—Ibid. 208.

b. s. A name given, originally by the Portuguese, to violent storms occurring at the termination, though some travellers describe it as at the setting-in, of the Monsoon. [The Portuguese, however, took the name from the H. hathiyā, Skt. hastā, the 13th lunar Asterism, connected with hastin, an elephant, and hence sometimes called 'the sign of the elephant.' The hathiyā is at the close of the Rains.]

1554.—"The Damani, that is to say a violent storm arose; the kind of storm is known under the name of the Elephant; it blows from the west."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 75.

[1611.—"The storm of Ofante doth begin."—Dunvers, Letters, i. 126.]

c. 1616.—"The 20th day (August), the night past fell a storme of raine called the Oliphant, vsuall at going out of the raines."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 549; [Hak. Soc. i. 247].

1659.—"The boldest among us became dismayed; and the more when the whole culminated in such a terrific storm that we were compelled to believe that it must be that yearly raging tempest which is called the Elephant. This storm, annually, in September and October, makes itself heard in a frightful manner, in the Sea of Bengal."—Walter Schulze, 67.

c. 1665.—"Il y fait si mauvais pour le Vaisseaux au commencement de ce mois à cause d'un Vent d'Orient qui y souffle en ce tems-là avec violence, et qui est toujours accompagné de gros nuages qu'on appelle Elephans, parce-qu'ils en ont la figure. . . ."—Therrenot, v. 38.

1673.—"Not to deviate any longer, we are now winding about the South-West part of Ceilon; where we have the Tail of the Elephant full in our mouth; a constellation by the Portugals called Rabo del Elephanto, known for the breaking up of the Munsoons, which is the last Flory this season makes."—Fryer, 48.

[1690.—"The Mussoans (Monsoon) are rude and Boisterous in their departure, as well as at their coming in, which two seasons are called the Elephant in India, and just before their breaking up, take their farewell for the most part in very rugged puffing weather."—Ovington, 137].

1756.—"9th (October). We had what they call here an Elephanta, which is an excessive hard gale, with very severe thunder, lightning and rain, but it was of short continuance. In about 4 hours there fell . . . 2 (inches)."—Ives, 42.

c. 1760.—"The setting in of the rains is commonly ushered in by a violent thunderstorm, generally called the Elephanta."—Grose, i. 33.

ELEPHANT-CREEPER, s. Argyrea speciosa, Sweet. (N. O. Convolvulaceae). The leaves are used in native medicine as poultices, &c.

ELK, s. The name given by sportsmen in S. India, with singular impropriety, to the great stag Rusa Aristotelis, the sāmbār (see SAMBRE) of Upper and W. India.

[1813.—"In a narrow defile . . . a male elk (cervus alces, Lin.) of noble appearance, followed by twenty-two females, passed majestically under their platform, each as large as a common-sized horse."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 506.]

ELL'ORA, (though very commonly called Ellóra), n.p. Properly Elurd, [Tel. elu, 'rule,' āru, 'village,'] otherwise Vērulē, a village in the Nizam's territory, 7 m. from Daulatābād, which gives its name to the famous and wonderful rock-caves and temples in its vicinity, excavated in the crescent-shaped scarp of a plateau, about 1½ m. in length. These works are Buddhist (ranging from A.D. 450 to 700), Brahminical (c. 650 to 700), and Jain (c. 800-1000).

c. 1665.—"On m'avoit fait a Sourat grande estime des Pagodes d'Elora . . . (and after describing them) . . . Quoiqu'il en soit, si l'on considère cette quantité de Temples spacieux, remplis de pilastres et de colonnes, et tant de milliers de figures, et le tout taillé dans le roc vif, on peut dire avec verité que ces ouvrages surpassent la force humaine; et qu'au moins les gens du siècle dans lequel ils ont été faits, n'étoient pas tout-à-fait barbares."—Therrenot, v. p. 222.

1684.—"Muhammad Shāh Malik Jūnā, son of Tughlik, selected the fort of Deogir as a central point whereat to establish the seat of government, and gave it the name of Daulatābād. He removed the inhabitants of Delhi thither. . . . Ellora is only a short distance from this place. At some very remote period a race of men, as if by magic, excavated caves high up among the defiles of the mountains. These rooms extended over a breadth of one kos. Carvings of various designs and of correct execution adorned all the walls and ceilings; but the outside of the mountain is perfectly level, and there is no sign of any dwelling. From the long period of time these Pagods remained masters of this territory, it is reasonable to conclude, although historians differ, that to them is to be attributed the construction of these places."—Sākī Mustā'idī Khān, Ma-āṣir-i-Ālamgīrī, in Elliot, vii. 189 seq.

1760.—"Je descendis ensuite par un sentier frayé dans le roc, et après m'être muni de deux Brahmes que l'on me donna pour fort instruits je commencai la visite de ce que j'appelle les Pagodes d'Eloura."—Anquetil du Perron, I. ccxxxiii.

1794.—"Description of the Caves . . . on the Mountain, about a Mile to the Eastward of the town of Ellora, or as called on the spot, Verrool." (By Sir C. W. Malet.) In As. Researches, vi. 38 seqq.

1803.—"Hindoo Excavations in the Mountain of . . . Ellora in Twenty-four Views. . . . Engraved from the Drawings of James Wales, by and under the direction of Thomas Daniell."

ELU, HELU, n.p. This is the name by which is known an ancient form of the Singhalese language from which the modern vernacular of Ceylon is immediately derived, "and to which" the latter "bears something of the same relation that the English of to-day bears to Anglo-Saxon. Fundamentally Elu and Singhalese are identical, and the difference of form which they present is due partly to the large number of new grammatical forms evolved by the modern language, and partly to an immense influx into it of Sanskrit nouns, borrowed, often without alteration, at a comparatively recent period. . . . The name Elu is no other than Sinhala much corrupted, standing for an older form, Hēla or Hēlu, which occurs in some ancient works, and this again for a still older, Sēla, which brings us back to the Pali Sīhala." (Mr. R. C. Childers, in J.R.A.S., N.S., vii. 36.) The loss of the initial sibilant has other examples in Singhalese. (See also under CEYLON.)

EMBLIO Myrobalans. See under MYROBALANS.

ENGLISH-BAZAR, n.p. This is a corruption of the name (Angrēzdbād = 'English-town') given by the natives in the 17th century to the purlieus of the factory at Malda in Bengal. Now the Head-quarters Station of Malda District.

1683.—"I departed from Cassumbazar with designe (God willing) to visit ye factory at Englesavad."—Hedges, Diary, May 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 86; also see i. 71].

1878.—"These ruins (Gaur) are situated about 8 miles to the south of Angrēzābād (English Bazar), the civil station of the district of Māldah. . . ."—Ravenshaw's Guerr, p. 1.

[ESTIMAUZE, s. A corruption of the Ar.—P. iltimās, 'a prayer, petition, humble representation.'

[1687.—"The Arzdest (Urz) with the Estimauze concerning your twelve articles which you sent to me arrived."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lxx.]

EURASIAN, a. A modern name for persons of mixt European and Indian blood, devised as being more euphemistic than Half-caste and more precise than East-Indian. ["No name has yet been found or coined which correctly represents this section. Eurasian certainly does not. When the European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association was established 17 years ago, the term Anglo-Indian, after much consideration, was adopted as best designating this community."—(Procs. Imperial Anglo-Indian Ass., in Pioneer Mail, April 13, 1900.)]

[1844.—"The Eurasian Belle," in a few Local Sketches by J. M., Calcutta.—6th ser. Notes and Queries, xii. 177.

[1866.—See quotation under KHUDD.]

1880.—"The shovel-hats are surprised that the Eurasian does not become a missionary or a schoolmaster, or a policeman, or something of that sort. The native papers say, 'Deport him'; the white prints say, 'Make him a soldier'; and the Eurasian himself says, 'Make me a Commissioner, give me a pension.'"—Ali Baba, 123.

EUROPE, adj. Commonly used in India for "European," in contradistinction to country (q.v.) as qualifying goods, viz. those imported from Europe. The phrase is probably obsolescent, but still in common use. "Europe shop" is a shop where European goods of sorts are sold in an up-country station. The first quotation applies the word to a man. [A "Europe morning" is lying late in bed, as opposed to the Anglo-Indian's habit of early rising.]

1673.—"The Enemies, by the help of an Europe Engineer, had sprung a Mine to blow up the Castle."—Fryer, 87.

[1682-3.—"Ordered that a sloop be sent to Conimero with Europe goods. . . ."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 14.]

1711.—“On the arrival of a Europe ship, the Sea-Gate is always throng'd with People.”—Lockyer, 27.

1781.—“Guthrie and Wordie take this method of acquainting the Public that they intend quitting the Europe Shop Business.”—India Gazette, May 26.

1782.—“To be Sold, a magnificent Europe Chariot, finished in a most elegant manner, and peculiarly adapted to this Country.”—Ibid. May 11.

c. 1817.—“Now the Europe shop into which Mrs. Browne and Mary went was a very large one, and full of all sorts of things. One side was set out with Europe caps and bonnets, ribbons, feathers, sashes, and what not.”—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, ed. 1873, 23.

1866.—“Mrs. Smart. Ah, Mr. Cholmondeley, I was called the Europe Angel.”—The Dawk Bungalow, 219.

[1888.—“I took a ‘European morning’ after having had three days of going out before breakfast. . . .”—Lady Dufferin, Vice-regal Life, 371.]

EYSHAM, EHSĤĀM, s. Ar. aḥshām, pl. of hashm, ‘a train or retinue.’ One of the military technicalities affected by Tippoo; and according to Kirkpatrick (Tippoo's Letters, App. p. cii.) applied to garrison troops. Miles explains it as “Irregular infantry with swords and matchlocks.” (See his tr. of H. of Hydur Naik, p. 398, and tr. of H. of Tipu Sultan, p. 61). [The term was used by the latter Moghuls (see Mr. Irvine below).

[1896.—“In the case of the Ahshām, or troops belonging to the infantry and artillery, we have a little more definite information under this head.”—W. Irvine, Army of the Indian Moghuls, in J.R.A.S., July 1896, p. 528.]

F

FACTOR, s. Originally a commercial agent; the executive head of a factory. Till some 55 years ago the Factors formed the third of the four classes into which the covenanted civil servants of the Company were theoretically divided, viz. Senior Merchants, Junior Merchants, factors and writers. But these terms had long ceased to have any relation to the occupation of these officials, and even to have any application at all except in the nominal lists of the service. The titles, however, continue (through vis inertiae of administration in such matters) in the classified lists of the Civil Service for years after the abolition of the last vestige of the Company's trading character, and it is not till the publication of the E. I. Register for the first half of 1842 that they disappear from that official publication. In this the whole body appears without any classification; and in that for the second half of 1842 they are divided into six classes, first class, second class, &c., an arrangement which, with the omission of the 6th class, still continues. Possibly the expressions Factor, Factory, may have been adopted from the Portuguese Feitor, Feitoria. The formal authority for the classification of the civilians is quoted under 1675.

1501.—“With which answer night came on, and there came aboard the Captain Mór that Christian of Calcut sent by the Factor (feitor) to say that Cojebequi assured him, and he knew it to be the case, that the King of Calcut was arming a great fleet.”—Correa, i. 250.

1582.—“The Factor and the Catuall having seen these parcels began to laugh thereat.”—Castañeda, tr. by N. L., f. 46b.

1600.—“Capt. Middleton, John Havard, and Francis Barne, elected the three principal Factors. John Havard, being present, willingly accepted.”—Sainsbury, i. 111.

c. 1610.—“Les Portugais de Malaca ont des commis et facteurs par toutes ces Isles pour le trafic.”—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 106. [Hak. Soc. ii. 170].

1653.—“Feitor est vn terme Portugais signifiant vn Consul aux Indes.”—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 538.

1666.—“The Viceroy came to Cochin, and there received the news that Antonio de Sâ, Factor (Fator) of Coulam, with all his officers, had been slain by the Moors.”—Faria y Sousa, i. 35.

1675-6.—“For the advancement of our Apprentices, we direct that, after they have served the first five yeares, they shall have £10 per annum, for the last two yeares; and having served these two yeares, to be enter-tayned one year longer, as Writers, and have Writers' Salary: and having served that yeare, to enter into y^e degree of Factor, which otherwise would have been ten yeares. And knowing that a distinction of titles is, in many respects necessary, we do order that when the Apprentices have served their times, they be stiled Writers; and when the Writers have served their times, they be stiled Factors, and Factors having served their times to be stiled Merchants; and Merchants having served their times to be stiled Senior Merchants.”—Ext. of Court's Letter in Bruce's Annals of the E.I. Co., ii. 374-5.

1689.—“These are the chief Places of Note and Trade where their Presidents and Agents reside, for the support of whom, with their Writers and Factors, large Privileges and Salaries are allowed.”—Ovington, 386. (The same writer tells us that Factors got £40 a year; junior Factors, £15; Writers, £7. Peons got 4 rupees a month. P. 392.)

1711.—Lockyer gives the salaries at Madras as follows: “The Governor, £200 and £100 gratuity; 6 Councillors, of whom the chief (2nd?) had £100, 3d. £70, 4th. £50, the others £40, which was the salary of 6 Senior Merchants. 2 Junior Merchants £30 per annum; 5 Factors, £15; 10 Writers, £5; 2 Ministers, £100; 1 Surgeon, £36.

“Attorney-General has 50 Pagodas per Annum gratuity.

(p. 14.)

c. 1748.—“He was appointed to be a Writer in the Company's Civil Service, becoming . . . after the first five (years) a factor.”—Orme, Fragments, viii.

1781.—“Why we should have a Council and Senior and Junior Merchants, factors and writers, to load one ship in the year (at Penang), and to collect a very small revenue, appears to me perfectly incomprehensible.”—Corresp. of Ld. Cornwallis, i. 390.

1786.—In a notification of Aug. 10th, the subsistence of civil servants out of employ is fixed thus:—

A Senior Merchant—£400 sterling per ann.

A Junior Merchant—£300 “ “

Factors and Writers—£200

In Seton-Karr, i. 131.

FACTORY, s. A trading establishment at a foreign port or mart (see preceding).

1500.—“And then he sent ashore the Factor Ayres Correa with the ship's carpenters . . . and sent to ask the King for timber . . . all which the King sent in great sufficiency, and he sent orders also for him to have many carpenters and labourers to assist in making the houses; and they brought much plank and wood, and palm-trees which they cut down at the Point, so that they made a great Campo,* in which they made houses for the Captain Mór, and for each of the Captains, and houses for the people, and they made also a separate large house for the factory (feitoria).”—Correa, i. 168.

1582.—“. . . he sent a Nayre . . . to the intent hee might remaine in the Factorye.”—Castañeda (by N. L.), ff. 54b.

1606.—“In which time the Portingall and Tydoryan Slaves had sacked the towne, setting fire to the factory.”—Middleton's Voyage, G. (4).

1615.—“The King of Acheen desiring that the Hector should leave a merchant in his country . . . it has been thought fit to settle a factory at Acheen, and leave Juxon and Nicolls in charge of it.”—Sainsbury, i. 415.

1809.—“The factory-house (at Cuddalore) is a chaste piece of architecture, built by my relative Diamond Pitt, when this was the chief station of the British on the Coromandel Coast.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 372.

We add a list of the Factories established by the E. I. Company, as complete as we have been able to compile. We have used Milburn, Sainsbury, the “Charters of the E. I. Company,” and “Robert Burton, The English Acquisitions in Guinea and East India, 1728,” which contains (p. 184) a long list of English Factories. It has not been possible to submit our list as yet to proper criticism. The letters attached indicate the authorities, viz. M. Milburn, S. Sainsbury, C. Charters, B. Burton. 1878.—“Les mains abandonnées sur les genoux, dans une immobilité de fakir.”—Alph. Daudet, Le Nabob, ch. vi.

FALAUN, s. Ar. faldn, fuldn, and H. fuldna, faldna, ‘such an one,’ ‘a certain one’; Span. and Port. fulano, Heb. Fuluni (Ruth iv. 1). In Elphinstone’s Life we see that this was the term by which he and his friend Strachey used to indicate their master in early days, and a man whom they much respected, Sir Barry Close. And gradually, by a process of Hobson-Jobson, this was turned into Forlorn.

1803.—“The General (A. Wellesley) is an excellent man to have a peace to make. . . . I had a long talk with him about such a one; he said he was a very sensible man.”—Op. cit. i. 81.

1824.—“This is the old ghaut down which we were so glad to retreat with old Forlorn.”—ii. 164. See also i. 56, 108, 345, &c.

FANĀM, s. The denomination of a small coin long in use in S. India, Malayāl. and Tamil paṇam, ‘money,’ from Skt. paṇa, [rt. paṇ, ‘to barter’]. There is also a Dekhani form of the word, falam. In Telugu it is called rūka. The form fanam was probably of Arabic origin, as we find it long prior to the Portuguese period. The fanam was anciently a gold coin, but latterly of silver, or sometimes of base gold. It bore various local values, but according to the old Madras monetary system, prevailing till 1818, 42 fanams went to one star pagoda, and a Madras fanam was therefore worth about 2d. (see Prinsep's Useful Tables, by E. Thomas, p. 18). The weights of a large number of ancient fanams given by Mr. Thomas in a note to his Pathan Kings of Delhi show that the average weight was 6 grs. of gold (p. 170). Fanams are still met with on the west coast, and as late as 1862 were received at the treasuries of Malabar and Calicut. As the coins were very small they used to be counted by means of a small board or dish, having a large number of holes or pits. On this a pile of fanams was shaken, and then swept off, leaving the holes filled. About the time named Rs. 5000 worth of gold fanams were sold off at those treasuries. [Mr. Logan names various kinds of fanams: the vīrdy, or gold, of which 4 went to a rupee; new vīrdy, or gold, 3½ to a rupee; in silver, 5 to a rupee; the rdsī fanam, the most ancient of the indigenous fanams, now of fictitious value; the sultānī fanam of Tippoo in 1790-92, of which 3½ went to a rupee (Malabar, ii. Gloss. clxxix.).]

c. 1344.—“A hundred fānām are equal to 6 golden dīnārs” (in Ceylon).—Ibn Batuta, iv. 174.

c. 1348.—“And these latter (Malabar Christians) are the Masters of the public steelyard, from which I derived, as a perquisite of my office as Pope’s Legate, every month a hundred gold fan, and a thousand when I left.”—John Marignolli, in Cathay, 343.

1442.—“In this country they have three kinds of money, made of gold mixed with alloy . . . the third called fanom, is equivalent in value to the tenth part of the last mentioned coin” (partāb, vid. pardao).—Abdurrazāk, in India in the XVth Cent. p. 26.

1498.—“Fifty fanoeens, which are equal to 3 cruzados.”—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 107.

1505.—“Quivi spendeno ducati d’auro veneziani e monete di auro et argento e metalle, chiamano vna moneta de argento fanone. XX vagliono vn ducato. Tara e vn altra moneta de metale. XV vagliono vn Fanone.”—Italian version of Letter from Dom Manuel of Portugal (Reprint by A. Burnell, 1881), p. 12.

1510.—“He also coins a silver money called tare, and others of gold, 20 of which go to a pardao, and are called fanom. And of these small coins of silver, there go sixteen to a fanom.”—Varthema, Hak. Soc. 130.

[1515.—“They would take our cruzados at 19 fanams.”—Albuquerque's Treaty with the Samorin, Alguns Documentos da Torre do Tombo, p. 373.]

1516.—“Eight fine rubies of the weight of one fanão . . . are worth fanões 10.”—Barbosa (Lisbon ed.), 384.

1553.—“In the ceremony of dubbing a knight he is to go with all his kinsfolk and friends, in pomp and festal procession, to the House of the King . . . and make him an offering of 60 of those pieces of gold which they call Fanões, each of which may be worth 20 reis of our money.”—De Barros, Dec. I. liv. ix. cap. iii.

1582.—In the English transl. of ‘Castañeda’ is a passage identical with the preceding, in which the word is written ‘Fannon.’—Fol. 36b.

„ “In this city of Negapatan aforesaid are current certain coins called fannò. . . . They are of base gold, and are worth in our money 10 soldi each, and 17 are equal to a zecchin of Venetian gold.”—Gasp. Balbi, f. 84r.

c. 1610.—“Ils nous donnent tous les jours a chacun un Panan, qui est vne pièce d’or monnoye du Roy qui vaut environ quatre sols et demy.”—Pyrard de Laval, i. 250; [Hak. Soc. i. 350; in i. 365 Panants].

[c. 1665.—“. . . if there is not found in every thousand oysters the value of 5 fanos of pearls—that is to say a half ecu of our money,—it is accepted as a proof that the fishing will not be good. . . .”—Tavernier, ed. Bull, ii. 117 seq.]

1678.—“2. Whosoever shall profane the name of God by swearing or cursing, he shall pay 4 fanams to the use of the poore for every oath or curse.”—Orders agreed on by the Governor and Council of Ft. St. Geo. Oct. 28. In Notes and Exts. No. i. 85.

1752.—“N.B. 36 Fanams to a Pagoda, is the exchange, by which all the servants belonging to the Company receive their salaries. But in the Bazar the general exchange in Trade is 40 to 42.”—T. Brooks, p. 8.

1784.—This is probably the word which occurs in a “Song by a Gentleman of the Navy when a Prisoner in Bangalore Jail” (temp. Hyder ‘Ali).

“Ye Bucks of Seringapatam,
Ye Captives so cheerful and gay;
How sweet with a golden sanam
You spun the slow moments away.”

In Seton-Karr, i. 19.

1785.—“You are desired to lay a silver fanam, a piece worth three pence, upon the ground. This, which is the smallest of all coins, the elephant feels about till he finds.”—Caraccioli’s Life of Clive, i. 288.

1803.—“The pay I have given the boatmen is one gold fanam for every day they do not work, and two gold fanams for every day they do.”—From Sir A. Wellesley, in Life of Munro, i. 342.

FAN-PALM, s. The usual application of this name is to the Borassus flabelliformis, L. (see BRAB, PALMYRA), which is no doubt the type on which our ladies’ fans have been formed. But it is also sometimes applied to the Talipot (q.v.); and it is exceptionally (and surely erroneously) applied by Sir L. Pelly (J.R.G.S. xxxv. 232) to the “Traveller’s Tree,” i.e. the Madagascar Ravenala (Urania speciosa).

FANQUL, s. Chin. fan-kwei, ‘foreign demon’; sometimes with the affix tsu or tsü, ‘son’; the popular Chinese name for Europeans. [“During the 15th and 16th centuries large numbers of black slaves of both sexes from the E. I. Archipelago were purchased by the great houses of Canton to serve as gate-keepers. They were called ‘devil slaves,’ and it is not improbable that the term ‘foreign devil,’ so freely used by the Chinese for foreigners, may have had this origin.”—Ball, Things Chinese, 535.]

FARÁSH, FERÁSH, FRASH, s. Ar.—H. farrdsh, [farsh, ‘to spread (a carpet)’]. A menial servant whose proper business is to spread carpets, pitch tents, &c., and, in fact, in a house, to do housemaid’s work; employed also in Persia to administer the bastinado. The word was in more common use in India two centuries ago than now. One of the highest hereditary officers of Sindhia’s Court is called the Farásh-khāna-wālā. [The same word used for the tamarisk tree (Tamarix gallica) is a corr. of the Ar. fardā.]

c. 1300.—“Sa grande richesce apparut en un paveillon que li roys d’Ermenie envia au roy de France, qui valoit bien cinq cens livres; et li manda li roy de Hermenie que uns ferrais au Soudanc dou Coyne li avoit donnei. Ferrais est cil qui tient les paveillons au Soudanc et qui li nettoie ses mesons.”—Jehan, Seigneur de Joinville, ed. De Wailly, p. 78.

c. 1513.—“And the gentlemen rode . . . upon horses from the king’s stables, attended by his servants whom they call farazes, who groom and feed them.”—Correa, Lendas, II. i. 364.

(Here it seems to be used for Syce (q.v.) or groom).

[1548.—“Ffarazes.” See under BATTA, a.]

c. 1590.—“Besides, there are employed 1000 Farráshes, natives of Irán, Turán, and Hindostán.”—Áin, i. 47.

1648.—“The Frassy for the Tents.”—Van Twist, 86.

1673.—“Where live the Frasses or Porters also.”—Fryer, 67.

1764.—(Allowances to the Resident at Murshidābād).

“Public servants as follows:—1 Vakeel, 2 Moonshees, 4 Chobdars, 2 Jemadars, 20 Peons, 10 Mussalchees, 12 Bearers, 2 Chowry Bearers, and such a number of Frosts and Lascars as he may have occasion for removing his tents.”—In Long, 406.

[1812.—“Much of course depends upon the chief of the Feroshes or tent-pitchers, called the Ferosh-Bashee, who must necessarily be very active.”—Morier, Journey through Persia, 70.]

1824.—“Call the ferashes . . . and let them beat the rogues on the soles of their feet, till they produce the fifty ducats.”—Hajji Baba (ed. 1835), 40.

[1859.—

“The Sultan rises and the dark Ferrash Strikes and prepares it for another guest.”
FitzGerald, Omar Khayyam, xlv.]

FEDEA, FUDDEA, s. A denomination of money formerly current in Bombay and the adjoining coast; Mahr. p'hadyā (qu. Ar. fadya, ransom?). It constantly occurs in the account statements of the 16th century, e.g. of Nunez (1554) as a money of account, of which 4 went to the silver tanga, [see TANGA] 20 to the Pardao. In Milburn (1813) it is a pice or copper coin, of which 50 went to a rupee. Prof. Robertson Smith suggests that this may be the Ar. denomination of a small coin used in Egypt, fadda (i.e. ‘silverling’). It may be an objection that the letter zadd used in that word is generally pronounced in India as a z. The fadda is the Turkish pāra, $\frac{1}{20}$ of a piastre, an infinitesimal value now. [Burton (Arabian Nights, xi. 98) gives 2000 faddahs as equal about 1s. 2d.] But, according to Lane, the name was originally given to half-dirhems, coined early in the 15th century, and these would be worth about 5½d. The fedea of 1554 would be about 4½d. This rather indicates the identity of the names.

FERAZEE, s. Properly Ar. farāzī, from fardīz (pl. of farz) ‘the divine ordinances.’ A name applied to a body of Mahomedan Puritans in Bengal, kindred to the Wahābis of Arabia. They represent a reaction and protest against the corrupt condition and pagan practices into which Mahom-edanism in Eastern India had fallen, analogous to the former decay of native Christianity in the south (see MALABAR RITES). This reaction was begun by Hajji Shariyatullah, a native of the village of Daulatpūr, in the district of Farīdpūr, who was killed in an agrarian riot in 1831. His son Dūdū Mīyān succeeded him as head of the sect. Since his death, some 35 years ago, the influence of the body is said to have diminished, but it had spread very largely through Lower Bengal. The Fardīzī wraps his dhoty (q.v.) round his loins, without crossing it between his legs, a practice which he regards as heathenish, as a Bedouin would.

FEROZESHUHUR, FEROSHUHR, PHERŪSHAHR, n.p. The last of these appears to be the correct representation of this name of the scene of the hard-fought battle of 21st-22nd December, 1845. For, according to Col. R. C. Temple, the Editor of Panjab Notes and Queries, ii. 116 (1885), the village was named after Bhāi Pherū, a Sikh saint of the beginning of the century, who lies buried at Mīān-ke-Taḥsīl in Lahore District.

FETISH, s. A natural object, or animal, made an object of worship. From Port. fetiço, feitico, or fetisso (old Span. fechizo), apparently from factitius, signifying first ‘artificial,’ and then ‘unnatural,’ ‘wrought by charms,’ &c. The word is not Anglo-Indian; but it was at an early date applied by the Portuguese to the magical figures, &c., used by natives in Africa and India, and has thence been adopted into French and English. The word has of late years acquired a special and technical meaning, chiefly through the writings of Comte. [See Jevons, Intr. to the Science of Rel. 166 seqq.] Raynouard (Lex. Roman.) has fachurier, fachilador, for ‘a sorcerer,’ which he places under fat, i.e. fatum, and cites old Catalan fadador, old Span. hadador, and then Port. feiticeiro, &c. But he has mixed up the derivatives of two different words, fatum and factitius. Prof. Max Müller quotes, from Muratori, a work of 1311 which has: “incantationes, sacrilegia, auguria, vel malefica, quae facturae seu prae-stigia vulgariter appellantur.” And 1782.—“Ainsi un Européen est tout ce que les Indiens connoissent de plus méprisable ; ils le nomment Parangui, nom qu'ils donnèrent aux Portugais, lorsque ceux-ci abordèrent dans leur pays, et c'est un terme qui marque le souverain mépris qu'ils ont pour toutes les nations de l'Europe.”—Sonnerat, i. 102.

1791.—“... il demande à la passer (la nuit) dans un des logemens de la pagoda ; mais on lui refusa d'y coucher, à cause qu'il étoit frangui.”—B. de St. Pierre, Chaumière Indienne, 21.

1794.—“Feringee. The name given by the natives of the Decan to Europeans in general, but generally understood by the English to be confined to the Portuguese.”—Moor's Narrative, 504.

[1820.—“In the southern quarter (of Backergunje) there still exist several original Portuguese colonies. . . . They are a meagre, puny, imbecile race, blacker than the natives, who hold them in the utmost contempt, and designate them by the appellation of Caula Ferenghies, or black Europeans.”—Hamilton, Descr. of Hindostan, i. 133 ; for an account of the Feringhis of Sibpur, see Beveridge, Bākarganj, 110.]

1824.—“‘Now Hajji,’ said the ambassador. . . . ‘The Franks are composed of many, many nations. As fast as I hear of one hog, another begins to grunt, and then another and another, until I find that there is a whole herd of them.’”—Hajji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 432.

1825.—“Europeans, too, are very little known here, and I heard the children continually calling out to us, as we passed through the villages, ‘Feringhee, ue Feringhee !’”—Heber, ii. 43.

1828.—“Mr. Elphinstone adds in a note that in India it is a positive affront to call an Englishman a Feringhee.”—Life of E. ii. 207.

c. 1861.—

“There goes my lord the Feringhee, who talks so civil and bland,
But raves like a soul in Jehannum if I don't quite understand—
He begins by calling me Sahib, and ends by calling me fool. . . .”

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

The Tibetans are said to have corrupted Feringhee into Pelong (or Philin). But Jaeschke disputes this origin of Pelong.

FIRMAUN, s. Pers. farmān, ‘an order, patent, or passport,’ der. from farmūdan, ‘to order.’ Sir T. Roe below calls it firma, as if suggestive of the Italian for ‘signature.’

[1561.—“... wrote him a letter called Firmao. . . .”—Castanheda, Bk. viii. ch. 99.

[1602.—“They said that he had a Firmao of the Grand Turk to go overland to the Kingdom of (Portugal). . . .”—Couto, Dec. viii. ch. 15.]

1606.—“We made our journey having a Firman (Firmāo) of safe conduct from the same Soltan of Shiraz.”—Gouvea, f. 140b.

[1614.—“But if possible, bring their chaps, their Firma, for what they say or promise.”—Foster, Letters, ii. 28.]

1616.—“Then I moued him for his favour for an English Factory to be resident in the Towne, which hee willingly granted, and gave present order to the Buxy to draw a Firma. . . . for their residence.”—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 541 ; [Hak. Soc. i. 93 ; also see i. 47].

1648.—“The 21st April the Bassa sent me a Firman or Letter of credentials to all his lords and Governors.”—T. Van den Broecke, 32.

1673.—“Our Usage by the Pharmaund (or charters) granted successively from their Emperors, is kind enough, ‘but the better because our Naval Power curbs them.’”—Fryer, 115.

1683.—“They (the English) complain, and not without a Cause ; they having a Phirmaund, and Hodgee Sophee Caun's Perwannas thereon, in their hands, which cleared them thereof ; and to pay Custome now they will not consent, but will rather withdraw their trading. Wherefore their desire is that for 3,000 rup. Piscush (as they paid formerly at Hugly) and 2,000 r. more yearly on account of Jidgea, which they are willing to pay, they may on that condition have a grant to be Custome Free.”—Nabob's Letter to Vizier (MS.), in Hedges' Diary, July 18 ; [Hak. Soc. i. 101].

1689.—“... by her came Bengal Peons who brought in several letters and a firmaun from the new Nabob of Bengal.”—Wheeler, i. 213.

c. 1690.—“Now we may see the Mogul's Stile in his Phirmaund to be sent to Surat, as it stands translated by the Company's Interpreter.”—A. Hamilton, i. 227 ; [ed. 1744, i. 230].

FISCAL, s. Dutch Fiscaal ; used in Ceylon for ‘Sheriff’ ; a relic of the Dutch rule in the island. [It was also used in the Dutch settlements in Bengal (see quotation from Hedges, below). “In Malabar the Fiscal was a Dutch Superintendent of Police, Justice of the Peace and Attorney General in criminal cases. The office and title of Fiscal was retained in British Cochin till 1860, when the designation was changed into Tahsildar and Sub-Magistrate.”—(Logan, Malabar, iii. Gloss. s.v.)]

[1684.—“... the late Dutch Fiscall's Budgero. . . .”—See quotation from Hedges, under DEVIL'S REACH.]

FLORICAN, FLORIKIN, s. A name applied in India to two species of small bustard, the 'Bengal Florican' (Sypheotides bengalensis, Gmelin), and the Lesser Florican (S. auritus, Latham), the likh of Hind., a word which is not in the dictionaries. [In the N.W.P. the common name for the Bengal Florican is charas, P. charz. The name Curmoor in Bombay (see quotation from Forbes below) seems to be khar-mor, the 'grass peacock.' Another Mahr. name, tunamora, has the same meaning.] The origin of the word Florican is exceedingly obscure; see Jerdon below. It looks like Dutch. [The N.E.D. suggests a connection with Flanderkin, a native of Flanders.] Littré has: "Florican . . . Nom à Ceylon d'un grand échassier que l'on présume être un grue." This is probably mere misapprehension in his authority.

1780.—"The floriken, a most delicious bird of the buzzard (sic!) kind."—Munro's Narrative, 199.

1785.—

"A floriken at eve we saw
And kill'd in yonder glen,
When lo! it came to table raw,
And rouzed (sic) the rage of Ben."
In Seton-Karr, i. 98.

1807.—"The floriken is a species of the bustard. . . . The cock is a noble bird, but its flight is very heavy and awkward . . . if only a wing be broken . . . he will run off at such a rate as will baffle most spaniels. . . . There are several kinds of the floriken . . . the bastard floriken is much smaller. . . . Both kinds . . . delight in grassy plains, keeping clear of heavy cover."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, 104.

1813.—"The florican or curmoor (Otis houbara, Lin.) exceeds all the Indian wild fowl in delicacy of flavour."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 275; [2nd ed. i. 501].

1824.—". . . bringing with him a brace of florikens, which he had shot the previous day. I had never seen the bird before; it is somewhat larger than a blackcock, with brown and black plumage, and evidently of the bustard species."—Heber, i. 258.

1862.—"I have not been able to trace the origin of the Anglo-Indian word 'Florikin,' but was once informed that the Little Bustard in Europe was sometimes called Flanderkin. Latham gives the word 'Flercher' as an English name, and this, apparently, has the same origin as Florikin."—Jerdon's Birds, 2nd ed. ii. 625. (We doubt if Jerdon has here understood Latham correctly. What Latham writes is, in describing the Passage Bustard, which, he says, is the size of the Little Bustard: "Inhabits India. Called Passage Plover. . . . I find that it is known in India by the name of Oorail; by some of the English called Flercher." (Suppl.

to Gen. Synopsis of Birds, 1787, 229.) Here we understand "the English" to be the English in India, and Flercher to be a clerical error for some form of "floriken." [Flercher is not in N.E.D.] 1875.—"In the rains it is always matter of emulation at Rajkot, who shall shoot the first purple-crested florican."—Wyllie's Essays, 358.

FLOWERED-SILVER. A term applied by Europeans in Burma to the standard quality of silver used in the ingot currency of Independent Burma, called by the Burmese yowet-ni or 'Red-leaf.' The English term is taken from the appearance of stars and radiating lines, which forms on the surface of this particular alloy, as it cools in the crucible. The Ava standard is, or was, of about 15 per cent. alloy, the latter containing, besides copper, a small proportion of lead, which is necessary, according to the Burmese, for the production of the flowers or stars (see Yule, Mission to Ava, 259 seq.).

[1744.—"Their way to make flower'd Silver is, when the Silver and Copper are mix'd and melted together, and while the Metal is liquid, they put it into a Shallow Mould, of what Figure and Magnitude they please, and before the Liquidity is gone, they blow on it through a small wooden Pipe, which makes the Face, or Part blown upon, appear with the Figures of Flowers or Stars, but I never saw any European or other Foreigner at Pegu, have the Art to make those Figures appear, and if there is too great a Mixture of Alloy, no Figures will appear."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, ii. 41.]

FLY, s. The sloping, or roof part of the canvas of a tent is so called in India; but we have not traced the origin of the word; nor have we found it in any English dictionary. [The N.E.D. gives the primary idea as "something attached by the edge," as a strip on a garment to cover the button-holes.] A tent such as officers generally use has two flies, for better protection from sun and rain. The vertical canvas walls are called Kandt (see CANAUT). [Another sense of the word is "a quick-travelling carriage" (see quotation in Forbes below).]

[1784.—"We all followed in fly-palanquins."—Sir J. Day, in Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 88.]

1810.—"The main part of the operation of pitching the tent, consisting of raising the flies, may be performed, and shelter afforded,

FOOZILOW, TO, v. The imperative p’huslido of the H. verb p’huslând, ‘to flatter or cajole,’ used, in a common Anglo-Indian fashion (see BUNNOW, PUCKAROW, LUGOW), as a verbal infinitive.

FORAS LANDS, s. This is a term peculiar to the island of Bombay, and an inheritance from the Portuguese. They are lands reclaimed from the sea, by the construction of the Vellard (q.v.) at Breech-Candy, and other embankments, on which account they are also known as ‘Salt Batty [see BATTA] (i.e. rice) -grounds.’ The Court of Directors, to encourage reclamation, in 1703 authorised these lands to be leased rent-free to the reclaimers for a number of years, after which a small quit-rent was to be fixed. But as individuals would not undertake the maintenance of the embankments, the Government stepped in and constructed the Vellard at considerable expense. The lands were then let on terms calculated to compensate the Government. The tenure of the lands, under these circumstances, for many years gave rise to disputes and litigation as to tenant-right, the right of Government to resume, and other like subjects. The lands were known by the title Foras, from the peculiar tenure, which should perhaps be Foros, from foro, ‘a quit-rent.’ The Indian Act VI. of 1851 arranged for the termination of these differences, by extinguishing the disputed rights of Government, except in regard to lands taken up for public purposes, and by the constitution of a Foras Land Commission to settle the whole matter. This work was completed by October 1853. The roads from the Fort crossing the “Flats,” or Foras Lands, between Malabar Hill and Parell were generally known as “the Foras Roads”; but this name seems to have passed away, and the Municipal Commissioners have superseded that general title by such names as Clerk Road, Bellasis Road, Falkland Road. One name, ‘Comattee-poor Forest Road,’ perhaps preserves the old generic title under a disguise.

Forasdârs are the holders of Foras Lands. See on the whole matter Bombay Selections, No. III., New Series, 1854. The following quaint quotation is from a petition of Forasdârs of Mahim and other places regarding some points in the working of the Commission :

1852. — “. . . that the case with respect to the old and new salt batty grounds, may it please your Honble. Board to consider deeply, is totally different, because in their original state the grounds were not of the nature of other sweet waste grounds on the island, let out as foras, nor these grounds were of that state as one could saddle himself at the first undertaking thereof with leases or grants even for that smaller rent as the foras is under the denomination of Badger notes: "Farasola is the plural of fārsala . . . still in ordinary use among the Arabs of the Red Sea and Persian Gulf; but I am unable to verify (its) origin." Is the word, which is sometimes called frail, the same as a frail, or basket, of figs? And again, is it possible that fārsala is the same word as 'parcel,' through Latin particella? We see that this is Sir R. Burton's opinion (Cambens, iv. 390; [Arab. Nights, vi. 312]). [The N.E.D. says: "O. F. frayel of unknown origin."]

c. 1760.—"The island . . . still continues divided into three Roman Catholic parishes, or Freguezias, as they call them; which are Bombay, Mahim, and Salcaçam."—Grose, i. 45.

FULEETA, s. Properly P. palita or fatila, 'a slow-match,' as of a match-lock, but its usual colloquial Anglo-Indian application is to a cotton slow-match used to light cigars, and often furnished with a neat or decorated silver tube. This kind of cigar-light is called at Madras Ramasammy (q.v.).

FULEETA-PUP, s. This, in Bengal, is a well-known dish in the repertory of the ordinary native cook. It is a corruption of 'fritter-puff'!

FURLOUGH, s. This word for a soldier's leave has acquired a peculiar citizenship in Anglo-Indian colloquial, from the importance of the matter to those employed in Indian service. It appears to have been first made the subject of systematic regulation in 1796. The word seems to have come to England from the Dutch Verlof, 'leave of absence,' in the early part of the 17th century, through those of our countrymen who had been engaged in the wars of the Netherlands. It is used by Ben Jonson, who had himself served in those wars:

FURNAVEESE, n.p. This once familiar title of a famous Mahratta Minister (Nana Furnaveese) is really the Persian fard-navis, 'statement writer,' or secretary.

[1824.—"The head civil officer is the Furnaveese (a term almost synonymous with that of minister of finance) who receives the accounts of the renters and collectors of revenue."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 531.]

FUSLY, adj. Ar.—P. faslī, relating to the fasl, season or crop. This name is applied to certain solar eras established for use in revenue and other civil transactions, under the Mahommedan rule in India, to meet the inconvenience of the lunar calendar of the Hijra, in its want of correspondence with the natural seasons. Three at least of these eras were established by Akbar, applying to different parts of his dominions, intended to accommodate themselves as far as possible to the local calendars, and commencing in each case with the Hijra year of his accession to the throne (A.H. 963 = A.D. 1555-56), though the month of commencement varies. [See Āin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 30.] The Faslī year of the Deccan again was introduced by Shāh Jehān when settling the revenue system of the Mahratta country in 1636; and as it starts with the Hijra date of that year, it is, in numeration, two years in advance of the others.

Two of these faslī years are still in use, as regards revenue matters, viz. the Faslī of Upper India, under which the Faslī year 1286 began 2nd April 1878; and that of Madras, under which Faslī year 1286 began 1st July 1877.

FUTWA, s. Ar. fatwā. The decision of a council of men learned in Mahommedan law, on any point of Moslem law or morals. But technically and specifically, the deliverance of a Mahommedan law-officer on a case put before him. Such a deliverance was, as a rule, given officially and GALLEVAT, s. The name applied to a kind of galley, or war-boat with oars, of small draught of water, which continued to be employed on the west coast of India down to the latter half of the 18th century. The work quoted below under 1717 explains the galley-watts to be "large boats like Gravesend Tilt-boats; they carry about 6 Carvel-Guns and 60 men at small arms, and Oars; They sail with a Peak Sail like the Mizen of a Man-of-War, and row with 30 or 40 Oars. . . . They are principally used for landing Troops for a Descent. . . ." (p. 22). The word is highly interesting from its genealogical tree; it is a descendant of the great historical and numerous family of the Galley (galley, galiot, galleon, galeass, galleida, galeoncino, &c.), and it is almost certainly the immediate parent of the hardly less historical Jolly-boat, which plays so important a part in British naval annals. [Prof. Skeat takes jolly-boat to be an English adaptation of Danish jolle, 'a yawl'; Mr. Foster remarks that jollyvatt as an English word, is at least as old as 1495-97 (Oppenheim, Naval Accounts and Inventories, Navy Rec. Soc. viii. 193) (Letters, iii. 296).] If this be true, which we can hardly doubt, we shall have three of the boats of the British man-of-war owing their names (quod minime reris!) to Indian originals, viz. the Cutter, the Dingy, and the Jolly-boat to catur, dingy and galle-vat. This last derivation we take from Sir J. Campbell's Bombay Gazetteer (xiii. 417), a work that one can hardly mention without admiration. This writer, who states that a form of the same word, galbat, is now generally used by the natives in Bombay waters for large foreign vessels, such as English ships and steamers, is inclined to refer it to jalba, a word for a small boat used on the shores of the Red Sea (see Dozy and Eng., p. 276), which appears below in a quotation from Ibn Batuta, and which vessels were called by the early Portuguese geluas. Whether this word is the parent of galley and its derivatives, as Sir J. Campbell thinks, must be very doubtful, for galley is much older in European use than he seems to think, as the quotation from Asser shows. The word also occurs in Byzantine writers of the 9th century, such as the Continuator of Theophanes quoted below, and the Emperor Leo. We shall find below the occurrence of galley as an Oriental word in the form jalia, which looks like an Arabized adoption from a Mediterranean tongue. The Turkish, too, still has kalyūn for a ship of the line, which is certainly an adoption from galeone. The origin of galley is a very obscure question. Amongst other suggestions mentioned by Diez (Etym. Worterb., 2nd ed. i. 198-199) is one from γαλεός, a shark, or from γαλεώτης, a sword-fish—the latter very suggestive of a galley with its aggressive beak; another is from γάλη, a word in Hesychius, which is the apparent origin of 'gallery.' It is possible that galeota, galiote, may have been taken directly from the shark or sword-fish, though in imitation of the galea already in use. For we shall see below that galiot was used for a pirate. [The N.E.D. gives the European synonymous words, and regards the ultimate etymology of galley as unknown.]

The word gallevat seems to come directly from the galeota of the Portuguese and other S. European nations, a kind of inferior galley with only one bank of oars, which appears under the form galion in Joinville, infra (not to be confounded with the galleons of a later period, which were larger vessels), and often in the 13th and 14th centuries as galeota, galiotes, &c. It is constantly mentioned as forming part of the Portuguese fleets in India. Bluteau defines galeota as "a small galley with one mast, and with 15 or 20 benches a side, and one oar to each bench."

So this incursion of these people afflicted the empire on the one hand, and on the other the advance of the fleet on Crete, which with some 20 cymbaria, and 7 galleys (γαλέας), and taking with it cargo-vessels also, went about, descending sometimes on the Cyclades Islands, and sometimes on the whole coast (of the main) right up to Proconnesus."—Theophanis Continuatio, Lib. iv. 33-34.

[1665.—“He gave a sufficient number of gallotes to escort them to sea.”—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 193.]

1689.—“He embarked about the middle of October in the year 1542, in a gallot, which carried the new Captain of Comorin.”—Dryden, Life of Xavier. (In Works, ed. 1821, xvi. 87.)

c. 1760.—“Of these armed boats called Gallevats, the Company maintains also a competent number, for the service of their marine.”—Grose, ii. 62.

1763.—“The Gallevats are large row-boats, built like the grab, but of smaller dimensions, the largest rarely exceeding 70 tons; they have two masts . . . they have 40 or 50 stout oars, and may be rowed four miles an hour.”—Orme, i. 409.

[1813.—“ . . . here they build vessels of all sizes, from a ship of the line to the smallest grabs and gallivats, employed in the Company's services.”—Forbes. Or Mem. 2nd ed. i. 94-5.]

GAMBIER, s. The extract of a climbing shrub (Uncaria Gambier, Roxb.? Nauclea Gambier, Hunter; N.O. Rubiaceae) which is a native of the regions about the Straits of Malacca, and is much grown in plantations in Singapore and the neighbouring islands. The substance in chemical composition and qualities strongly resembles cutch (q.v.), and the names Catechu and Terra Japonica are applied to both. The plant is mentioned in Debry, 1601 (iii. 99), and by Rumphius, c. 1690 (v. 63), who describes its use in mastication with betel-nut; but there is no account of the catechu made from it, known to the authors of the Pharmacographia, before 1780. Crawfurd gives the name as Javanese, but Hanbury and Flückiger point out the resemblance to the Tamil name for catechu, Katta Kāmbu (Pharmacographia, 298 seqq.). [Mr. Skeat points out that the standard Malay name is gambir, of which the origin is uncertain, but that the English word is clearly derived from it.]

GANDA, s. This is the H. name for a rhinoceros, gainḍa, gendā from Skt. gāṇḍa (giving also gaṇḍaka, gaṇḍāṅga, gaṇḍendra). The note on the passage in Barbosa by his Hak. Soc. editor is a marvel in the way of error. The following is from a story of Correa about a battle between “Bober Mirza” (i.e. Sultan Baber) and a certain King “Cacandar” (Sikandar?), in which I have been unable to trace even what events it misrepresents. But it keeps Fernan Mendez Pinto in countenance, as regards the latter's statement about the advance of the King of the Tartars against Peking with four score thousand rhinoceroses!

“The King Cacandar divided his army into five battles well arrayed, consisting of 140,000 horse and 280,000 foot, and in front of them a battle of 800 elephants, which fought with swords upon their tusks, and on their backs castles with archers and musketeers. And in front of the elephants 80 rhinoceroses (gandas), like that which went to Portugal, and which they call bichā (?); these on the horn which they have over the snout carried three-pronged iron weapons with which they fought very stoutly . . . and the Mogors with their arrows made a great discharge, wounding many of the elephants and the gandas, which as they felt the arrows, turned and fled, breaking up the battles. . . .”—Correa, iii. 573-574.

1516.—“The King (of Guzerat) sent a Ganda to the King of Portugal, because they told him that he would be pleased to see her.”—Barbosa, 58.

1553.—“And in return for many rich presents which this Diogo Fernandez carried to the King, and besides others which the King sent to Affonso Albuquerque, there was an animal, the biggest which Nature has created after the elephant, and the great enemy of the latter . . . which the natives of the land of Cambaya, whence this one came, call Ganda, and the Greeks and Latins Rhinoceros. And Affonso d'Albuquerque sent this to the King Don Manuel, and it came to this Kingdom, and it was afterwards lost on its way to Rome, when the King sent it as a present to the Pope."—Barros, Dec. II. liv. x. cap. 1. [Also see d'Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. iv. 104 seq.]

GANTON, s. This is mentioned by some old voyagers as a weight or measure by which pepper was sold in the Malay Archipelago. It is presumably Malay gantang, defined by Crawford as "a dry measure, equal to about a gallon." [Klinkert has: "gantang, a measure of capacity 5 katis among the Malays; also a gold weight, formerly 6 suku, but later 1 bongkal, or 8 suku." Gantang-gantang is 'cartridge-case.']

1554.—"Also a candy of Goa, answers to 140 gantas, equivalent to 15 paraas, 30 medidas at 42 medidas to the paraa."—A. Nunes, 39.

[1615.—". . . 1000 gantans of pepper."—Foster, Letters, iii. 168.]

"I sent to borow 4 or five gantas of oyle of Yasemon Dono. . . But he returned answer he had non, when I know, to the contrary, he bought a parcell out of my handes the other day."—Cocks's Diary, i. 6.

GANZA, s. The name given by old travellers to the metal which in former days constituted the inferior currency of Pegu. According to some it was lead; others call it a mixt metal. Lead in rude lumps is still used in the bazars of Burma for small purchases. (Yule, Mission to Ava, 259.) The word is evidently Skt. kansa, 'bell-metal,' whence Malay gangsa, which last is probably the word which travellers picked up.

1554.—"In this Kingdom of Pegu there is no coined money, and what they use commonly consists of dishes, pans, and other utensils of service, made of a metal like fronleyra (?), broken in pieces; and this is called gamça. . ."—A. Nunes, 38.

" . . . vn altra statua cosi fatta di Ganza; che è vn metallo di che fanno le lor monete, fatte di rame e di piombo mescolati insieme."—Cesare Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 394r.

c. 1567.—"The current money that is in this Citie, and throughout all this kingdom, is called Gansa or Ganza, which is made of copper and lead. It is not the money of the king, but every man may stampe it that will. . ."—Caesar Frederick, E.T., in Purchas, iii. 1717-18.

1726.—"Rough Peguan Gans (a brass mixt with lead). . ."—Valentijn, Chor. 34.

1727.—"Plenty of Ganse or Lead, which passeth all over the Pegu Dominions, for Money."—A. Hamilton, ii. 41; [ed. 1744, ii. 40].

GARCE, s. A cubic measure for rice, &c., in use on the Madras coast, as usual varying much in value. Buchanan (infra) treats it as a weight. The word is Tel. gārisa, gārise, Can. garasi, Tam. karisai. [In Chingleput salt is weighed by the Garce of 124 maunds, or nearly 5.152 tons (Crole, Man. 58); in Salem, 400 Markals (see MERCALL) are 185.2 cubic feet, or 18 quarters English (Le Fanu, Man. ii. 329); in Malabar, 120 Paras of 25 Macleod seers, or 10,800 lbs. (Logan, Man. ii. clxxix.). As a superficial measure in the N. Circars, it is the area which will produce one Garce of grain.]

[1684-5.—"A Generall to Conimeer of this day date enordring them to provide 200 gars of salt. . ."—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 40, who notes that a still earlier use of the word will be found in Notes and Exts. i. 97.]

1784.—"The day that advice was received . . . (of peace with Tippoo) at Madras, the price of rice fell there from 115 to 80 pagodas the garce."—In Seton-Karr, i. 13.

1807.—"The proper native weights used in the Company's Jaghire are as follows: 10 Vara hun (Pagodas)=1 Polam, 40 Polams=1 Visay, 8 Visay (Vees)=1 Manungu, 20 Manungus (Maunds)=1 Baruays, 20 Baruays (Candies)=1 Gursay, called by the English Garse. The Vara hun or Star Pagoda weighs 52½ grains, therefore the Visay is nearly three pounds avoirdupois (see VISS); and the Garse is nearly 1265 lbs."—F. Buchanan, Mysore, &c., i. 6.

By this calculation, the Garse should be 9600 lbs. instead of 1265 as printed.

GARDEE, s. A name sometimes given, in 18th century, to native soldiers disciplined in European fashion, i.e. sepoys (q.v.). The Indian Vocabulary (1788) gives: "Gardee—a tribe inhabiting the provinces of Bijapore, &c., esteemed good foot soldiers." The word may be only a corruption of 'guard,' but probably the origin assigned in the second quotation may be well founded; 'Guard' may have shaped the corruption of Gharbi. The old Bengal sepoy were commonly known in the N.W. as Purbias or Easterns (see POORUB). [Women in the Amazon corps at Hyderabad (Deccan), known as the Zafar Paltan, or 'Victorious Battalion,' were called gardunee (Gārdanī), the feminine form of Gārad or Guard.]

1762.—"A coffre who commanded the Telingas and Gardees . . . asked the horseman whom the horse belonged to?"—Native Letter, in Van Sittart, i. 141.

1786.—". . . originally they (Sipahis) were commanded by Arabians, or those of their descendants born in the Canara and Concan or Western parts of India, where those foreigners style themselves Gharbies or Western. Moreover these corps were composed mostly of Arabs, Negroes, and Habissinians, all of which bear upon that coast the same name of Gharbi. . . . In time the word Gharbi was corrupted by both the French and Indians into that of Gardi, which is now the general name of Sipahies all over India save Bengal . . . where they are stiled Talingas."—Note by Transl. of Seir Mutaqherin, ii. 93.

[1815.—"The women composing them are called Gardunees, a corruption of our word Guard."—Blacker, Mem. of the Operations in India in 1817-19, p. 213 note.]

GARDENS, GARDEN-HOUSE, s. In the 18th century suburban villas at Madras and Calcutta were so called. 'Garden Reach' below Fort William took its name from these.

1682.—"Early in the morning I was met by Mr. Littleton and most of the Factory, near Hugly, and about 9 or 10 o'clock by Mr. Vincent near the Dutch Garden, who came attended by severall Boats and Budge-rows guarded by 35 Firelocks, and about 50 Rashpoots and Peons well armed."—Hedges, Diary, July 24; [Hak. Soc. i. 32].

1685.—"The whole Council . . . came to attend the President at the garden-house. . . ."—Pringle, Diary, Fort St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 115; in Wheeler, i. 139.

1747.—"In case of an Attack at the Garden House, if by a superior Force they should be oblig'd to retire, according to the orders and send a Horseman before them to advise of the Approach. . . ."—Report of Council of War at Fort St. David, in India Office MS. Records.

1758.—"The guard of the redoubt retreated before them to the garden-house."—Orme, ii. 303.

"Mahomed Isoof . . . rode with a party of horse as far as Maskelyne's garden."—Ibid. iii. 425.

1772.—"The place of my residence at present is a garden-house of the Nabob, about 4 miles distant from Moorshedabad."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 34.

1782.—"A body of Hyder's horse were at St. Thomas's Mount on the 29th ult. and Gen. Munro and Mr. Brodie with great difficulty escaped from the General's Gardens. They were pursued by Hyder's horse within a mile of the Black Town."—India Gazette, May 11.

1809.—"The gentlemen of the settlement live entirely in their garden-houses, as they very properly call them."—Id. Valentia, i. 389.

1810.—". . . Rural retreats called Garden-houses."—Williamson, V. M. i. 137.

1873.—"To let, or for sale, Serle's Gardens at Adyar.—For particulars apply," &c.—Madras Mail, July 3.

GARRY, GHARRY, s. H. gāri, a cart or carriage. The word is used by Anglo-Indians, at least on the Bengal side, in both senses. Frequently the species is discriminated by a distinctive prefix, as palkee-garry (palankin carriage), sej-garry (chaise), rel-garry (railway carriage), &c. [The modern dawk-garry was in its original form called the "Equirotal Carriage," from the four wheels being of equal dimensions. The design is said to have been suggested by Lord Ellenborough. (See the account and drawing in Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 3 seq.).]

1810.—"The common g'horry . . . is rarely, if ever, kept by any European, but may be seen plying for hire in various parts of Calcutta."—Williamson, V. M. i. 329.

1811.—The Gary is represented in Solvyns's engravings as a two-wheeled ruth [see RUT] (i.e. the primitive native carriage, built like a light hackery) with two ponies.

1866.—"My husband was to have met us with a two-horse gharee."—Trevelyan, Dawk Bungalow, 384.

[1892.—"The brām gāri, brougham; the fitton gāri, phaeton or barouche; the vāgnūt, waggonette, are now built in most large towns. . . . The vāgnūt seems likely to be the carriage of the future, because of its capacity."—R. Kipling, Beast and Man in India, 193.]

GAUM, GONG, s. A village, H. gāon, from Skt. grāma.

1519.—"In every one of the said villages, which they call guāoos."—Goa Proclam. in Arch. Port. Orient., fasc. 5, 38.

Gāonwār occurs in the same vol. (p. 75), under the forms gancare and guancare, for the village heads in Port. India.

GAVTAL.

(see MUGGUR) (Crocodilus biporcatus) not the ghariydl.

c. 1809.—“In the Brohmoputro as well as in the Ganges there are two kinds of crocodile, which at Goyalpara are both called Kumir; but each has a specific name. The Crocodilus Gangeticus is called Ghoriyal, and the other is called Bongcha.”—Buchanan's Rungpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 581-2.

GAZAT, s. This is domestic Hind. for ‘dessert.’ (Panjab N. & Q. ii. 184).

GECKO, s. A kind of house lizard. The word is not now in Anglo-Indian use; it is a naturalist's word; and also is French. It was no doubt originally an onomatopoeia from the creature's reiterated utterance. Marcel Devic says the word is adopted from Malay gekok [gēkoq]. This we do not find in Crawfurd, who has tāké, tākek, and goké, all evidently attempts to represent the utterance. In Burma the same, or a kindred lizard, is called toké, in like imitation.

1631.—Bontius seems to identify this lizard with the Guana (q.v.), and says its bite is so venomous as to be fatal unless the part be immediately cut out, or cauterized. This is no doubt a fable. “Nostratis ipsum animal appposito vocabulo gecco vocant; quippe non secus ac Cucyz apud nos suum cantum iterat, etiam gecko assiduo sonat, prius edito stridore qualem Picus emittit.”—Lib. V. cap. 5, p. 57.

1711.—“Chaccos, as Cuckoos receive their Names from the Noise they make. . . . They are much like lizards, but larger. ‘Tis said their Dung is so venomous,’ &c.—Lockyer, 84.

1727.—“They have one dangerous little Animal called a Jackoa, in shape almost like a Lizard. It is very malicious . . . and wherever the Liquor lights on an Animal Body, it presently cankers the Flesh.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 131; [ed. 1744, ii. 136].

This is still a common belief. (See BISCOBRA).

1883.—“This was one of those little house lizards called geckos, which have pellets at the ends of their toes. They are not repulsive brutes like the garden lizard, and I am always on good terms with them. They have full liberty to make use of my house, for which they seem grateful, and say chuck, chuck, chuck.”—Tribes on My Frontier, 38.

GENTOO, s. and adj. This word is a corruption of the Portuguese Gentio, ‘a gentile’ or heathen, which they applied to the Hindus in contradistinction to the Moras or ‘Moors,’ i.e. Mahomedans. [See MOOR.] Both terms are now obsolete among English people, except perhaps that Gentoo still lingers at Madras in the sense b; for the terms Gentio and Gentoo were applied in two senses:

a. To the Hindūs generally.

b. To the Telugu-speaking Hindūs of the Peninsula specially, and to their language.

The reason why the term became thus specifically applied to the Telugu people is probably because, when the Portuguese arrived, the Telugu monarchy of Vijayanagara, or Bijanagar (see BISNAGAR, NARSINGA) was dominant over great part of the Peninsula. The officials were chiefly of Telugu race, and thus the people of this race, as the most important section of the Hindūs, were par excellence the Gentiles, and their language the Gentile language. Besides these two specific senses, Gentio was sometimes used for heathen in general. Thus in F. M. Pinto: “A very famous Corsair who was called Hinimilau, a Chinese by nation, and who from a Gentio as he was, had a little time since turned Moor. . . .”—Ch. L.

1548.—“The Religiosos of this territory spend so largely, and give such great alms at the cost of your Highness's administration that it disposes of a good part of the funds. . . . I believe indeed they do all this in real zeal and sincerity . . . but I think it might be reduced a half, and all for the better; for there are some of them who often try to make Christians by force, and worry the *Gentoo*s (gentios) to such a degree that it drives the population away.”—Simao Botelho Cartas, 35.

1563.—“. . . Among the Gentiles (Gentios) Rão is as much as to say ‘King.’”—Garcia, f. 35b.

„ “This ambergris is not so highly valued among the Moors, but it is highly prized among the Gentiles.”—Ibid. f. 14.

1582.—“A gentile . . . whose name was Canaca.”—Castañeda, trans. by N. L., f. 31.

1588.—In a letter of this year to the Viceroy, the King (Philip II.) says he “understands the Gentios are much the best persons to whom to farm the alfundegas (customs, &c.), paying well and regularly, and it does not seem contrary to canon-law to farm to them, but on this he will consult the learned.”—In Arch. Port. Orient. fasc. 3, 135.

c. 1610.—“Ils (les Portugais) exercent ordinairement de semblables cruautés lorsqu'ils sortent en troupe le long des côtes, bruslans et saccageans ces pauvres Gentils qui ne desirent que leur bonne grace, et leur amitié mais ils n'en ont pas plus de pitié pour cela."—Mocquet, 349.

1630.—". . . which Gentiles are of two sorts . . . first the purer Gentiles . . . or else the impure or vncleane Gentiles . . . such are the husbandmen or inferior sort of people called the Coulees."—H. Lord, Display, &c., 85.

1673.—"The finest Dames of the Gentues disdained not to carry Water on their Heads."—Fryer, 116.

"Gentues, the Portuguese idiom for Gentiles, are the Aborigines."—Ibid. 27.

1679.—In Fort St. Geo. Cons. of 29th January, the Black Town of Madras is called "the Gentue Town."—Notes and Exts., No. ii. 3.

1682.—"This morning a Gentoo sent by Bulchund, Governour of Hugly and Cassumbazar, made complaint to me that Mr. Charnock did shamefully—to y^e great scandal of our Nation—keep a Gentoo woman of his kindred, which he has had these 19 years."—Hedges, Diary, Dec. 1.; [Hak. Soc. i. 52].

1683.—"The ceremony used by these Gentu's in their sicknesse is very strange; they bring y^e sick person . . . to y^e brinke of y^e River Ganges, on a Cott. . . ."—Ibid. May 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 86].

In Stevens's Trans. of Faria y Sousa (1695) the Hindus are still called Gentiles. And it would seem that the English form Gentoo did not come into general use till late in the 17th century.

1767.—"In order to transact Business of any kind in this Countrey you must at least have a Smattering of the Language. . . . The original Language of this Countrey (or at least the earliest we know of) is the Bengala or Gentoo; this is commonly spoken in all parts of the Countrey. But the politest Language is the Moors or Mussulmans, and Persian."—MS. Letter of James Rennell.

1772.—"It is customary with the Gentoos, as soon as they have acquired a moderate fortune, to dig a pond."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 36.

1774.—"When I landed (on Island of Bali) the natives, who are Gentoos, came on board in little canoes, with outriggers on each side."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 169.

1776.—"A Code of Gentoo Laws or Ordinations of the Pundits. From a Persian Translation, made from the original written in the Shanskrit Language. London, Printed in the Year 1776."—(Title of Work by Nathaniel Brassey Halhed.)

1778.—"The peculiar patience of the Gentoos in Bengal, their affection to business, and the peculiar cheapness of all productions either of commerce or of necessity, had concurred to render the details of the revenue the most minute, voluminous, and complicated system of accounts which exist in the universe."—Orme, ii. 7 (Reprint).

1781.—"They (Syrian Christians of Travancore) acknowledged a Gentoo Sovereign, but they were governed even in temporal concerns by the bishop of Angamala."—Gibbon, ch. xlvii.

1784.—"Captain Francis Swain Ward, of the Madras Establishment, whose paintings and drawings of Gentoo Architecture, &c., are well known."—In Seton-Karr, i. 31.

1785.—"I found this large concourse (at Chandernagore) of people were gathered to see a Gentoo woman burn herself with her husband."—Ibid. i. 90.

"The original inhabitants of India are called Gentoos."—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, i. 122.

1803.—"Peregrine. O mine is an accommodating palate, hostess. I have swallowed burgundy with the French, hollands with the Dutch, sherbet with a Turk, sloe-juice with an Englishman, and water with a simple Gentoo."—Colman's John Bull, i. sc. 1.

1807.—"I was not prepared for the entire nakedness of the Gentoo inhabitants."—Lord Minto in India, 17.

b.—

1648.—"The Heathen who inhabit the kingdom of Golconda, and are spread all over India, are called Jentives."—Van Twist, 59.

1673.—"Their Language they call generally Gentu . . . the peculiar Name of their Speech is Telinga."—Fryer, 33.

1674.—"50 Pagodas gratuity to John Thomas ordered for good progress in the Gentu tongue, both speaking and writing."—Fort St. Geo. Cons., in Notes and Exts. No. i. 32.

[1681.—"He hath the Gentue language."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cclxxxiv.]

1683.—"Thursday, 21st June. . . . The Hon. Company having sent us a Law with reference to the Natives . . . it is ordered that the first be translated into Portuguese, Gentoo, Malabar, and Moors, and proclaimed solemnly by beat of drum."—Madras Consultation, in Wheeler, i. 314.

1719.—"Bills of sale wrote in Gentoo on Cajan leaves, which are entered in the Register kept by the Town Conicoply for that purpose."—Ibid. ii. 314.

1726.—"The proper vernacular here (Golconda) is the Gentoos (Jentiefs) or Telingaas."—Valentijn, Chor. 37.

1801.—"The Gentoo translation of the Regulations will answer for the Ceded Districts, for even . . . the most Canarine part of them understand Gentoo."—Munro, in Life, i. 321.

1807.—"A Grammar of the Gentoo language, as it is understood and spoken by the Gentoo People, residing north and north-westward of Madras. By a Civil Servant under the Presidency of Fort St. George, many years resident in the Northern Circars. Madras. 1807."

1817.—The third grammar of the Telugu language, published in this year, is called a 'Gentoo Grammar.'

1837.—"I mean to amuse myself with learning Gentoo, and have brought a Moonshie with me. Gentoo is the language of this part of the country [Godavery delta], and one of the prettiest of all the dialects."—Letters from Madras, 189.

GHAUT, s. Hind. ghāt.

a. A landing-place; a path of descent to a river; the place of a ferry, &c. Also a quay or the like.

b. A path of descent from a mountain; a mountain pass; and hence c., n.p. The mountain ranges parallel to the western and eastern coasts of the Peninsula, through which the ghāts or passes lead from the table-lands above down to the coast and lowlands. It is probable that foreigners hearing these tracts spoken of respectively as the country above and the country below the Ghāts (see BALAGHAUT) were led to regard the word Ghāts as a proper name of the mountain range itself, or (like De Barros below) as a word signifying range. And this is in analogy with many other cases of mountain nomenclature, where the name of a pass has been transferred to a mountain chain, or where the word for 'a pass' has been mistaken for a word for 'mountain range.' The proper sense of the word is well illustrated from Sir A. Wellesley, under b.

1809.—"The dandys there took to their paddles, and keeping the beam to the current the whole way, contrived to land us at the destined gaut."—Ld. Valentia, i. 185.

1824.—"It is really a very large place, and rises from the river in an amphitheatral form . . . with many very fine ghāts descending to the water's edge."—Heber, i. 167.

c. 1815.—"In 17 more days they arrived at Gurganw. During these 17 days the Ghāts were passed, and great heights and depths were seen amongst the hills, where even the elephants became nearly invisible."—Amir Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 86.

This passage illustrates how the transition from b to c occurred. The Ghāts here meant are not a range of mountains so called, but, as the context shows, the passes among the Vindhya and Sātpūra hills. Compare the two following, in which 'down the ghauts' and 'down the passes' mean exactly the same thing, though to many people the former expression will suggest 'down through a range of mountains called the Ghauts.'

1803.—"The enemy are down the ghauts in great consternation."—Wellington, ii. 333.

"The enemy have fled northward, and are getting down the passes as fast as they can."—M. Elphinstone, in Life by Colebrooke, i. 71.

1826.—"Though it was still raining, I walked up the Bohr Ghāt, four miles and a half, to Candaulah."—Heber, ii. 136, ed. 1844. That is, up one of the Passes, from which Europeans called the mountains themselves "the Ghauts."

The following passage indicates that the great Sir Walter, with his usual sagacity, saw the true sense of the word in its geographical use, though misled by books to attribute to the (so-called) 'Eastern Ghauts' the character that belongs to the Western only.

1827.—". . . they approached the Ghauts, those tremendous mountain passes which descend from the table-land of Mysore, and through which the mighty streams that arise in the centre of the Indian Peninsula find their way to the ocean."—The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

c.—

1553.—"The most notable division which Nature hath planted in this land is a chain of mountains, which the natives, by a generic appellation, because it has no proper name, call Gate, which is as much as to say Serra."—De Barros, Dec. I. liv. iv. cap. vii.

1561.—"This Serra is called Gate."—Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, 56.

1563.—"The Cuncam, which is the land skirting the sea, up to a lofty range which they call Guato."—Garcia, f. 34b.

1572.—

"Da terra os Naturaes lhe chamam Gate,
Do pe do qual pequena quantidade
Se estende hũa fralda estreita, que com-and from its foot-hills scanty breadth there be,

whose seaward-sloping coast-plain long hath fought
'gainst Ocean's natural ferocity. . . ."

1623.—"We commenced then to ascend the mountain-(range) which the people of the country call Gat, and which traverses in the middle the whole length of that part of India which projects into the sea, bathed on the east side by the Gulf of Bengal, and on the west by the Ocean, or Sea of Goa."—P. della Valle, ii. 32; [Hak. Soc. ii. 222].

1673.—"The Mountains here are one continued ridge . . . and are all along called Gaot."—Fryer, 187.

1685.—"On les appelle, montagnes de Gatte, c'est comme qui diroit montagnes de montagnes, Gatte en langue du pays ne signifiant autre chose que montagne" (quite wrong).—Ribeyro, Ceylan, (Fr. Transl.), p. 4.

1727.—"The great Rains and Dews that fall from the Mountains of Gatti, which ly 25 or 30 leagues up in the Country."—A. Hamilton, i. 282; [ed. 1744, ii. 285].

1762.—"All the South part of India save the Mountains of Gate (a string of Hills in ye country) is level Land the Mould scarce so deep as in England. . . . As you make use of every expedient to drain the water from your tilled ground, so the Indians take care to keep it in theirs, and for this reason sow only in the level grounds."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, March 21.

1826.—"The mountains are nearly the same height . . . with the average of Welsh mountains. . . . In one respect, and only one, the Ghāts have the advantage,—their precipices are higher, and the outlines of the hills consequently bolder."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 136.

GHEE, s. Boiled butter; the universal medium of cookery throughout India, supplying the place occupied by oil in Southern Europe, and more; [the samn of Arabia, the raughan of Persia]. The word is Hind. ghī, Skt. ghrita. A short but explicit account of the mode of preparation will be found in the English Cyclopaedia (Arts and Sciences), s.v.; [and in fuller detail in Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 491 seqq.].

c. 1590.—"Most of them (Akbar's elephants) get 5 s. (ers) of sugar, 4 s. of ghī, and half a man of rice mixed with chillies, cloves, &c."—Āin-i-Akbarī, i. 130.

1673.—"They will drink milk, and boil'd butter, which they call Ghe."—Fryer, 33.

1783.—"In most of the prisons [of Hyder 'Ali] it was the custom to celebrate particular days, when the funds admitted, with the luxury of plantain fritters, a draught of sherbet, and a convivial song. On one occasion the old Scotch ballad, 'My wife has ta'en the gee,' was admirably sung, and loudly encored. . . . It was reported to the Kelledar (see KILLADAR) that the prisoners said and sung throughout the night of nothing but ghee. . . . The Kelledar, certain that discoveries had been made regarding his malversations in that article of garrison store, determined to conciliate their secrecy by causing an abundant supply of this unaccustomed luxury to be thenceforth placed within the reach of their farthing purchases."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, ii. 154.

1785.—"The revenues of the city of Decca . . . amount annually to two kherore (see CRORE), proceeding from the customs and duties levied on ghee."—Carraccioli L. of Clive, i. 172.

1817.—"The great luxury of the Hindu is butter, prepared in a manner peculiar to himself, and called by him ghee."—Mill, Hist. i. 410.

GHILZAI, n.p. One of the most famous of the tribes of Afghanistan, and probably the strongest, occupying the high plateau north of Kandahar, and extending (roundly speaking) eastward to the Sulimānī mountains, and north to the Kābul River. They were supreme in Afghanistan at the beginning of the 18th century, and for a time possessed the throne of Ispahan. The following paragraph occurs in the article AFGHANISTAN, in the 9th ed. of the Encyc. Britan., 1874 (i. 235), written by one of the authors of this book:—

"It is remarkable that the old Arab geographers of the 10th and 11th centuries place in the Ghilzai country" (i.e. the country now occupied by the Ghilzais, or nearly so) "a people called Khiljīs, whom they call a tribe of Turks, to whom belonged a famous family of Delhi Kings. The probability of the identity of the Khiljīs and Ghilzais is obvious, and the question touches others regarding the origin of the Afghans; but it does not seem to have been gone into."

Nor has the writer since ever been able to go into it. But whilst he has never regarded the suggestion as more than a probable one, he has seen no reason to reject it. He may add that on starting the idea to Sir Henry Rawlinson (to whom it seemed new), a high authority on such a question, though he would not accept it, he made a candid remark to the effect that the Ghilzais had undoubtedly a very Turk-like aspect. A belief in this identity was, as we have recently noticed, entertained by the traveller Charles Masson, as is shown in a passage quoted below. And it has also been maintained by Surgeon-Major Bellew, in his Races of Afghanistan (1880), [who (p. 100) refers the name to Khilichī, a swordsman. The folk etymology of De Guignes and D'Herbelot is Kall, 'repose,' at, 'hungry,' given to an officer by Ogouz Khān, who delayed on the road to kill game for his sick wife].

All the accounts of the Ghilzais indicate great differences between them and the other tribes of Afghanistan; whilst there seems nothing impossible, or even unlikely, in the partial assimilation of a Turki tribe in the course of centuries to the Afghans who surround them, and the consequent assumption of a quasi-Afghan genealogy. We do not find that Mr. Elphinstone makes any explicit reference to the question now before us. But two of the notes to his History (5th ed. p. 323 and 384) seem to indicate that it was in his mind. In the latter of these he says: "The Khiljis . . . though Turks by descent . . . had been so long settled among the Afghans that they had almost become identified with that people; but they probably mixed more with other nations, or at least with their Turki brethren, and would be more civilized than the generality of Afghan mountaineers." The learned and eminently judicious William Erskine was also inclined to accept the identity of the two tribes, doubting (but perhaps needlessly) whether the Khilji had been really of Turki race. We have not been able to meet with any translated author who mentions both Khilji and Ghilzai. In the following quotations all the earlier refer to Khilji, and the later to Ghilzai. Attention may be called to the expressions in the quotation from Ziauddin Barni, as indicating some great difference between the Turk proper and the Khilji even then. The language of Baber, again, so far as it goes, seems to indicate that by his time the Ghilzais were regarded as an Afghan clan.

c. 940.—"Hajjaj had delegated 'Abderrahmān ibn Mahommed (ibn al-Ash'ath to Sijistān, Bost and Rukhāj (Arachosia) to make war on the Turk tribes diffused in those regions, and who are known as Ghūls and Khilj . . ."—Al'Udhī, v. 302.

c. 960.—"The Khilaj is a Turki tribe, which in ancient times migrated into the country that lies between India and the parts of Sijistān beyond the Ghūr. They are a pastoral people and resemble the Turks in their natural characteristics, their dress and their language."—Idakhar, from Dr Gorge's text, p. 245.

c. 1030.—"The Afghāns and Khiljīs having submitted to him (Sabbaktigin), he admitted thousands of them . . . into the ranks of his armies."—Al'Udhī, in Elliot, ii. 24.

c. 1150.—"The Khilke (read Khilj) are people of Turk race, who, from an early date invaded this country (Dihwar, on the banks of the Helmand), and whose dwellings are spread abroad to the north of India and on the borders of Ghaur and of Western Sijistān. They possess cattle, wealth, and the various products of husbandry; they all have the aspect of Turks, whether as regards features, dress, and customs, or as regards their arms and manner of making war. They are pacific people, doing and thinking no evil."—Idakhar, i. 457.

1200.—"At the same time Jalā'u-d dīn (Khilji), who was 'Aras-i-mamdhāt (Master-master-general), had gone to Bahārpūr, attended by a body of his relations and friends. Here he held a muster and inspection of the forces. He came of a race different from that of the Turks, so he had no confidence in them, nor would the Turks own him as belonging to the number of their friends. . . . The people high and low . . . were all troubled by the ambition of the Khiljīs, and were strongly opposed to Jalā'u-d dīn's obtaining the crown. . . . Sultan Jalā'u-d dīn Firuz Khilji ascended the throne in the . . . year 658 A.H. . . . The people of the city (of Delhi) had for 80 years been governed by sovereigns of Turk extraction, and were averse to the succession of the Khiljīs . . . they were struck with admiration and amazement at seeing the Khiljīs occupying the throne of the Turks, and wondered how the throne had passed from the one to the other."—Zia-ud-din Barni, in Elliot, iii. 134-136.

14th cent.—The continuator of Rashiduddin enumerates among the tribes occupying the country which we now call Afghanistan, (Afārs, Herawis, Ngudaris, Sgns, Khilj, Baluch and Afghans. See Notes of Erskine, xiv. 494.

a. 1507.—"I set out from Kābul for the purpose of plundering and beating up the quarters of the Ghiljīs . . . a good farang from the Ghilji camp, we observed a blackness, which was either owing to the Ghiljīs being in motion, or to smoke. The young and inexperienced men of the army all set forward full speed; I followed them for two kos, shooting arrows at their horses, and at length checked their speed. When five or six thousand men set out on a pillaging party, it is extremely difficult to maintain discipline. . . . A minaret of skulls was erected of the heads of these Afghans."—Baber, pp. 220-221; see also p. 226.

[1753.—"The Ghiljīs knowing that his troops must pass thro' their mountains, waited for them in the defiles, and successively defeated several bodies of Mahommed's army."—Hanway, Hist. Acc. ii. 24.]

1842.—"The Ghilji tribes occupy the principal portion of the country between Kandahār and Ghazni. They are, moreover, the most numerous of the Afghan tribes, and if united under a capable chief might . . . become the most powerful. . . . They are brave and warlike, but have a sternness of disposition amounting to ferocity. . . . Some of the inferior Ghiljīs are so violent in their intercourse with strangers that they can scarcely be considered as light of human beings, while no language can describe the terrors of a transit through their country, or the indignities which have to be endured. . . . The Ghiljis, although considered, and calling themselves, Afghāns, and moreover employing the Pashto, or Afghān dialect, are undoubtedly a mixed race.

"The name is evidently a modification or corruption of Khaljī or Khilajī, that of a great Turkī tribe mentioned by Sherīfudīn in his history of Taimūr. . . ."—Ch. Masson, Narr. of various Journeys, &c., ii. 204, 206, 207.

1854.—"The Ghūri was succeeded by the Khiljī dynasty; also said to be of Turki extraction, but which seems rather to have been of Afghān race; and it may be doubted if they are not of the Ghiljī Afghāns."—Erskine, Báber and Humáyun, i. 404.

1880.—"As a race the Ghiljī mix little with their neighbours, and indeed differ in many respects, both as to internal government and domestic customs, from the other races of Afghanistan . . . the great majority of the tribe are pastoral in their habits of life, and migrate with the seasons from the lowlands to the highlands with their families and flocks, and easily portable black hair tents. They never settle in the cities, nor do they engage in the ordinary handicraft trades, but they manufacture carpets, felts, &c., for domestic use, from the wool and hair of their cattle. . . . Physically they are a remarkably fine race . . . but they are a very barbarous people, the pastoral class especially, and in their wars excessively savage and vindictive.

"Several of the Ghiljī or Ghilzai-clans are almost wholly engaged in the carrying trade between India and Afghanistan, and the Northern States of Central Asia, and have been so for many centuries."—Races of Afghanistan, by Bellew, p. 103.

GHOUL, s. Ar. ghūl, P. ghōl. A goblin, εμψουσα, or man-devouring demon, especially haunting wildernesses.

c. 70.—"In the deserts of Affricke yee shall meet oftentimes with fairies,* appearing in the shape of men and women; but they vanish soone away, like fantastical illusions."—Pliny, by Ph. Holland, vii. 2.

c. 940.—"The Arabs relate many strange stories about the Ghūl and their transformations. . . . The Arabs allege that the two feet of the Ghūl are ass's feet. . . . These Ghūl appeared to travellers in the night, and at hours when one meets with no one on the road; the traveller taking them for some of their companions followed them, but the Ghūl led them astray, and caused them to lose their way."—Maṣ'ūdī, iii. 314 seqq. (There is much more after the copious and higgledy-piggledy Plinian fashion of this writer.)

* There is no justification for this word in the Latin.

c. 1420.—"In exitu deserti . . . rem mirandam dicit contigisse. Nam cum circiter mediam noctem quiescentes magno murmure strepituque audito suspicarentur omnes, Arabes praedones ad se spoliandos venire . . . viderunt plurimas equitum turmas transeuntium. . . . Plures qui id antea viderant, daemones (ghūls, no doubt) esse per desertum vagantes asseruere."—Nic. Conti, in Poggio, iv.

1814.—"The Afghauns believe each of the numerous solitudes in the mountains and deserts of their country to be inhabited by a lonely daemon, whom they call Ghoolee Beeabaun (the Goule or Spirit of the Waste); they represent him as a gigantic and frightful spectre (who devours any passenger whom chance may bring within his haunts)."—Elphinstone's Caubul, ed. 1839, i. 291.

[GHURRA, s. Hind. ghara, Skt. ghata. A water-pot made of clay, of a spheroidal shape, known in S. India as the chatty.

[1827.—". . . . the Rajah sent . . . 60 Gurrahs (earthen vessels holding a gallon) of sugar-candy and sweetmeats."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, 66.]

GHURRY, GURREE, s. Hind. gharī. A clepsydra or water-instrument for measuring time, consisting of a floating cup with a small hole in it, adjusted so that it fills and sinks in a fixed time; also the gong by which the time so indicated is struck. This latter is properly ghariyāl. Hence also a clock or watch; also the 60th part of a day and night, equal therefore to 24 minutes, was in old Hindu custom the space of time indicated by the clepsydra just mentioned, and was called a gharī. But in Anglo-Indian usage, the word is employed for 'an hour,' [or some indefinite period of time]. The water-instrument is sometimes called Pun-Ghurry (pangharī quasi pānī-gharī); also the Sun-dial, Dhoop-Ghurry (dhūp, 'sunshine'); the hour-glass, Ret-Ghurry (ret, retā, 'sand').

(Ancient).—"The magistrate, having employed the first four Ghurries of the day in bathing and praying, . . . shall sit upon the Judgment Seat."—Code of the Gentoo Laws (Halhed, 1776), 104.

[1526.—"Gheri." See under PUHUR.

1785.—“We have fixed the Coss at 6,000 Guz, which distance must be travelled by the postmen in a Ghurry and a half. . . . If the letters are not delivered according to this rate . . . you must flog the Hurkarehs belonging to you.”—Tippoo's Letters, 215.

[1869.—Wallace describes an instrument of this kind in use on board a native vessel. “I tested it with my watch and found that it hardly varied a minute from one hour to another, nor did the motion of the vessel have any effect upon it, as the water in the bucket of course kept level.”—Wallace, Malay Archip., ed. 1890, p. 314.]

GINDY, s. The original of this word belongs to the Dravidian tongues; Malayāl. kindi; Tel. gindi; Tam. kin-ni, from v. kinu, ‘to be hollow’; and the original meaning is a basin or pot, as opposed to a flat dish. In Malabar the word is applied to a vessel resembling a coffee-pot without a handle, used to drink from. But in the Bombay dialect of H., and in Anglo-Indian usage, gindi means a wash-hand basin of tinned copper, such as is in common use there (see under CHILLUMCHEE).

1561.—“. . . guindis of gold. . . .”—Correa, Lendas, II. i. 218.

1582.—“After this the Capitaine Generall commanded to discharge theyr Shippes, which were taken, in the whiche was bound store of rich Merchaundize, and amongst the same these peeces following:

1813.—“At the English tables two servants attend after dinner, with a gindey and ewer, of silver or white copper.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 397; [2nd ed. ii. 30; also i. 333].

1851.—“. . . a tinned bason, called a gendee. . . .”—Burton, Scinde, or the Unhappy Valley, i. 6.

GINGALL, JINJALL, s. H. jan-jāl, ‘a swivel or wall-piece’; a word of uncertain origin. [It is a corruption of the Ar. jazd'il (see JUZAIL.)] It is in use with Europeans in China also.

1818.—“There is but one gun in the fort, but there is much and good sniping from matchlocks and gingals, and four Europeans have been wounded.”—Elphinstone, Life, ii. 31.

1829.—“The moment the picket heard them, they fired their long ginjalls, which kill a mile off.”—Shipp's Mem. iii. 40.

[1900.—“Gingals, or Jingals, are long tapering guns, six to fourteen feet in length, borne on the shoulders of two men and fired by a third. They have a stand, or tripod, reminding one of a telescope. . . .”—Ball, Things Chinese, 38.]

GINGELI, GINGELLY, &c. s. The common trade name for the seed and oil of Sesamum indicum, v. orientale. There is a H. [not in Platts' Dict.] and Mahr. form jinjalī, but most probably this also is a trade name introduced by the Portuguese. The word appears to be Arabic al-juljulan, which was pronounced in Spain al-jonjolīn (Dozy and Engelmann, 146-7), whence Spanish aljonjoli, Italian giuggiolino, zerzelino, &c., Port. girgelim, zirzelim, &c., Fr. jugeoline, &c., in the Philippine Islands ajonjoli. The proper H. name is tīl. It is the σπαραγύς of Dioscorides (ii. 121), and of Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. i. 11). [See Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. ii. 510 seqq.]

1876.—"There is good reason for believing that a considerable portion of the olive oil of commerce is but the Jinjili, or the groundnut, oil of India, for besides large exports, of both oils to Europe, several thousand tons of the sesamum seed, and ground-nuts in smaller quantities, are exported annually from the south of India to France, where their oil is expressed, and finds its way into the market, as olive oil."—Suppl. Report on Supply of Drugs to India, by Dr. Paul India Office, March, 1876.

GINGER, s. The root of Zingiber officinale, Roxb. We get this word from the Arabic sinjabil, Sp. agengibr (al-sinjabil), Port. gingibre, Latir mingiber, Ital. zenzero, gengiovo, and many other old forms.

The Skt. name is śrīṅgavera, professedly connected with śrīṅga, 'horn,' from the antler-like form of the root. But this is probably an introduced word shaped by this imaginary etymology. Though ginger is cultivated all over India, from the Himālaya to the extreme south,* the best is grown in Malabar, and in the language of that province (Malayālam) green ginger is called inchi, and inchi-ver, from nchi, 'root.' Inchi was probably in an earlier form of the language siñchi or chiñchi, as we find it in Canarese still sinti, which is perhaps the true origin of the H. sonth for 'dry ginger,' more usually connected with Skt. ruñchi, ruñch, 'to dry'.

It would appear that the Arabs, misled by the form of the name, attributed sinjabil or sinjabil, or ginger, to the coast of Zinj or Zanzibar; for it would seem to be ginger which some Arabic writers speak of as 'the plant of Zinj.' Thus a poet quoted by Kazwini enumerates among the products of India the shajr al-Zanj or Arbor Zingitana, along with shisham-wood, pepper, steel, &c. (see Gilde-meister, 218). And Abulfeda says also: "At Melinda is found the plant of Zinj" (Geog. by Reinaud, i. 257). In Marino Sanudo's map of the world also (c. 1320) we find a rubric connecting Zinziber with Zanj. We do not indeed find ginger spoken of as a product of eastern continental Africa, though Barboza says a large quantity was produced in Madagascar, and Varthema says the like of the Comoro Islands.

c. A.D. 65.—"Ginger (Zingiber) is a special kind of plant produced for the most part in Troglodytic Arabia, where they use the green plant in many ways, as we do rue (rygaroo), boiling it and mixing it with drinks and stews. The roots are small, like those of cyperus, whitish, and peppery to the taste and smell. . . ."—Dioscorides, ii. cap. 189.

c. A.D. 70.—"This pepper of all kinds is most biting and sharpe. . . . The blacke is more kindly and pleasant. . . . Many have taken Ginger (which some call Zimbipori and others Zingiberi) for the root of that tree; but it is not so, although in tast it somewhat resembleth pepper. . . . A pound of Ginger is commonly sold at Rome for 6 deniers. . . ."—Pliny, by Ph. Holland, xii. 7.

c. 620-80.—"And therein shall they be given to drink a cup of wine, mixed with the water of Zenjabul. . . ."—The Koran, ch. lxxvi. (by Sale).

c. 940.—"Andalusia possesses considerable silver and quicksilver mines. . . . They export from it also saffron, and roots of ginger (arāḡ al-sanjabil)."—Maṣ'adi, i. 367.

1298.—"Good ginger (gengibre) also grows here (at Coilum—see QUILON), and it is known by the same name of Coilumia, after the country."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 22.

* Rheede says: 'Etiam in sylvis et deserti reperitur' (Hort. Mal. xl. 10). But I am not aware of any botanist having found it wild. I suspect that no one has looked for it."—Sir J. D. Hooker.

c. 1343.—“Giengiovo si è di piu maniere, cioè belladi (see COUNTRY), e colombino, e micchino, e detti nomi portano per le contrade, onde sono nati ispezialmente il colombino e il micchino, che primieramente il belladi nasce in molte contrade dell' India, e il colombino nasce nel Isola del Colombo d' India, ed ha la scorza sua piana, e delicata, e cenerognola; e il micchino viene dalle contrade del Mecca . . . e ragiona che il buono giengiovo dura buono 10 anni,” &c.—Pegolotti, in Della Decima, iii. 361.

c. 1420.—“His in regionibus (Malabar) ginger oritur, quod belladi (see COUNTRY), gebeli et neli” vulgo appellatur. Radices sunt arborum duorum cubitorum altitudine, foliis magnis instar enulae (elecampane), duro cortice, veluti arundinum radices, quae fructum tegunt; ex eis extrahitur ginger, quod immistum cineri, ad solemque expositum, triduo exsiccat.”—N. Conti, in Poggio.

1580.—In a list of drugs sold at Ormuz we find Zenzeri da buli (presumably from Dabul.)

„ Mecchini

Zenzero condito in giaga (preserved in Jaggery!)—Gasparo Balbi, f. 54.

GINGERLY, s. A coin mentioned as passing in Arabian ports by Milburn (i. 87, 91). Its country and proper name are doubtful. [The following quotations show that Gingerlee or Gergelin was a name for part of the E. coast of India, and Mr. Whiteway (see GINGELI) conjectures that it was so called because the oil was produced there.] But this throws no light on the gold coin of Milburn.

1680-81.—“The form of the pass given to ships and vessels, and Register of Passes given (18 in all), bound to Jafnapatam, Manilla, Mocha, Gingerlee, Tenasserim, &c.”—Fort St. Geo. Cons. Notes and Exts., App. No. iii. p. 47.

1701.—The Carte Marine depuis Surutte jusqu'au Detroit de Malaca, par le R. Père P. P. Tachard, shows the coast tract between Vesegapatam and Iagrenate as Gergelin.

1753.—“Some authors give the Coast between the points of Devi and Gaudewari, the name of the Coast of Gergelin. The Portuguese give the name of Gergelin to the plant which the Indians call Ellu, from which they extract a kind of oil.”—D'Anville, 134.

[Mr. Pringle (Diary Fort St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 170) identifies the Gingerly Factory with Vizagapatam. See also i. 109; ii. 99.]

* Gebeli, Ar. “of the hills.” Neli is also read dely, probably for d'Ely (see DELY, MOUNT). The Ely ginger is mentioned by Barbosa (p. 220).

GINGHAM, s. A kind of stuff, defined in the Draper's Dictionary as made from cotton yarn dyed before being woven. The Indian ginghams were apparently sometimes of cotton mixt with some other material. The origin of this word is obscure, and has been the subject of many suggestions. Though it has long passed into the English language, it is on the whole most probable that, like chintz and calico, the term was one originating in the Indian trade.

We find it hardly possible to accept the derivation, given by Littre, from “Guingamp, ville de Bretagne, où il y a des fabriques de tissus.” This is also alleged, indeed, in the Encycl. Britannica, 8th ed., which states, under the name of Guingamp, that there are in that town manufactures of ginghams, to which the town gives its name. [So also in 9th ed.] We may observe that the productions of Guin-gamp, and of the Côtes-du-Nord generally, are of linen, a manufacture dating from the 15th century. If it could be shown that gingham was either originally applied to linen fabrics, or that the word occurs before the Indian trade began, we should be more willing to admit the French etymology as possible.

The Penny Cyclopaedia suggests a derivation from guingois, ‘awry.’ “The variegated, striped, and crossed patterns may have suggested the name.”

‘Civilis,’ a correspondent of Notes and Queries (5 ser. ii. 366, iii. 30) assigns the word to an Indian term, ginghām, a stuff which he alleges to be in universal use by Hindu women, and a name which he constantly found, when in judicial employment in Upper India, to be used in inventories of stolen property and the like. He mentions also that in Sir G. Wilkinson's Egypt, the word is assigned to an Egyptian origin. The alleged Hind. word is unknown to us and to the dictionaries; if used as ‘Civilis’ believes, it was almost certainly borrowed from the English term.

It is likely enough that the word came from the Archipelago. Jansz's Javanese Dict. gives “ginggang, a sort of striped or chequered East Indian lijnwand,” the last word being applied to cotton as well as linen stuffs, equivalent to French toile. The verb ging-gang in Javanese is given as meaning 'to separate, to go away,' but this seems to throw no light on the matter; nor can we connect the name with that of a place on the northern coast of Sumatra, a little E. of Acheen, which we have seen written Gingham (see Bennett's Wanderings, ii. 5, 6; also Elmore, Directory to India and China Seas, 1802, pp. 63-64). This place appears prominently as Gingion in a chart by W. Herbert, 1752. Finally, Bluteau gives the following:—"Guingam. So in some parts of the kingdom (Portugal) they call the excrement of the Silkworm, Bombicis excrementum. Guingão. A certain stuff which is made in the territories of the Mogul. Beirames, guingoens, Canequis, &c. (Godinho, Viagam da India, 44)." Wilson gives kindan as the Tamil equivalent of gingham, and perhaps intends to suggest that it is the original of this word. The Tamil Dict. gives "kindan, a kind of coarse cotton cloth, striped or chequered." [The Madras Gloss. gives Can. ginta, Tel. gintena, Tam. kindan, with the meaning of "double-thread texture." The N.E.D., following Scott, Malayan Words in English, 142 seq., accepts the Javanese derivation as given above: "Malay ginggang . . . a striped or checkered cotton fabric known to Europeans in the East as 'gingham.' As an adjective, the word means, both in Malay and Javanese, where it seems to be original, 'striped.' The full expression is kdin ginggang, 'striped cloth' (Grashuis). The Tamil 'kindan, a kind of coarse cotton cloth, striped or chequered' (quoted in Yule), cannot be the source of the European forms, nor, I think, of the Malayan forms. It must be an independent word, or a perversion of the Malayan term." On the other hand, Prof. Skeat rejects the Eastern derivation on the ground that "no one explains the spelling. The right explanation is simply that gingham is an old English spelling of Guingamp. See the account of the 'towne of Gyngham' in the Paston Letters, ed. Gairdner, iii. 357." (8th ser. Notes and Queries, iv. 386.)]

1680.—“Advice received . . . that Santogee, a younger brother of Sevagee's, had seized upon Rognaut Pundit, the Soobidar of Chengy Country, and put him in irons.”—Ibid. No. iii. 44.

1752.—“It consists of two towns, called the Great and Little Gingee. . . . They are both surrounded by one wall, 3 miles in circumference, which incloses the two towns, and five mountains of ragged rock, on the summits of which are built 5 strong forts. . . . The place is inaccessible, except from the east and south-east. . . . The place was well supplied with all manner of stores, and garrisoned by 150 Europeans, and sepoy and black people in great numbers. . . .”—Cambridge, Account of the War, &c., 32-33.

GINSENG, s. A medical root which has an extraordinary reputation in China as a restorative, and sells there at prices ranging from 6 to 400 dollars an ounce. The plant is Aralia Ginseng, Benth. (N.O. Araliaceae). The second word represents the Chinese name Jén-Shén. In the literary style the drug is called simply Shén. And possibly Jén, or ‘Man,’ has been prefixed on account of the forked radish, man-like aspect of the root. European practitioners do not recognise its alleged virtues. That which is most valued comes from Corea, but it grows also in Mongolia and Manchuria. A kind much less esteemed, the root of Panax quinquefolium, L., is imported into China from America. A very closely-allied plant occurs in the Himālaya, A. Pseudo-Ginseng, Benth. Ginseng is first mentioned by Alv. Sernedo (Madrid, 1642). [See Ball, Things Chinese, 268 seq., where Dr. P. Smith seems to believe that it has some medicinal value.]

GIRAFFE, s. English, not Anglo-Indian. Fr. girafe, It. giraffa, Sp. and Port. girafa, old Sp. azorafa, and these from Ar. al-zardfa, a cameleopard. The Pers. surndpa, zurndpa, seems to be a form curiously divergent of the same word, perhaps nearer the original. The older Italians sometimes make giraffa into seraph. It is not impossible that the latter word, in its biblical use, may be radically connected with giraffe.

The oldest mention of the animal is in the Septuagint version of Deut. xiv. 5, where the word zāmdr, rendered in the English Bible ‘chamois,’ is translated καμηλοπαρδαλις; and so also in the Vulgate camelopardalus, [probably the ‘wild goat’ of the Targums, not the giraffe (Encycl. Bibl. i. 722)]. We quote some other ancient notices of the animal, before the introduction of the word before us :

c. B.C. 20.—“The animals called camelopards (καμηλοπαρδαλις) present a mixture of both the animals comprehended in this appellation. In size they are smaller than camels, and shorter in the neck; but in the distinctive form of the head and eyes. In the curvature of the back again they have some resemblance to a camel, but in colour and hair, and in the length of tail, they are like panthers.”—Diodorus, ii. 51.

c. A.D. 20.—“Camelleopards (καμηλοπαρδαλις) are bred in these parts, but they do not in any respect resemble leopards, for their variegated skin is more like the streaked and spotted skin of fallow deer. The hinder quarters are so very much lower than the fore quarters, that it seems as if the animal sat upon its rump. . . . It is not, however, a wild animal, but rather like a domesticated beast; for it shows no sign of a savage disposition.”—Strabo, Bk. XVI. iv. § 18, E.T. by Hamilton and Falconer.

c. A.D. 210.—Athenaeus, in the description which he quotes of the wonderful procession of Ptolemy Philadelphus at Alexandria, besides many other strange creatures, details 130 Ethiopic sheep, 20 of Eubœa, 12 white koloï, 26 Indian oxen, 8 Aethiopic, a huge white bear, 14 pardales and 16 panthers, 4 lynxes, 3 arkēloi, one camelopardalis, 1 Ethiopic Rhinoceros.—Bk. V. cap. xxxii.

c. A.D. 520.—

Oppiani Cynegetica, iii. 461 seqq.

c. 380.—“These also presented gifts, among which besides other things a certain species of animal, of nature both extraordinary and wonderful. In size it was equal to a camel, but the surface of its skin marked with flower-like spots. Its hinder parts and the flanks were low, and like those of a lion, but the shoulders and fore-legs and chest were much higher in proportion than the other limbs. The neck was slender, and in regard to the bulk of the rest of the body was like a swan's throat in its elongation. The head was in form like that of a camel, but in size more than twice that of a Libyan ostrich. . . . Its legs were not moved alternately, but by pairs, those on the right side being moved together, and those on the left together, first one side and then the other. . . . When this creature appeared the whole multitude was struck with astonishment, and its form suggesting a name, it got from the populace, from the most prominent features of its body, the improvised name of camelopardalis."—Heliodorus, Aethiopica, x. 27.

c. 940.—"The most common animal in those countries is the giraffe (Zarāfa) . . . some consider its origin to be a variety of the camel; others say it is owing to a union of the camel with the panther: others in short that it is a particular and distinct species, like the horse, the ass, or the ox, and not the result of any cross-breed. . . . In Persian the giraffe is called Ushurgāo ('camel-cow'). It used to be sent as a present from Nubia to the kings of Persia, as in later days it was sent to the Arab princes, to the first khālifs of the house of 'Abbās, and to the Wālis of Misr. . . . The origin of the giraffe has given rise to numerous discussions. It has been noticed that the panther of Nubia attains a great size, whilst the camel of that country is of low stature, with short legs," &c., &c.—Maṣ'ūdī, iii. 3-5.

c. 1253.—"Entre les autres joiaus que il (le Vieil de la Montagne) envoia au Roy, li envoia un oliphant de cristal mout bien fait, et une beste que l'on appelle orafle, de cristal aussi."—Joinville, ed. de Wailly, 250.

1271.—"In the month of Jumada II. a female giraffe in the Castle of the Hill (at Cairo) gave birth to a young one, which was nursed by a cow."—Makrizi (by Quatremère), i. pt. 2, 106.

1298.—"Mais bien ont giraffes assez qui naissent en leur pays."—Marco Polo, Pauthier's ed., p. 701.

1336.—"Vidi in Kadro (Cairo) animal geraffan nomine, in anteriori parte multum elevatum, longissimum collum habens, ita ut de tecto domus communis altitudinis comedere possit. Retro ita demissum est ut dorsum ejus manu hominis tangi possit. Non est ferox animal, sed ad modum jumenti pacificum, colore albo et rubeo pellem habens ordinatissime decoratam."—Gul. de Boldensele, 248-249.

1384.—"Ora racconteremo della giraffa che bestia ella è. La giraffa è fatta quasi come lo struzzolo, salvo che l'imbusto suo non ha penne ('just like an ostrich, except that it has no feathers on its body'!) anzi ha lana branchissima . . . ella è veramente a vedere una cosa molto contraffatta."—Simone Sigoli, V. al Monte Sinai, 182.

1404.—"When the ambassadors arrived in the city of Khoi, they found in it an ambassador, whom the Sultan of Babylon had sent to Timour Bey. . . . He had also with him 6 rare birds and a beast called jornufa . . ." (then follows a very good description).—Clavijs, by Markham, pp. 86-87.

c. 1430.—"Item, I have also been in Lesser India, which is a fine Kingdom. The capital is called Dily. In this country are many elephants, and animals called urnasa (for urnafa), which is like a stag, but is a tall animal and has a long neck, 4 fathoms in length or longer."—Schiltberger, Hak. Soc. 47.

1471.—"After this was brought forth a giraffe, which they call Girnaffa, a beast as long legged as a great horse, or rather more; but the hinder legges are halfe a foote shorter than the former," &c. (The Italian in Ramusio, ii. f. 102, has "vna Zirapha, la quale essi chiamano Zirnapha ouer Giraffa.")—Josafa Barbaro, in Venetians in Persia, Hak. Soc. 54.

1554.—"Il ne fut onc que les grands seigneurs quelques barbares qu'ilz aient esté, n'aimassent qu'on leurs presentast les bestes d'estranges pais. Aussi en auons veu plusieurs au chasteau du Caire . . . entre lesquelles est celle qu'ilz nomment vulgairement Zurnapa."—P. Belon, f. 118. It is remarkable to find Belon adopting this Persian form in Egypt.

GIRJA, s. This is a word for a Christian church, commonly used on the Bengal side of India, from Port. igreja, itself a corruption of ecclesia. Khāfī Khān (c. 1720) speaking of the Portuguese at Hoogly, says they called their places of worship Kalisd (Elliot, vii. 211). No doubt Kalisd, as well as igreja, is a form of ecclesia, but the superficial resemblance is small, so it may be suspected that the Musulman writer was speaking from book-knowledge only.

1885.—"It is related that a certain Maulvī, celebrated for the power of his curses, was called upon by his fellow religionists to curse a certain church built by the English in close proximity to a Maṣjid. Anxious to stand well with them, and at the same time not to offend his English rulers, he got out of the difficulty by cursing the building thus:

'Gir jā ghar! Gir jā ghar! Gir jā!'
(i.e.) 'Fall down, house! Fall down, house! Fall down!' or simply 'Church-house! Church-house! Church!'
—W. J. D'Gruyther, in Panjab Notes and Queries, ii. 125.

The word is also in use in the Indian Archipelago :

1885.—“The village (of Wai in the Moluccas) is laid out in rectangular plots. . . . One of its chief edifices is the Gredja, whose grandeur quite overwhelmed us ; for it is far more elaborately decorated than many a rural parish church at home.”—H. O. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 294.

GOA, n.p. Properly Gowa, Gova, Mahr. Goven, [which the Madras Gloss. connects with Skt. go, ‘a cow,’ in the sense of the ‘cowherd country’]. The famous capital of the Portuguese dominions in India since its capture by Albuquerque in 1510. In earlier history and geography the place appears under the name of Sindābūr or Sandābūr (Sundāpūr?) (q.v.). Govi or Kuva was an ancient name of the southern Konkan (see in H. H. Wilson's Works, Vishnu Purana, ii. 164, note 20). We find the place called by the Turkish admiral Sidi 'Ali Gowai-Sanddbūr, which may mean “Sandābūr of Gova.”

1391.—In a copper grant of this date (S. 1313) we have mention of a chief city of Kankan (see CONCAN) called Gowa and Gowāpūra. See the grant as published by Major Legrand Jacob in J. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. iv. 107. The translation is too loose to make it worth while to transcribe a quotation ; but it is interesting as mentioning the reconquest of Goa from the Turushkas, i.e. Turks or foreign Mahommedans. We know from Ibn Batuta that Mahommedan settlers at Hunāwar had taken the place about 1344.

1510 (but referring to some years earlier). “I departed from the city of Dabuli aforesaid, and went to another island which is about a mile distant from the mainland and is called Goga. . . . In this island there is a fortress near the sea, walled round after our manner, in which there is sometimes a captain who is called Savaiu, who has 400 mamelukes, he himself being also a mame-luke.”—Varthema, 115-116.

c. 1520.—“In the Island of Tissoury, in which is situated the city of Goa, there are 31 aldeas, and these are as follows. . . .”—In Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 5.

c. 1554.—“At these words (addressed by the Vizir of Guzerat to a Portuguese Envoy) my wrath broke out, and I said : ‘Malediction ! You have found me with my fleet gone to wreck, but please God in his mercy, before long, under favour of the Pādshāh, you shall be driven not only from Hormuz, but from Diu and Gowa too !’”—Sidi 'Ali Kupudān, in J. Asiat. Ser. I. tom. ix. 70.

1602.—“The island of Goa is so old a place that one finds nothing in the writings of the Canaras (to whom it always belonged) about the beginning of its population. But we find that it was always so frequented by strangers that they used to have a proverbial saying : ‘Let us go and take our ease among the cool shades of Goe moat,’ which in the old language of the country means ‘the cool fertile land.’”—Couto, IV. x. cap. 4.

1648.—“All those that have seen Europe and Asia agree with me that the Port of Goa, the Port of Constantinople, and the Port of Toulon, are three of the fairest Ports of all our vast continent.”—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 74 ; [ed. Ball, i. 186].

GOA PLUM. The fruit of Parinari-um excelsum, introduced at Goa from Mozambique, called by the Portuguese Matomba. “The fruit is almost pure brown sugar in a paste” (Birdwood, MS.).

GOA POTATO. Dioscorea aculeata (Birdwood, MS.).

GOA POWDER. This medicine, which in India is procured from Goa only, is invaluable in the virulent eczema of Bombay, and other skin diseases. In eczema it sometimes acts like magic, but smarts like the cutting of a knife. It is obtained from Andira Araroba (N.O. Leguminosae), a native (we believe) of S. America. The active principle is Chrysophanic acid (Commn. from Sir G. Birdwood).

GOA STONE. A factitious article which was in great repute for medical virtues in the 17th century. See quotation below from Mr. King. Sir G. Birdwood tells us it is still sold in the Bombay Bazar.

1673.—“The Paulistines enjoy the biggest of all the Monasteries at St. Roch ; in it is a Library, an Hospital, and an Apothecary's Shop well furnished with Medicines, where Gaspar Antonio, a Florentine, a Lay-Brother of the Order, the Author of the Goa-Stones, brings them in 50,000 Xerephins, by that invention Annually ; he is an Old Man, and almost Blind.”—Fryer, 149-150.

1690.—“The double excellence of this Stone (snake-stone) recommends its worth very highly . . . and much excels the deservedly famed Gaspar Antoni, or Goa Stone.”—Ovington, 262.

1711.—“Goa Stones or Pedru de Gaspar Antonio, are made by the Jesuits here : They are from $\frac{1}{4}$ to 8 Ounces each ; but the Size makes no Difference in the Price : We bought 11 Ounces for 20 Rupees. They are often counterfeited, but 'tis an easie Matter for one who has seen the right Sort, to discover it. . . . Mancock's Stones at Fort St. George come the nearest to them . . . both Sorts are deservedly cried up for their Virtues."—Lectyer, 268.

1768-71.—"Their medicines are mostly such as are produced in the country. Amongst others, they make use of a kind of little artificial stone, that is manufactured at Goa, and possesses a strong aromatic scent. They give scrapings of this, in a little water mixed with sugar, to their patients."—Sinuousus, E.T. i. 454.

1807.—"The Goa-Stone was in the 16th (7) and 17th centuries as much in repute as the Bencar, and for similar virtues . . . It is of the shape and size of a duck's egg, has a greyish metallic lustre, and though hard, is friable. The mode of employing it was to take a minute dose of the powder scraped from it in one's drink every morning . . . So precious was it esteemed that the great usually carried it about with them in a casket of gold filigree."—Nat. Hist. of Gons, by C. W. King, M.A., p. 256.

GOBANG, s. The game introduced some years ago from Japan. The name is a corr. of Chinese K'i-p'an, 'checker-board.'

[1898.—"Go, properly goma's narabe, often with little appropriateness termed 'checkers' by European writers, is the most popular of the indoor pastimes of the Japanese, a very different affair from the simple game known to Europeans as Goban or Gobang, properly the name of the board on which go is played."—Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed., 190 seq., where a full account of the game will be found.]

GODAVERY, n.p. Skt. Godavari, 'giving kine.' Whether this name of northern etymology was a corruption of some indigenous name we know not. [The Dravidian name of the river is Godai (Tel. gode, 'limit'), of which the present name is possibly a corruption.] It is remarkable how the Godavery is ignored by writers and map-makers till a comparatively late period, with the notable exception of D. João de Castro, in a work, however, not published till 1843. Barros, in his trace of the coasts of the Indies (Dec. I. ix. cap. 1), mentions Godavarij as a place adjoining a cape of the same name (which appears in some much later charts as C. Gordewar), but takes no notice of the great river, so far as we are aware, in any part of his history. Linachoten also speaks of the Punto de Guadavaryn, but not of the river. Nor does his map show the latter, though showing the Kistna distinctly. The small general map of India in "Cambridge's Acc. of the War in India," 1781, confounds the sources of the Godavery with those of the Mahanadi (of Orissa) and carries the latter on to combine with the western rivers of the Ganges Delta. This was evidently the prevailing view until Rennell published the first edition of his Memoir (1783), in which he writes:

"The Godavery river, or Gonga Godowry, commonly called Ganga in European maps, and sometimes Gang in Indian histories, has generally been represented as the same river with that of Cattaek.

"As we have no authority that I can find for supposing it, the opinion must have been taken up, on a supposition that there was no opening between the mouths of the Kistna and Mahanadee (or Cattaek river) of magnitude sufficient for such a river as the Ganga" (pp. 74-75) [also ibid. 2nd ed. 244]. As to this error see also a quotation from D'Anville under KEDGEREE. It is probable that what that geographer says in his Acronyms, p. 135, that he had no real idea of the Godavery. That name occurs in his book only as "la pointe de Gaudewari." This point, he says, is about E.N.E. of the "river of Narapur," at a distance of about 12 leagues; "it is a low land, intersected by several rivers, forming the mouths of that which the maps, esteemed to be most correct, call Wenaron; and the river of Narapur is itself one of those arms, according to a MS. map in my possession." Narapuram is the name of a taluk on the westernmost delta branch, or Vasishta Godavari [see Morris, Mem. of Godavery Hist., 193]. Wenaron appears on a map in Baldaeus (1672), as the name of one of the two mouths of the Eastern or Gautami Godavari, entering the sea near Coringa. It is perhaps the same name as Sajurum on that branch, where there was an English Factory for many years.

In the neat map of "Regionum Choromandel, Golconda, et Orixa," which is in Baldaeus (1672), there is no indication of it whatever except as a short inlet from the sea called Gondowary.

1538.—"The noblest rivers of this province (Daguen or Deccan) are six in number, to wit: Crusna (Krishna), in many places known as Hinapor, because it passes by a city of this name (Hindapar); Bivra (read Bima); these two rivers join on the borders of the Deccan and the land of Canara (q.v.), and after traversing great distances enter the sea in the Oria territory; Malapraire (Malprabha); Guodavam (read Guodavari) otherwise called Gangua, Purnadi; Tapi. Of these the Malapraire enters the sea in the Oria territory, and so does the Guodavam; but Purnadi and Tapi enter the Gulf of Cambay at different points."—João de Castro, Primeira Rotairo de Costa da India, pp. 6, 7.

c. 1590.—“Here (in Berar) are rivers in abundance; especially the Ganga of Gotam, which they also call Godovari. The Ganga of Hindustan they dedicate to Mahadeo, but this Ganga to Gotam. And they tell wonderful legends of it, and pay it great adoration. It has its springs in the Sahyā Hills near Trimbak, and passing through the Wilāyat of Ahmadnagar, enters Berār and thence flows on to Tilingāna.”—Āṭa-i-Aṭbari (orig.) i. 476; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 228.] We may observe that the most easterly of the Delta branches of the Godavary is still called Gautami.

GODDESS, s. An absurd corruption which used to be applied by our countrymen in the old settlements in the Malay countries to the young women of the land. It is Malay gadis, ‘a virgin.’

c. 1772.—

“And then how strange, at night oppress
By toils, with songs you’re lulled to rest;
Of rural goddesses the guest,
Delightful!”

W. Marsden, in Memoirs, 14.

1784.—“A lad at one of these entertainments, asked another his opinion of a goddess who was then dancing. ‘If she were plated with gold,’ replied he, ‘I would not take her for my concubine, much less for my wife.’”—Marsden’s H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed., 230.

GODOWN, s. A warehouse for goods and stores; an outbuilding used for stores; a store-room. The word is in constant use in the Chinese ports as well as in India. The H. and Beng. guddm is apparently an adoption of the Anglo-Indian word, not its original. The word appears to have passed to the continent of India from the eastern settlements, where the Malay word gadong is used in the same sense of ‘store-room,’ but also in that of ‘a house built of brick or stone.’ Still the word appears to have come primarily from the South of India, where in Telugu gidangi, gidḍangi, in Tamil kidāngu, signify ‘a place where goods lie,’ from kidu, ‘to lie.’ It appears in Singhalese also as guddma. It is a fact that many common Malay and Javanese words are Tamil, or only to be explained by Tamil. Free intercourse between the Coromandel Coast and the Archipelago is very ancient, and when the Portuguese first appeared at Malacca they found there numerous settlers from S. India (see s.v. KLING). Bluteau gives the word as palavra da India, and explains it as a “loges quasi debaixo de chão” (“almost under ground”), but this is seldom the case.

[1513.—“... in which all his rice and a Gudam full of mace was burned.”—Letter of F. P. Andrade to Albuquerque, Feb. 22, India Office, MSS. Corpo Chronologica, vol. I.

[1552.—“At night secretly they cleared their Gudams, which are rooms almost under ground, for fear of fire.”—Barrus, Dec. II. Bk. vi. ch. 3.]

1552.—“... and ordered them to plunder many godowns (gudoes) in which there was such abundance of clove, nutmeg, mace, and sandal wood, that our people could not transport it all till they had called in the people of Malacca to complete its removal.”—Castanheda, iii. 276-7.

1561.—“... Godowns (Guddes), which are strong houses of stone, having the lower part built with lime.”—Correa, II. i. 226. (The last two quotations refer to events in 1511.)

1570.—“... but the merchants have all one house or Magazem, which house they call Godon, which is made of bricks.”—Cesar Frederike, in Hult.

1585.—“In the Palace of the King (at Pegu) are many magazines both of gold and of silver. . . . Sandalwood, and lign-aloes, and all such things, have their gottens (gottoni), which is as much as to say separate chambers.”—Gasparo Balbi, f. 111.

[c. 1612.—“... if I did not he would take away from me the key of the gadong.”—Danvers, Letters, i. 195.]

[1800.—“The cook-room and Zodoun at the Laul Baug are covered in.”—Wellington, i. 66.]

1809.—“The Black Hole is now part of a godown or warehouse: it was filled with goods, and I could not see it.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 237.

1880.—“These ‘Godowns’ . . . are one of the most marked features of a Japanese town, both because they are white where all else is gray, and because they are solid where all else is perishable.”—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 264.

GOGLET, GUGLET. s. A water-bottle, usually earthenware, of globular body with a long neck, the same as what is called in Bengal more commonly a surdhī (see SERAI, b., KOOZA). This is the usual form now; the article described by Linschoten and Pyrard, with a sort of cullender mouth and pebbles shut inside, was somewhat different. Corrupted from the Port. gorgoleta, the name of such a vessel. The French have also in this sense gargoulette, and a word gargouille, our medieval gurgoyle; all derivations from gorga, garga, gorge, ‘the throat,’ found in all the Romance tongues. Tom Cringle shows that the word is used in the W. Indies.

1598.—“These cruses are called Gorgoletta.”—Linschoten, 60; [Hak. Soc. i. 207].

1599.—In Debry, vii. 28, the word is written Gorgolane.

c. 1610.—“Il y a une pièce de terre fort delicate, et toute percée de petits trous faconnez, et au dedans y a de petites pierres qui ne peuvent sortir, c'est pour nettoyer le vase. Ils appellent cela gargoulette: l'eau n'en sorte que peu à la fois.”—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 43; [Hak Soc. ii. 74, and see i. 329].

[1616.—“. . . 6 Gorgoletts.”—Foster, Letters, iv. 198.]

1648.—“They all drink out of Gorgelanes, that is out of a Pot with a Spout, without setting the Mouth thereto.”—T. Van Spilbergen's Voyage, 37.

c. 1670.—“Quand on est à la maison on a des Gourgoulettes ou aiguieres d'une certaine pierre poreuse.”—Bernier (ed. Amst.), ii. 214; [and comp. ed. Constable, 356].

1688.—“L'on donne à chacun de ceux que leur malheur conduit dans ces saintes prisons, un pot de terre plein d'eau pour se laver, un autre plus propre de ceux qu'on appelle Gurguleta, aussi plein d'eau pour boire.”—Dellon, Rel. de l'Inquisition de Goa, 135.

c. 1690.—“The Siamese, Malays, and Macassar people have the art of making from the larger coco-nut shells most elegant drinking vessels, cups, and those other receptacles for water to drink called Gorgelette, which they set with silver, and which no doubt by the ignorant are supposed to be made of the precious Maldivé cocos.”—Rumphius, I. iii.

1698.—“The same way they have of cooling their Liquors, by a wet cloth wrapped about their Gurgulets and Jars, which are vessels made of a porous Kind of Earth.”—Fryer, 47.

1726.—“However, they were much astonished that the water in the Gorgolets in that tremendous heat, especially out of doors, was found quite cold.”—Valentijn, Chorv. 59.

1766.—“I perfectly remember having said that it would not be amiss for General Carnac to have a man with a Goglet of water ready to pour on his head, whenever he should begin to grow warm in debate.”—Lord Clive, Consn. Fort William, Jan. 29. In Long, 406.

1829.—“Dressing in a hurry, find the drunken bheesty . . . has mistaken your boot for the goglet in which you carry your water on the line of march.”—Ship's Memoirs, ii. 149.

c. 1830.—“I was not long in finding a bottle of very tolerable rum, some salt junk, some biscuit, and a goglet, or porous earthen jar of water, with some capital cigars.”—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 152.

1832.—“Murwan sent for a woman named Joada, and handing her some virulent poison folded up in a piece of paper, said, ‘If you can throw this into Hussun's gugglet, he on drinking a mouthful or two of water will instantly bring up his liver piece-meal.’”—Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, 156.

1855.—“To do it (gild the Rangoon Pagoda) they have enveloped the whole in an extraordinary scaffolding of bamboos, which looks as if they had been enclosing the pagoda in basketwork to keep it from breaking, as you would do with a water goglet for a dak journey.”—In Blackwood's Mag., May, 1856.

GOGO, GOGA, n.p. A town on the inner or eastern shore of Kattywar Peninsula, formerly a seaport of some importance, with an anchorage sheltered by the Isle of Peram (the Beiram of the quotation from Ibn Batuta). Gogo appears in the Catalan map of 1375. Two of the extracts will show how this unhappy city used to suffer at the hands of the Portuguese. Gogo is now superadded to a great extent by Bhavnagar, 8 m. distant.

1821.—"Dated from Goga the 12th day of October, in the year of the Lord 1821."—Letter of Fr. Jordana, in Cathay, &c. i. 228.

c. 1348.—"We departed from Beiram and arrived next day at the city of Kāka, which is large, and possesses extensive laxara. We anchored 4 miles off because of the ebb tide."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 60.

1531.—"The Governor (Nuno da Cunha) . . . took counsel to order a fleet to remain behind to make war upon Cambaya, leaving Antonio de Saldanha with 50 sail, to wit: 4 galleons, and the rest galleys and galeotas, and rowing-vessels of the King's, with some private ones eager to remain, in the greed for prize. And in this fleet there stayed 1000 men with good will for the plunder before them, and many honoured gentlemen and captains. And running up the Gulf they came to a city called Goga, peopled by rich merchants; and the fleet entering by the river ravaged it by fire and sword, slaying much people. . . ."—Correa, iii. 418.

[c. 1590.—"Ghogah." See under SURATE.]

1602.—" . . . the city of Gogá, which was one of the largest and most opulent in trade, wealth and power of all those of Cambaya. . . . This city lies almost at the head of the Gulf, on the western side, spreading over a level plain, and from certain ruins of buildings still visible, seems to have been in old times a very great place, and under the dominion of certain foreigners."—Couto, IV. vii. cap. 5.

1614.—"The passage across from Surat to Goga is very short, and so the three fleets, starting at 4 in the morning, arrived there at nightfall. . . . The next day the Portuguese returned ashore to burn the city . . . and entering the city they set fire to it in all quarters, and it began to blaze with such fury that there was burnt a great quantity of merchandise (mercaderia de portu), which was a huge loss to the Moors. . . . After the burning of the city they abode there 3 days, both captains and soldiers content with the abundance of their booty, and the fleet stood for Dio, taking, besides the goods that were on board, many boats in tow laden with the same."—Bocarro, Decada, 333.

[c. 1660.—"A man on foot going by land to a small village named the Gogoa, and from thence crossing the end of the Gulf, can go from Diu to Surat in four or five days. . . ."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, ii. 37.]

1727.—"Goga is a pretty large Town . . . has some Trade. . . . It has the Convenience of a Harbour for the largest Ships, though they lie dry on soft Mud at low Water."—A. Hamilton, i. 143.

GOGOLLA, GOGALA, n.p. This is still the name of a village on a peninsular sandy spit of the mainland, opposite to the island and fortress of Diu, and formerly itself a fort. It was known in the 16th century as the Villa dos Rumes, because Melique Az (Malik Ayāz, the Mahom. Governor), not much trusting the Rumes (i.e. the Turkish Mercenaries), "or willing that they should be within the Fortress, sent them to dwell there." (Barros, II. iii. cap. 5.)

1825.—"Paga dye e gogolla a el Ray de Cambaya treze layques em tangas . . . xij layques."—Lebrunça, 34.

1538.—In Rotello, Tombo, 230, 239, we find "Alfandega de Gogualaa."

1639.—" . . . terminating in a long and narrow tongue of sand, on which stands a fort which they call Gogala, and the Portuguese the Villa dos Rumes. On the point of this tongue the Portuguese made a beautiful round bulwark."—Seu de Castro, Primeiro Roteiro, p. 218.

GOLAH, a. Hind. gold (from gol, 'round'). A store-house for grain or salt; so called from the typical form of such store-houses in many parts of India, viz. a circular wall of mud with a conical roof. [One of the most famous of these is the Gold at Patna, completed in 1786, but never used.]

[1785.—"We visited the Gola, a building intended for a public granary."—In Portes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 445.]

1810.—"The golah, or warehouse."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 333.

1878.—"The villagers, who were really in want of food, and maddened by the sight of those golahs stored with grain, could not resist the temptation to help themselves."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 77.

GOLD MOHUR FLOWER, a. Cassalpinia pulcherrima, Sw. The name is a corruption of the H. gulmor, which is not in the dictionaries, but is said to mean 'peacock-flower.'

[1877.—"The crowd began to press to the great Gool-mohur tree."—Allardye, City of Sunahine, iii. 207.]

GOLE, a. The main body of an army in array; a clustered body of troops; an irregular squadron of horse-men. P.—H. ghol; perhaps a confusion with the Arab. jaul (gauf), 'a troop': [but Platts connects it with Skt. kula, 'an assemblage'] 1507.—"As the right and left are called Berāghār and Sewāghār . . . and are not included in the centre which they call ghāl, the right and left do not belong to the ghāl."—Baber, 237.

1803.—“When within reach, he fired a few rounds, on which I formed my men into two gholes. . . . Both gholes attempted to turn his flanks, but the men behaved ill, and we were repulsed.”—Skinner, Mil. Mem. i. 298.

1849.—“About this time a large gole of horsemen came on towards me, and I proposed to charge; but as they turned at once from the fire of the guns, and as there was a nullah in front, I refrained from advancing after them.”—Brigadier Lockwood, Report of 2nd Cavalry Division at Battle of Goojerat.

GOMASTA, GOMASHTAH, s. Hind. from Pers. gumdshtah, part. ‘appointed, delegated.’ A native agent or factor. In Madras the modern application is to a clerk for vernacular correspondence.

1747.—“As for the Salem Cloth they beg leave to defer settling any Price for that sort till they can be advised from the Goa Masters (1) in that Province.”—Ft. St. David Consn., May 11. MS. Records in India Office.

1762.—“You will direct the gentleman, Gomastahs, Muttasuddies (see MOOT-SUDDY), and Moonshies, and other officers of the English Company to relinquish their farms, taaluks (see TALOOK), gunges, and golahs.”—The Nabob to the Governor, in Van Sittart, i. 229.

1776.—“The Magistrate shall appoint some one person his gomastah or Agent in each Town.”—Halhed's Code, 55.

1778.—“The Company determining if possible to restore their investment to the former condition . . . sent gomastahs, or Gentoo factors in their own pay.”—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 57.

c. 1785.—“I wrote an order to my gomastah in the factory of Hughly.”—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, iii. 448.

1817.—“The banyan hires a species of broker, called a Gomastah, at so much a month.”—Mill's Hist. iii. 13.

1837.—“. . . (The Rajah) sent us a very good breakfast; when we had eaten it, his gomashta (a sort of secretary, at least more like that than anything else) came to say . . .”—Letters from Madras, 128.

GOMBROON, n.p. The old name in European documents of the place on the Persian Gulf now known as Bandar 'Abbās, or 'Abbāsī. The latter name was given to it when Shāh 'Abbās, after the capture and destruction of the island city of Hormuz, established a port there. The site which he selected was the little town of Gamrūn. This had been occupied by the Portuguese, who took it from the ‘King of Lar’ in 1612, but two years later it was taken by the Shāh.

The name is said (in the Geog. Magazine, i. 17) to be Turkish, meaning ‘a Custom House.’ The word alluded to is probably gumruk, which has that meaning, and which is again, through Low Greek, from the Latin commercium. But this etymology of the name seems hardly probable. That indicated in the extract from A. Hamilton below is from Pers. kamrūn, ‘a shrimp,’ or Port. camarão, meaning the same.

The first mention of Gombroon in the E. I. Papers seems to be in 1616, when Edmund Connok, the Company's chief agent in the Gulf, calls it “Gombraun, the best port in all Persia,” and “that hopeful and glorious port of Gombroon” (Sainsbury, i. 484-5; [Foster, Letters, iv. 264]). There was an English factory here soon after the capture of Hormuz, and it continued to be maintained in 1759, when it was taken by the Comte d'Estaing. The factory was re-established, but ceased to exist a year or two after.

[1565.—“Bamdel Gombruc, so-called in Persian and Turkish, which means Custom-house.”—Mestre Afonso's Overland Journey, Ann. Maritim. e Colon. ser. 4. p. 217.]

1614.—(The Captain-major) “under orders of Dom Luis da Gama returned to succour Comorão, but found the enemy's fleet already there and the fort surrendered. . . . News which was heard by Dom Luis da Gama and most of the people of Ormuz in such way as might be expected, some of the old folks of Ormuz prognosticating at once that in losing Comorão Ormuz itself would be lost before long, seeing that the former was like a barbican or outwork on which the rage of the Persian enemy spent itself, giving time to Ormuz to prepare against their coming thither.”—Bocarro, Decada, 349.

1622.—“That evening, at two hours of the night, we started from below that fine tree, and after travelling about a league and a half . . . we arrived here in Combrū, a place of decent size and population on the sea-shore, which the Persians now-a-days, laying aside as it were the old name, call the ‘Port of Abbas,’ because it was wrested from the Portuguese, who formerly possessed it, in the time of the present King Abbas.”—P. della Valle, ii. 413; [in Hak. Soc. i. 3, he calls it Combu].

c. 1630.—“Gumbrown (or Gomroon, as some pronounce it) is by most Persians Kar' éfoxhū cald Bander or the Port Towne . . . some (but I commend them not) write it Gamrou, others Gomroio, and other-some Cummeroos. . . . A Towne it is of no Antiquity, rising daily out of the ruins of late glorious (now most wretched) Ormus.”—Sir T. Herbert, 121.

1878.—“... le nom plébéien . . . sonna dans les salons. . . . Comme un coup de cymbale, un de ces gongs qui sur les théâtres de féerie annoncent les apparitions fantastiques.”—Alph. Daudet, Le Nabab, ch. 4.

GOODRY, s. A quilt; H. gudrī. [The gudrī, as distinguished from the razdī (see ROZYE), is the bundle of rags on which Fakīrs and the very poorest people sleep.]

1598.—“They make also faire couerlits, which they call Godorins [or] Colchas, which are very faire and pleasant to the eye, stitched with silke; and also of cotton of all colours and stitchings.”—Linschoten, ch. 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 61].

c. 1610.—“Les matelats et les couvertures sont de soye ou de toille de coton façonnée à toutes sortes de figures et couleur. Ils appellent cela Gouldrins.”—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 3; [Hak. Soc. ii. 4].

1653.—“Goudrin est vn terme Indou et Portugais, qui signifie des couuertures picquées de cotton.”—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 539.

[1819.—“He directed him to go to his place, and take a godhra of his (a kind of old patched counterpane of shreds, which Fuqueers frequently have to lie down upon and throw over their shoulders).”—Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 113.]

GOOGUL, s. H. gugal, guggul, Skt. guggula, guggulu. The aromatic gum-resin of the Balsamodendron Mukul, Hooker (Amyris agallocha, Roxb.), the mukl of the Arabs, and generally supposed to be the bdellium of the ancients. It is imported from the Beyla territory, west of Sind (see Bo. Govt. Selections (N.S.), No. xvii. p. 326).

1525.—(Prices at Cambay). “Gugall d'orumuz (the maund), 16 fedcas.”—Lembrança, 43.

1813.—“Gogul is a species of bitumen much used at Bombay and other parts of India, for painting the bottom of ships.”—Milburn, i. 137.

GOOJUR, n.p. H. Gūjar, Skt. Gurjara. The name of a great Hindu clan, very numerous in tribes and in population over nearly the whole of Northern India, from the Indus to Rohilkhand. In the Delhi territory and the Doab they were formerly notorious for thieving propensities, and are still much addicted to cattle-theft; and they are never such steady and industrious cultivators as the Jāts, among whose villages they are so largely interspersed. In the Punjab they are Mahommedans. Their extensive diffusion is illustrated by their having given name to Gujarāt (see GOOZERAT) as well as to Gujrāt and Gujrānwāla in the Punjab. And during the 18th century a great part of Sahāranpūr District in the Northern Doab was also called Gujrāt (see Elliot's Races, by Beames, i. 99 seqq.).

1519.—“In the hill-country between Nilāb and Behreh . . . and adjoining to the hill-country of Kashmīr, are the Jāts, Gujers, and many other men of similar tribes.”—Memoirs of Baber, 259.

[1785.—“The road is infested by tribes of banditti called googurs and mewatties.”—In Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. II. 426.]

GOOLAIL, s. A pellet-bow. H. gulel, probably from Skt. gula, gula, the pellet used. [It is the Arabic Kaus-al-bandūk, by using which the unlucky Prince in the First Kalandar's Tale got into trouble with the Wazīr (Burton, Arab. Nights, i. 98).]

1560.—Busbeck speaks of being much annoyed with the multitude and impudence of kites at Constantinople: “ego interim cum manuali balista post columnam sto, modo hujus, modo illius caudae vel alarum, ut casus tulerit, pinnas testaceis globis verberans, donec mortifero ictu unam aut alteram percussam decutio. . . .”—Busbeq. Epist. iii. p. 163.

[c. 1590.—“From the general use of pellet bows which are fitted with bowstrings, sparrows are very scarce (in Kashmīr).”—Āin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 351. In the original kamān-i-guroha, guroha, according to Steingass, Dict., being “a ball . . . ball for a cannon, balista, or cross-bow.”]

1600.—“O for a stone-bow to hit him in the eye.”—Twelfth Night, ii. 5.

1611.—

“Children will shortly take him for a wall, And set their stone-bows in his forehead.”

Beaum. & Flet., A King and No King, V.

[1870.—“The Gooleil-bans, or pellet-bow, generally used as a weapon against crows, is capable of inflicting rather severe injuries.”—Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurisprudence, 337.]

GOOLMAUL, GOOLMOOL, s. H. gol-māl, ‘confusion, jumble’; gol-māl karnd, ‘to make a mess.’

[1877.—“The boy has made such a gol-mol (uproar) about religion that there is a risk in having anything to do with him.”—Allardyce, City of Sunshine, ii. 106.]

[GOOMTEE, n.p. A river of the N.W.P., rising in the Shāhjāhānpur District, and flowing past the cities of Lucknow and Jaunpur, and joining the Ganges between Benares and Ghāzipur. The popular derivation of the name, as in the quotation, is, as if Ghūmti, from H. ghūmd, 'to wind,' in allusion to its winding course. It is really from Skt. gomati, 'rich in cattle.'

[1848.—"The Ghūmti, which takes its name from its windings . . ."—Bayers, Recoll. of N. India, 240.]

GOONT, s. H. gūnth, gūth. A kind of pony of the N. Himalayas strong but clumsy.

c. 1690.—"In the northern mountainous districts of Hindustan a kind of small but strong horses is bred, which is called gūt and in the confines of Bengal, near Kūch, another kind of horses occurs, which rank between the gūt and Turkish horses, and are called minghau (see TANGUM); they are strong and powerful."—Asi., i. 133; [also see ii. 280].

1698.—"On the further side of Gangra lyeth a very mighty Prince, called Ratna Rodorou, holding a mountainous Countrey . . . thence cometh much Muske, and here is a great brood of a small kind of Horses, called Gunta, a true travelling scale-cliffe beast."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 438.

1831.—"In Cashmere I shall buy, without regard to price, the best ghounts in Tibet."—Jacquemont's Letters, E.T. i. 238.

1838.—"Give your gūnth his head and he will carry you safely . . . any horse would have struggled, and been killed; these *gūnth*s appear to understand that they must be quiet, and their master will help them."—Fanny Parks, Wand-rings of a Pilgrim, ii. 226.

GOORKA, GOORKALLY, n.p. H. Gurkhd, Gurkhali. The name of the race now dominant in Nepāl, and taking their name from a town so called 53 miles W. of Khatmandu. [The name is usually derived from the Skt. go-raksha, 'cow-keeper.' For the early history see Wright, H. of Nepāl, 147]. They are probably the best soldiers of modern India, and several regiments of the Anglo-Indian army are recruited from the tribe.

1767.—"I believe, Sir, you have before been acquainted with the situation of Nipal, which has long been besieged by the Goorkally Rajah."—Letter from Chief at Patna, in Long, 526.

[, "The Rajah being now dispossessed of his country, and shut up in his capital by the Rajah of Goercullah, the usual channel of commerce has been obstructed."—Letter from Council to E.I. Co., in Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 36.]

GOOROO, s. H. gurū, Skt. guru; a spiritual teacher, a (Hindu) priest.

(Ancient).—"That brahman is called guru who performs according to rule the rites on conception and the like, and feeds (the child) with rice (for the first time)."—Manu, ii. 142.

c. 1550.—"You should do as you are told by your parents and your Guru."—Ramayana of Tulsi Dās, by Groene (1878), 43.

[1567.—"Gross." See quotation under CASIE.]

1628.—"There was a famous Prophet of the Ethnikes, named Goru."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 520.

1700.—". . . je suis fort surpris de voir à la porte . . . le Pénitent au colier, qui demandoit à parler au Goorou."—Lettres Edif., x. 95.

1810.—"Persons of this class often keep little schools . . . and then are designated *goorou*s; a term implying that kind of respect we entertain for pastors in general."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 317.

1822.—"The Adventures of the Gooroo Paramartan; a tale in the Tamil Language" (translated by B. Babington from the original of Padre Beechi, written about 1720-1730), London.

1867.—"Except the guru of Bombay, no priest on earth has so large a power of acting on every weakness of the female heart as a Mormon bishop at Salt Lake."—Dixon's New America, 330.

GOORUL, s. H. gūral, gorul; the Himalayan chamois; Nemorhoedus Goral of Jerdon. [Cemas Goral of Blanford (Mammalia, 516).]

[1821.—"The flesh was good and tasted like that of the ghoral, so abundant in the hilly belt towards India."—Lloyd & Gerard's Narr., ii. 112.

[1836. "On Tuesday we went to a new part of the hill to shoot 'gurel,' a kind of deer, which across a khud, looks remarkably small and more like a hare than a deer."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 235.]

[GOORZEBURDAR, s. P. gurz-bardār, 'a mace-bearer.'

[1663.—"Among the Kours and the Manasbards are mixed many Gouras-bardars, or mace-bearers chosen for their tall and handsome persons, and whose business it is to preserve order in assemblies, to carry the King's orders, and execute his commands with the utmost speed."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 267.

[1717.—"Everything being prepared for the Goorzebardar's reception."—in Pyle, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccix.

[1727.—"Goosbardar. See under HOS-SOLHOOKUM.]

GOOZERAT, GUZERAT.

GORAWALLAH.

GORAYT, s. H. gorat, gorait, [which has been connected with Skt. ghur, 'to shout']; a village watchman and messenger, [in the N.W.P. usually of a lower grade than the chokidar, and not, like him, paid a cash wage, but remunerated by a piece of rent-free land; one of the village establishment, whose special duty it is to watch crops and harvested grain].

[c. 1808.—"Fifteen messengers (gorayits) are allowed $\frac{1}{2}$ ser on the man of grain, and from 1 to 5 bigahs of land each."—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 231.]

GORDOWER, GOORDORE, s. A kind of boat in Bengal, described by Ives as "a vessel pushed on by paddles." Etym. obscure. Ghurdaur is a horse-race, a race-course; sometimes used by natives to express any kind of open-air assemblage of Europeans for amusement. [The word is more probably a corr. of P. girdāwā, 'a patrol'; girdāwar, 'all around, a supervisor,' because such boats appear to be used in Bengal by officials on their tours of inspection.]

1757.—"To get two bolias (see BOLIAH), a goordore, and 87 dandies (q.v.) from the Nazir."—Ives, 157.

GOSAIN, GOSSYNE, &c. s. H. and Mahr. Gosāin, Gosāi, Gosdvi, Gusd'in, &c., from Skt. Goswāmī, 'Lord of Passions' (lit. 'Lord of cows'), i.e. one who is supposed to have subdued his passions and renounced the world. Applied in various parts of India to different kinds of persons not necessarily celibates, but professing a life of religious mendicancy, and including some who dwell together in convents under a superior, and others who engage in trade and hardly pretend to lead a religious life.

1774.—"My hopes of seeing Teshu Lama were chiefly founded on the Gosain."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 46.

c. 1781.—"It was at this time in the hands of a Gosine, or Hindoo Religious."—Hodges, 112. (The use of this barbarism by Hodges is remarkable, common as it has become of late years.)

[1813.—"Unlike the generality of Hindoos, these Gosainings do not burn their dead . . ." Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 312-3; in i. 544 he writes Gosannee.]

1826.—"I found a lonely cottage with a light in the window, and being attired in the habit of a gossein, I did not hesitate to request a lodging for the night."—Pandurang Hari, 399; [ed. 1873, ii. 275].

GOSBECK, COSBEAGUE, s. A coin spoken of in Persia (at Gombroon and elsewhere). From the quotation from Fryer it appears that there was a Goss and a Gosbegi, corresponding to Herbert's double and single Cozbeq. Mr. Wollaston in his English-Persian Dict. App. p. 436, among "Moneys now current in Persia," gives "5 dīnār = 1 ghāz; also a nominal money." The ghāz, then, is the name of a coin (though a coin no longer), and ghāz-begi was that worth 10 dīndrs. Marsden mentions a copper coin, called kazbegi = 50 (nominal) dīndrs, or about 3½d. (Numism. Orient., 456.) But the value in dīndrs seems to be in error. [Prof. Browne, who referred the matter to M. Husayn Kuli Khān, Secretary of the Persian Embassy in London, writes: "This gentleman states that he knows no word ghāzi-beg, or gdzi-beg, but that there was formerly a coin called ghāz, of which 5 went to the shahī; but this is no longer used or spoken of." The ghāz was in use at any rate as late as the time of Hajji Baba; see below.]

[1615.—"The chiefest money that is current in Persia is the Abasse, which weigheth 2 metzicales. The second is the mamede, which is half an abasse. The third is the shahy and is a quarter of an abasse. In the rial of eight are 13 shayes. In the cheken of Venetia 20 shayes. In a shaye are 2½ bisties or casbeges 10. One bistey is 4 casbeges or 2 tanges. The Abasse, mamede and Shahy and bistey are of silver; the rest are of copper like to the pisais of India."—Foster, Letters, iii. 176.]

c. 1630.—"The Abbasee is in our money sixteen pence; Larree ten pence; Mamoodde eight pence; Bistee two pence; double Cozbeq one penny; single Cozbeq one half-penny; Fluces are ten to a Cozbeq."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 231.

1673.—"A Banyan that seemingly is not worth a Gosbeck (the lowest coin they have)."—Fryer, 113. See also p. 343.

"10 cosbeagues is 1 Shahoe; 4 Shahoes is one Abasse or 16d."—Ibid. 211.

"Brass money with characters, Are a Goss, ten whereof compose a Shahoe, A Gosbege, five of which go to a Shahoe." Ibid. 407.

1711.—"10 Cox, or Pice, a Copper Coin, are 1 Shahoe."—Lockyer, 241.

1727.—"1 Shahoe is . . . 10 Gaaz or Cosbegs."—A. Hamilton, ii. 311; [ed. 1744].

1752.—"10 cozbaugues or Pice (a Copper Coin) are 1 Shatree" (read Shahoe).—Brooks, p. 37. See also in Hanway, vol. i. p. 292, Kazbegie; [in ii. 21, Kazbekie].

[1824.—“But whatever profit arose either from these services, or from the spoils of my monkey, he alone was the gainer, for I never touched a ghaux of it.”—Hajji Baba, 52 seq.]

1825.—“A toman contains 100 mamoodies; a new abassee, 2 mamoodies or 4 shakees . . . a shakee, 10 coz or coz-baugues, a small copper coin.”—Milburn, 2nd ed. p. 95.

GOSHA, adj. Used in some parts, as an Anglo-Indian technicality, to indicate that a woman was secluded, and cannot appear in public. It is short for P. gosha-nishin, ‘sitting in a corner’; and is much the same as parda-nishin (see PURDAH).

GOUNG, s. Burm. gaung; a village head man. [“Under the Thoogyee were Rwa-goung, or heads of villages, who aided in the collection of the revenue and were to some extent police officials.” (Gazetteer of Burma, i. 480.)]

a. GOUR, s. H. gdur, gduri gde, (but not in the dictionaries), [Platts gives gaur, Skt. gaura, ‘white, yellowish, reddish, pale red’]. The great wild ox, Gavaeus Gaurus, Jerd.; [Bos gaurus, Blanford (Mammalia), 484 seq.], the same as the Bison (q.v.). [The classical account of the animal will be found in Forsyth, Highlands of Central India, ed. 1889, pp. 109 seqq.]

1806.—“They erect strong fences, but the buffaloes generally break them down. . . . They are far larger than common buffaloes. There is an account of a similar kind called the Gore; one distinction between it and the buffalo is the length of the hoof.”—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 156.

b. GOUR, s. Properly Can. gaud, gaur, gauda. The head man of a village in the Canarese-speaking country; either as corresponding to patel, or to the Zemindar of Bengal. [See F. Buchanan, Mysore, i. 268; Rice, Mysore, i. 579.]

c. 1800.—“Every Tehsildary is farmed out in villages to the Gours or head-men.”—In Munro's Life, iii. 92.

c. GOUR, n.p. Gaur, the name of a medieval capital of Bengal, which lay immediately south of the modern civil station of Malda, and the traces of which, with occasional Mahomedan buildings, extend over an immense area, chiefly covered with jungle. The name is a form of the ancient Gauda, meaning, it is believed, ‘the country of sugar,’ a name applied to a large part of Bengal, and specifically to the portion where those remains lie. It was the residence of a Hindu dynasty, the Senas, at the time of the early Mahomedan invasions, and was popularly known as Lakhnāoti; but the reigning king had transferred his seat to Nadiya (70 m. above Calcutta) before the actual conquest of Bengal in the last years of the 12th century. Gaur was afterwards the residence of several Mussulman dynasties. [See Ravenshaw, Gaur, its Ruins and Inscriptions, 1878.]

1536.—“But Xercansor [Shīr Khān Sūr, afterwards King of Hindustan as Shīr Shāh] after his success advanced along the river till he came before the city of Gouro to besiege it, and ordered a lodgment to be made in front of certain verandahs of the King's Palace which looked upon the river; and as he was making his trenches certain Rumis who were resident in the city, desiring that the King should prize them highly (d'elles fizesse cabedal) as he did the Portuguese, offered their service to the King to go and prevent the enemy's lodgment, saying that he should also send the Portuguese with them.”—Correa, iii. 720.

[1552.—“Caor.” See under BURRAM-POOTER.]

1553.—“The chief city of the Kingdom (of Bengala) is called Gouro. It is situated on the banks of the Ganges, and is said to be 3 of our leagues in length, and to contain 200,000 inhabitants. On the one side it has the river for its defence, and on the landward faces a wall of great height . . . the streets are so thronged with the concourse and traffic of people . . . that they cannot force their way past . . . a great part of the houses of this city are stately and well-wrought buildings.”—Barros, IV. ix. cap. 1.

1586.—“From Patanaw I went to Tanda which is in the land of the Gouren. It hath in times past been a kingdom, but is now subdued by Zelabdin Echebar . . .”—R. Fitch, in Hakluyt, ii. 389.

1683.—“I went to see ye famous Ruins of a great City and Pallace called [of] GOWRE . . . we spent 3½ hours in seeing ye ruines especially of the Pallace which has been . . . in my judgment considerably bigger and more beautifull than the Grand Seignor's Seraglio at Constantinople or any other Pallace that I have seen in Europe.”—Hedges, Diary, May 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 88].

GOVERNOR'S STRAITS, n.p. This was the name applied by the Portuguese (Estreito do Governador) to the Straits of Singapore, i.e. the straits south of that island (or New Strait). The reason of the name is given in our first quotation. The Governor in question was the Spaniard Dom João da Silva.

1615.—“The Governor sailed from Manilha in March of this year with 10 galleons and 2 galleys. . . . Arriving at the Straits of Sincapur, * * * and passing by a new strait which since has taken the name of Estreito do Governador, there his galleon grounded on the reef at the point of the strait, and was a little grazed by the top of it.”—Bocarro, 428.

1727.—“Between the small Carimon and Tanjong-bellong on the Continent, is the entrance of the Straights of Sincapure before mentioned, and also into the Straights of Governadore, the largest and easiest Passage into the China Seas.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 122.

1780.—“Directions for sailing from Malacca to Pulo Timoun through Governor's Straits, commonly called the Straits of Sincapour.”—Dunn's N. Directory, 5th ed. p. 474. See also Lettres Edif., 1st ed. ii. 118.

1841.—“Singapore Strait, called Governor Strait, or New Strait, by the French and Portuguese.”—Horsburgh, 5th ed. ii. 264.

GOW, GAOU, s. Dak. H. gau. An ancient measure of distance preserved in S. India and Ceylon. In the latter island, where the term still is in use, the gawwa is a measure of about 4 English miles. It is Pali gāruta, one quarter of a yojana, and that again is the Skt. gavyūti with the same meaning. There is in Molesworth's Mahr. Dictionary, and in Wilson, a term gawkos (see COSS), ‘a land measure’ (for which read ‘distance measure’), the distance at which the lowing of a cow may be heard. This is doubtless a form of the same term as that under consideration, but the explanation is probably modern and incorrect. The yojana with which the gau is correlated, appears etymologically to be ‘a yoking,’ viz. “the stage, or distance to be gone in one harnessing without unyoking” (Williams); and the lengths attributed to it are very various, oscillating from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 9 miles, and even to 8 krośas (see COSS). The last valuation of the yojana would correspond with that of the gau at $\frac{1}{4}$.

c. 545.—“The great Island (Taprobane), according to what the natives say, has a length of 300 gaudia, and a breadth of the same, i.e. 900 miles.”—Comas Indicopleustes, (in Cuthay, clxxvii.).

1628.—“From Garicota to Tumbre may be about a league and a half, for in that country distances are measured by gauh, and each gauh is about two leagues, and from Garicota to Tumbre they said was not so much as a gauh of road.”—P. della Valle, ii. 638; [Hak. Soc. ii. 230].

1676.—“They measure the distances of places in India by Gos and Costes. A Gos is about 4 of our common leagues, and a Coste is one league.”—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 30; [ed. Ball, i. 47].

1860.—“A gaou in Ceylon expresses a somewhat indeterminate length, according to the nature of the ground to be traversed, a gaou across a mountainous country being less than one measured on level ground, and a gaou for a loaded coolie is also permitted to be shorter than for one unburthened, but on the whole the average may be taken under four miles.”—Tenney's Ceylon, 4th ed. i. 467.

GRAB, s. This name, now almost obsolete, was applied to a kind of vessel which is constantly mentioned in the sea- and river-fights of India, from the arrival of the Portuguese down to near the end of the 18th century. That kind of etymology which works from inner consciousness would probably say: “This term has always been a puzzle to the English in India. The fact is that it was a kind of vessel much used by corsairs, who were said to grab all that passed the sea. Hence,” &c. But the real derivation is different.

The Rev. Howard Malcom, in a glossary attached to his Travels, defines it as “a square-rigged Arab vessel, having a projecting stern (stem?) and no bowsprit; it has two masts.” Probably the application of the term may have deviated variously in recent days. [See Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. pt. i. 348.] For thus again in Solymus (Les Hindous, vol. i.) a grab is drawn and described as a ship with three masts, a sharp prow, and a bowsprit. But originally the word seems, beyond question, to have been an Arab name for a galley. The proper word is Arab. ghorāb, ‘a raven,’ though adopted into Mahratti and Konkani as gurāb. Jal says, quoting Reinaud, that ghorāb was the name given by the Moors to the true galley, and cites Hyde for the rationale of the name. We give Hyde's words below. Amari, in a work quoted below (p. 397), points out the analogous corvette as perhaps a transfer of ghurāb:

1181.—“A vessel of our merchants . . . making sail for the city of Tripoli (which God protect) was driven by the winds on the shore of that country, and the crew being in want of water, landed to procure it, but the people of the place refused it unless some corn were sold to them. Meanwhile there came a ghurāb from Tripoli . . . which took and plundered the crew, and seized all the goods on board the vessel." *—Arabic Letter from Ubaldo, Archbishop and other authorities of Pisa, to the Almohad Caliph Abu Yak'ub Yusuf, in Amari, Diplomi Arabi, p. 8.

The Latin contemporary version runs thus :

"Cum quidam nostri cari cives de Sicilia cum carico frumenti ad Tripolim venirent, tempestate maris et vi ventorum compulsi, ad portum dictum Macri devenerunt; ibique aquā deficiente, et cum pro eā auriendā irent, Barbarosi non permiserunt eos . . . nisi prius eis de frumento venderent. Cumque inviti eis de frumento venderent gulea vestra de Tripoli armata," &c.—Ibid. p. 269.

1343.—"Jalansi . . . sent us off in company with his son, on board a vessel called al-'Ukairi, which is like a ghorāb, only more roomy. It has 60 oars, and when it engages is covered with a roof to protect the rowers from the darts and stone-shot." —Ibn Batuta, iv. 59.

1505.—In the Vocabulary of Pedro de Alcalá, galera is interpreted in Arabic as gorāb.

1554. — In the narrative of Sidi 'Ali Kapudān, in describing an action that he fought with the Portuguese near the Persian Gulf, he says the enemy's fleet consisted of 4 barques as big as carracks (q.v.), 3 great ghurābs, 6 Karāwals (see CARAVEL) and 12 smaller ghurābs, or galliots (see GALLE-VAT) with oars.—In *J. 1678.—"Our Factors, having concerns in the cargo of the ships in this Road, loaded two Grobs and departed."—Fryer, 153.

1727.—"The Muskat War . . . obliges them (the Portuguese) to keep an Armada of five or six Ships, besides small Frigates and Grabs of War."—A. Hamilton, i. 250; [ed. 1744, ii. 253].

1750-52.—"The ships which they make use of against their enemies are called goerabbs by the Dutch, and grabbs by the English, have 2 or 3 masts, and are built like our ships, with the same sort of rigging, only their prows are low and sharp as in gallies, that they may not only place some cannons in them, but likewise in case of emergency for a couple of oars, to push the grabb on in a calm."—Olof Toreen, Voyage, 205.

c. 1754.—"Our E. I. Company had here (Bombay) one ship of 40 guns, one of 20, one Grab of 18 guns, and several other vessels."—Ives, 43. Ives explains "Ketches, which they call grabs." This shows the meaning already changed, as no galley could carry 18 guns.

c. 1760.—"When the Derby, Captain Ansell, was so scandalously taken by a few of Angria's grabs."—Grose, i. 81.

1763.—"The grabs have rarely more than two masts, though some have three; those of three are about 300 tons burthen; but the others are not more than 150: they are built to draw very little water, being very broad in proportion to their length, narrowing, however, from the middle to the end, where instead of bows they have a prow, projecting like that of a Mediterranean galley."—Orme (reprint), i. 408-9.

1810.—"Here a fine English East India-man, there a grab, or a dow from Arabia." —Maria Graham, 142.

„ "This Glab (sic) belongs to an Arab merchant of Muscat. The Nakhodah, an Abyssinian slave."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 232.

[1820.—"We had scarce set sail when there came in a ghorab (a kind of boat) the Cotwal of Surat . . ."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. ii. 5.]

1872.—"Moored in its centre you saw some 20 or 30 ghurābs (grabs) from Maskat, Baghlahs from the Persian Gulf, Kotiyahs from Kach'h, and Pattimars or Batelas from the Konkan and Bombay."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 83.

GRAM, s. This word is properly the Portuguese grão, i.e. 'grain,' but it has been specially appropriated to that kind of vetch (Cicer arietinum, L.) which is the most general grain-(rather pulse-) food of horses all over India, called in H. chanā. It is the Ital. cece, Fr. pois chiche, Eng. chick-pea or Egypt. pea, much used in France and S.

* From Amari's Italian version.

Europe. This specific application of grão is also Portuguese, as appears from Bluteau. The word gram is in some parts of India applied to other kinds of pulse, and then this application of it is recognised by qualifying it as Bengal gram. (See remarks under CALAVANCE.) The plant exudes oxalate of potash, and to walk through a gram-field in a wet morning is destructive to shoe-leather. The natives collect the acid.

[1513.—“And for the food of these horses (exported from the Persian Gulf) the factor supplied grãos.”—Albuquerque, Curtas, p. 200, Letter of Dec. 4.

[1554.—(Describing Vijayanagar.) “There the food of horses and elephants consists of grãos, rice and other vegetables, cooked with jagra, which is palm-tree sugar, as there is no barley in that country.”—Castanheda, Bk. ii. ch. 16.

[c. 1610.—“They give them also a certain grain like lentils.”—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 79.]

1702.—“... he confessing before us that their allowance three times a week is but a quart of rice and gram together for five men a day, but promises that for the future it shall be rectified.”—In Wheeler, ii. 10.

1776.—“... Lentils, gram ... mustard seed.”—Halhed's Code, p. 8 (pt. ii.).

1789.—“... Gram, a small kind of pulse, universally used instead of oats.”—Munro's Narrative, 85.

1793.—“... gram, which it is not customary to give to bullocks in the Carnatic.”—Dirom's Narrative, 97.

1804.—“The gram alone, for the four regiments with me, has in some months cost 50,000 pagodas.”—Wellington, iii. 71.

1865.—“But they had come at a wrong season, gram was dear, and prices low, and the sale concluded in a dead loss.”—Palgrave's Arabia, 290.

GRAM-FED, adj. Properly the distinctive description of mutton and beef fattened upon gram, which used to be the pride of Bengal. But applied figuratively to any ‘pampered creature.’

c. 1849.—“By an old Indian I mean a man full of curry and of bad Hindustani, with a fat liver and no brains, but with a self-sufficient idea that no one can know India except through long experience of brandy, champagne, gram-fed mutton, cheroots and hookahs.”—Sir C. Napier, quoted in Bos. Smith's Life of Ld. Lawrence, i. 338.

1880.—“I missed two persons at the Delhi assemblage in 1877. All the gram-fed secretaries and most of the alcoholic chiefs were there; but the famine-haunted villagers and the delirium-shattered opium-eating Chinaman, who had to pay the bill, were not present.”—Ali Buba, 127.

GRANDONIC. (See GRUNTHUM and SANSKRIT).

GRASS-CLOTH, s. This name is now generally applied to a kind of cambric from China made from the Chuma of the Chinese (Boehmeria nivea, Hooker, the Rhea, so much talked of now), and called by the Chinese sia-pu, or ‘summer-cloth.’ We find grass-cloths often spoken of by the 16th century travellers, and even later, as an export from Orissa and Bengal. They were probably made of Rhea or some kindred species, but we have not been able to determine this. Cloth and nets are made in the south from the Neilgherry nettle (Girardinia heterophylla, D. C.)

c. 1567.—“Cloth of herbes (panni d'erbu), which is a kinde of silke, which groweth among the woodes without any labour of man.”—Caesar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 358.

1585.—“Great store of the cloth which is made from Grasse, which they call yernu” (in Orissa).—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 387.

[1598.—See under SAREE.

[c. 1610.—“Likewise is there plenty of silk, as well that of the silkworm as of the (silk) herb, which is of the brightest yellow colour, and brighter than silk itself.”—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 328.]

1627.—“Their manufactories (about Bala-sore) are of Cotton ... Silk, and Silk and Cotton Romals ... ; and of Herba (a Sort of tough Grass) they make Ginghams, Pinassos, and several other Goods for Exportation.”—A. Hamilton, i. 397; [ed. 1744].

1813.—Milburn, in his List of Bengal Piece-Goods, has Herba Taffaties (ii. 221).

GRASS-CUTTER, s. This is probably a corruption representing the H. ghāskhodā or ghāskātdā, ‘the digger, or cutter, of grass’; the title of a servant employed to collect grass for horses, one such being usually attached to each horse besides the syce or horse-keeper. In the north the grasscutter is a man; in the south the office is filled by the horsekeeper's wife. Ghāskat is the form commonly used by Englishmen in Upper India speaking Hindustani; but ghasiydrā by those aspiring to purer language. The former term appears in Williamson's V. M. (1810) as gauskot (i. 186), the latter in Jacquemont's Correspondence as grassyara. No grasscutters are mentioned as attached to the stables of Akbar; only a money allowance for grass. The antiquity of the Madras arrangement is shown by a passage in Castanheda (1552): "... he gave him a horse, and a boy to attend to it, and a female slave to see to its fodder."—(ii. 58.)

1789.—"... an Horsekeeper and Grass-cutter at two pagodas."—Munro's Narr. 28.

1793.—"Every horse ... has two attendants, one who cleans and takes care of him, called the horse-keeper, and the other the grasscutter, who provides for his forage."—Dirom's Narr. 242.

1846.—"Every horse has a man and a maid to himself—the maid cuts grass for him; and every dog has a boy. I inquired whether the cat had any servants, but I found he was allowed to wait upon himself."—Letters from Madras, 37.

[1850.—"Then there are our servants ... four Saises and four Ghascuts ..."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 253.]

1875.—"I suppose if you were to pick up ... a grasscutter's pony to replace the one you lost, you wouldn't feel that you had done the rest of the army out of their rights."—The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

[GRASSHOPPER FALLS, n.p. An Anglo-Indian corruption of the name of the great waterfall on the Sheravati River in the Shimoga District of Mysore, where the river plunges down in a succession of cascades, of which the principal is 890 feet in height. The proper name of the place is Gersoppa, or Gerusappe, which takes its name from the adjoining village; geru, Can., 'the marking nut plant' (semecarpus anacardium, L.), soppu, 'a leaf.' See Mr. Grey's note on P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 218.]

GRASS-WIDOW, s. This slang phrase is applied in India, with a shade of malignity, to ladies living apart from their husbands, especially as recreating at the Hill stations, whilst the husbands are at their duties in the plains.

We do not know the origin of the phrase. In the Slang Dictionary it is explained: "An unmarried mother; a deserted mistress." But no such opprobrious meanings attach to the Indian use. In Notes and Queries, 6th ser. viii. 414, will be found several communications on this phrase. [Also see ibid. x. 436, 526; xi. 178; 8th ser.

iv. 37, 75.] We learn from these that in Moor's Suffolk Words and Phrases, Grace-Widow occurs with the meaning of an unmarried mother. Corresponding to this, it is stated also, is the N.S. (?) or Low German gras-wedewe. The Swedish Gräsänka or -enka also is used for 'a low dissolute married woman living by herself.' In Belgium a woman of this description is called haecke-wedewe, from haecken, 'to feel strong desire' (to 'hanker'). And so it is suggested gräsenka is contracted from grädesenka, from gradiq, 'esuriens' (greedy, in fact). In Danish Dict. graesenska is interpreted as a woman whose betrothed lover is dead. But the German Stroh-Wittwe, 'straw-widow' (which Flügel interprets as 'mock widow'), seems rather inconsistent with the suggestion that grass-widow is a corruption of the kind suggested. A friend mentions that the masc. Stroh-Wittwer is used in Germany for a man whose wife is absent, and who therefore dines at the eating-house with the young fellows. [The N.E.D. gives the two meanings: 1. An unmarried woman who has cohabited with one or more men; a discarded mistress; 2. A married woman whose husband is absent from her. "The etymological notion is obscure, but the parallel forms disprove the notion that the word is a 'corruption' of grace-widow. It has been suggested that in sense 1. grass (and G. stroh) may have been used with opposition to bed. Sense 2. may have arisen as an etymologizing interpretation of the compound after it had ceased to be generally understood; in Eng. it seems to have first appeared as Anglo-Indian." The French equivalent, Veuve de Malabar, was in allusion to Lemierre's tragedy, produced in 1770.]

1878.—"In the evening my wife and I went out house-hunting; and we pitched upon one which the newly incorporated body of Municipal Commissioners and the Clergyman (who was a Grass-widower, his wife being at home) had taken between them."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 99-100.

1879.—The Indian newspaper's "typical official rises to a late breakfast—probably on herrings and soda-water—and dresses tastefully for his round of morning calls, the last on a grass-widow, with whom he has a tête-à-tête tiffin, where 'pegs' alternate with champagne."—Simla Letter in Times, Aug. 16.

1880.—“The Grass-widow in Nephelococcygia.”—Sir Ali Baba, 169.

GRASSIA, s. Grās (said to mean ‘a mouthful’) is stated by Mr. Forbes in the Rās Mālī (p. 186) to have been in old times usually applied to alienations for religious objects; but its prevalent sense came to be the portion of land given for subsistence to cadets of chieftains’ families. Afterwards the term grās was also used for the blackmail paid by a village to a turbulent neighbour as the price of his protection and forbearance, and in other like meanings. “Thus the title of grassia, originally an honourable one, and indicating its possessor to be a cadet of the ruling tribe, became at last as frequently a term of opprobrium, conveying the idea of a professional robber” (Ibid. Bk. iv. ch. 3); [ed. 1878, p. 568].

[1584.—See under COOLY.]

c. 1665.—“Nous nous trouvâmes au Village de Bilpar, dont les Habitans qu’on nomme Gratiates, sont presque tous Voleurs.”—Thevenot, v. 42.

1808.—“The Grasias have been shewn to be of different Sects, Casts, or families, viz., 1st, Colees and their Collaterals; 2nd, Rajpoots; 3rd, Syed Mussulmans; 4th, Mole-Islams or modern Mahomedans. There are besides many others who enjoy the free usufruct of lands, and permanent emolument from villages, but those only who are of the four aforesaid warlike tribes seem entitled by prescriptive custom . . . to be called Grassias.”—Drummond, Illustrations.

1813.—“I confess I cannot now contemplate my extraordinary deliverance from the Gracia machinations without feelings more appropriate to solemn silence, than expression.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 393; [conf. 2nd ed. ii. 357].

1819.—“Grassia, from Grass, a word signifying ‘a mouthful.’ This word is understood in some parts of Mekran, Sind, and Kutch; but I believe not further into Hindostan than Jaypoor.”—Mackmurdo, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 270. [On the use in Central India, see Tod, Annals, i. 175; Malcolm, Central India, i. 508.]

GRAVE-DIGGER. (See BEEJOO.)

GREEN-PIGEON. A variety of species belonging to the sub.-fam. Treroninae, and to genera Treron, Cricopus, Osmotreron, and Sphenocereus, bear this name. The three first following quotations show that these birds had attracted the attention of the ancients.

c. 180.—“Daimachus, in his History of India, says that pigeons of an apple-green colour are found in India.”—Athenaeus, ix. 51.

c. A.D. 250.—“They bring also greenish (ῥαῖς) pigeons which they say can never be tamed or domesticated.”—Arrian, De Nat. Anim. xv. 14.

„ “There are produced among the Indians . . . pigeons of a pale green colour (χλωρόπτιλοι); any one seeing them for the first time, and not having any knowledge of ornithology, would say the bird was a parrot and not a pigeon. They have legs and bill in colour like the partridges of the Greeks.”—Ibid. xvi. 2.

1673.—“Our usual diet was (besides Plenty of Fish) Water-Fowl, Peacocks, Green Pigeons, Spotted Deer, Sabro, Wild Hogs, and sometimes Wild Cows.”—Fryer, 176.

1825.—“I saw a great number of peafowl, and of the beautiful greenish pigeon common in this country . . .”—Heber, ii. 19.

GREY PARTRIDGE. The common Anglo-Indian name of the Hind. titar, common over a great part of India, Ortygornis Ponticeriuna, Gmelin. “Its call is a peculiar loud shrill cry, and has, not unaptly, been compared to the word Pateela-pateela-pateela, quickly repeated but preceded by a single note, uttered two or three times, each time with a higher intonation, till it gets, as it were, the key-note of its call.”—Jerdon, ii. 566.

GRIBLEE, s. A graplin or grapnel. Lascars’ language (Roebuck).

GRIFFIN, GRIFF, s.; GRIFFISH, adj. One newly arrived in India, and unaccustomed to Indian ways and peculiarities; a Johnny Newcome. The origin of the phrase is unknown to us. There was an Admiral Griffin who commanded in the Indian seas from Nov. 1746 to June 1748, and was not very fortunate. Had his name to do with the origin of the term? The word seems to have been first used at Madras (see Boyd, below). [But also see the quotation from Beaumont & Fletcher, below.] Three references below indicate the parallel terms formerly used by the Portuguese at Goa, by the Dutch in the Archipelago, and by the English in Ceylon.

GRUNTH, s. Panjābī Granth, from Skt. grantha, lit. 'a knot,' leaves tied together by a string. 'The Book,' i.e. the Scripture of the Sikhs, containing the hymns composed or compiled by their leaders from Nānak (1469-1539) onwards. The Granth has been translated by Dr. Trumpp, and published, at the expense of the Indian Government.

1770.—"As the young man (Nānak) was early introduced to the knowledge of the most esteemed writings of the Mussulmen . . . he made it a practice in his leisure hours to translate literally or virtually, as his mind prompted him, such of their maxims as made the deepest impression on his heart. This was in the idiom of Pendjab, his maternal language. Little by little he strung together these loose sentences, reduced them into some order, and put them in verses. . . . His collection became numerous; it took the form of a book which was entitled Granth."—Seir Mutukherin, i. 89.

1798.—"A book entitled the Granth . . . is the only typical object which the Sikques have admitted into their places of worship."—G. Forster's Travels, i. 255.

1817.—"The fame of Nannak's book was diffused. He gave it a new name, Kirrunt."—Mill's Hist. ii. 377.

c. 1831.—". . . Au centre du quel est le temple d'or où est gardé le Grant ou livre sacré des Sikes."—Jacquemont, Correspondance, ii. 166.

[1838.—"There was a large collection of priests, sitting in a circle, with the Grooh, their holy book, in the centre . . ."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, ii. 7.]

GRUNTHER, s. Panj. granthi from granth (see GRUNTH). A sort of native chaplain attached to Sikh regiments. [The name Granthi appears among the Hindi mendicant castes of the Panjab in Mr. MacLagan's Census Rep., 1891, p. 300.]

GRUNTHUM, s. This (granthum) is a name, from the same Skt. word as the last, given in various odd forms to the Sanskrit language by various Europeans writing in S. India during the 16th and 17th centuries. The term properly applied to the character in which the Sanskrit books were written.

1600.—"In these verses is written, in a particular language, called Gerodam, their Philosophy and Theology, which the Bramens study and read in Universities all over India."—Lucena, Vida do Padre F. Xavier, 95.

1646.—"Cette langue correspond à la nostre Latine, parvque les seules Lettres l'apprennent: il se nomment Guirindans."—Buratto, Rel. de la Prov. de la Malabar, 257.

1727.—". . . their four Law-books, Satya Vidam, Truth's Vidam, Edicurus Vidam, and Adir Vidam, which are all written in the Girandama, and are held in high esteem by the Bramins."—Valentijn, v. (Oceïst) 389.

.. "Girandam (by others called Kerendum, and also Sanskrit) is the language of the Bramins and the learned."—Ibid. 386.

1753.—"Les Indiens du pays se donnent le nom de Tamules, et on sait que la langue vulgaire différente du Sanskret, et du Grendam, qui sont les langues sacrées, porte le même nom."—D'Aurille, 117.

GUANA, IGUANA, s. This is not properly an Indian term, nor the name of an Indian species, but, as in many other cases, it has been applied by transfer from superficially resembling genera in the new Indies, to the old. The great lizards, sometimes called guanas in India, are apparently monitors. It must be observed, however, that approximating Indian names of lizards have helped the confusion. Thus the large monitor to which the name guana is often applied in India, is really called in Hindi goh (Skt. gohat), Singhalese goyā. The true iguana of America is described by Oviedo in the first quotation under the name of iuana. [The word is Span. iguana, from Carib icana, written in early writers hiuana, iqana, iuanna or yuana. See N.E.D. and Stanf. Dict.]

c. 1535.—"There is in this island an animal called Iuana, which is here held to be amphibious (neutrale), i.e. doubtful whether fish or flesh, for it frequents the rivers and climbs the trees as well. . . . It is a Serpent, bearing to one who knows it not a horrid and frightful aspect. It has the hands and feet like those of a great lizard, the head much larger, but almost of the same fashion, with a tail 4 or 5 palms in length. . . . And the animal, formed as I have described, is much better to eat than to look at," &c.—Oviedo, in Ramusio, iii. f. 156r, 157.

c. 1550.—"We also used to catch some four-footed animals called iguane, resembling our lizards in shape . . . the females are most delicate food."—Girolami Benzoni, p. 140.

1634.—"De Lacertao quādam specio, Incolis Liguan. Est . . . genus venenosissimum," &c.—Jac. Bontii, Lib. v. cap. 5. p. 57. (See GECKO.)

1673.—"Guiana, a Creature like a Crocodile, which Robbers use to lay hold on by their Tails, when they clamber Houses."—Fryer, 116.

1681.—Knox, in his Ceylon, speaks of two creatures resembling the Alligator—one called Kobbera guion, 5 or 6 feet long, and not eatable; the other called tolla guion, very like the former, but "which is eaten, and reckoned excellent meat . . . and I suppose it is the same with that which in the W. Indies is called the guiana" (pp. 30, 31). The names are possibly Portuguese, and Kobberaguion may be Cobra-guana.

1704.—"The Guano is a sort of Creature some of which are found on the land, some in the water . . . stewed with a little Spice they make good Broth."—Funnel, in Dampier, iv. 51.

1711.—"Here are Monkeys, Gannas, Lissards, large Snakes, and Alligators."—Lockyer, 47.

1780.—"They have here an amphibious animal called the guana, a species of the crocodile or alligator, of which soup is made equal to that of turtle. This I take upon hearsay, for it is to me of all others the most loathsome of animals, not less so than the toad."—Munro's Narrative, 36.

c. 1830.—"Had I known I was dining upon a guana, or large wood-lizard, I scarcely think I would have made so hearty a meal."—Tom Cringle (ed. 1863), 178.

1879.—"Captain Shaw asked the Imaum of one of the mosques of Malacca about alligator's eggs, a few days ago, and his reply was, that the young that went down to the sea became alligators, and those that came up the river became iguanas."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 200.

1881.—"The chief of Mudhol State belongs to the Bhonslá family. . . . The name, however, has been entirely superseded by the second designation of Ghorpade, which is said to have been acquired by one of the family who managed to scale a fort previously deemed impregnable, by fastening a cord around the body of a ghorpad or iguana."—Imperial Gazetteer, vi. 437.

1883.—"Who can look on that anachronism, an iguana (I mean the large monitor which Europeans in India generally call an iguana, sometimes a guano!) basking, four feet long, on a sunny bank . . ."—Tribes on My Frontier, 36.

1885.—"One of my moonshis, José Prethoo, a Concani of one of the numerous families descended from Xavier's converts, gravely informed me that in the old days iguanas were used in gaining access to besieged places; for, said he, a large iguana, sahib, is so strong that if 3 or 4 men laid hold of its tail he could drag them up a wall or tree!"—Gordon Forbes, Wild Life in Canara, 56.

GUARDAFUI, CAPE, n.p. The eastern horn of Africa, pointing towards India. We have the name from the Portuguese, and it has been alleged to have been so called by them as meaning, 'Take you heed!' (Gardez-vous, in fact.) But this is etymology of the species that so confidently derives 'Bombay' from Boa Bahia. Bruce, again (see below), gives dogmatically an interpretation which is equally unfounded. We must look to history, and not to the 'moral consciousness' of anybody. The country adjoining this horn of Africa, the Regio Aromatum of the ancients, seems to have been called by the Arabs Hafūn, a name which we find in the Periplus in the shape of Opōnē. This name Hafūn was applied to a town, no doubt the true Opōnē, which Barbosa (1516) mentions under the name of Afuni, and it still survives in those of two remarkable promontories, viz. the Peninsula of Rās Hafūn (the Chersonnesus of the Periplus, the Zingis of Ptolemy, the Cape d'Affui and d'Orfui of old maps and nautical directories), and the cape of Jard-Hafūn (or according to the Egyptian pronunciation, Gard-Hafūn), i.e. Guardafui. The nearest possible meaning of jard that we can find is 'a wide or spacious tract of land without herbage.' Sir R. Burton (Commentary on Camōens, iv. 489) interprets jard as = Bay, "from a break in the dreadful granite wall, lately provided by Egypt with a lighthouse." The last statement is unfortunately an error. The intended light seems as far off as ever. [There is still no lighthouse, and shipowners differ as to its advantage; see answer by Secretary of State, in House of Commons, Times, March 14, 1902.] We cannot judge of the ground of his interpretation of jard.

An attempt has been made to connect the name Hafūn with the Arabic af'a, 'pleasant odours.' It would then, be the equivalent of the ancient Reg. Aromatum. This is tempting, but very questionable. We should have mentioned that Guardafui is the site of the mart and Promontory of the Spices described by the author of the Periplus as the furthest point and abrupt termination of the continent of Barbarice (or eastern Africa), towards the Orient (τὸ τῶν Ἀρωματῶν ἐμπόριον καὶ ἀκρωτήριον τελευταῖον τῆς βαρβαρικῆς ἡπείρου πρὸς ἀνατολὴν ἀποκόπον).

According to C. Müller our Guardafui is called by the natives Rās Aser; their Rās Jardafūn being a point some 12

m. to the south, which on some charts is called Rds Shenarif, and which is also the Táβai of the Periplus (Geog. Gr. Minores, i. 263).

1516.—“And that the said ships from his ports (K. of Coulam's) shall not go inwards from the Strait and Cape of Guoardaffuy, nor go to Adem, except when employed in our obedience and service . . . and if any vessel or Zambuque is found inward of the Cape of Guoardaffuy it shall be taken as good prize of war.”—Treaty between Lopo Soares and the K. of Caulam, in Botelho, Tombo, 33.

„ “After passing this place (Afuni) the next after it is Cape Guardafun, where the coast ends, and trends so as to double towards the Red Sea.”—Barbosi, 16.

c. 1530.—“This province, called of late Arabia, but which the ancients called Trogloliticu, begins at the Red Sea and the country of the Abissines, and finishes at Magadasso . . . others say it extends only to the Cape of Guardafuni.”—Sommario de' Regni, in Ramusio, i. f. 325.

1553.—“Vicente Sodre, being despatched by the King, touched at the Island of Cocotora, where he took in water, and thence passed to the Cape of Guardafu, which is the most easterly land of Africa.”—De Barros, I. vii. cap. 2.

1554.—“If you leave Dábúl at the end of the season, you direct yourselves W.S.W. till the pole is four inches and an eighth, from thence true west to Kardafún.”—Sidi 'Ali Kapudân, The Mohit, in J. As. Soc. Ben., v. 464.

„ “You find such whirlpools on the coasts of Kardafún . . .”—The same, in his narrative, Journ. As. ser. 1. tom. ix. p. 77.

1572.—

“O Cabo vê já Aromata chamado,
E agora Guardafú, dos moradores,
Onde começa a boca do affamado
Mar Roxo, que do fundo toma as cores.”
Camões, x. 97.

Englished by Burton :

“The Cape which Antients ‘Aromatic’ clepe behold, yclept by Moderns Guardafú; where opes the Red Sea mouth, so wide and deep, the Sea whose ruddy bed lends blushing hue.”

1602.—“Eitor da Silveira set out, and without any mishap arrived at the Cape of Gardafui.”—Couto, IV. i. 4.

1727.—“And having now travell'd along the Shore of the Continent, from the Cape of Good Hope to Cape Guardafoy, I'll survey the Islands that lie in the Ethiopian Sea.”—A. Hamilton, i. 15; [ed. 1744].

1790.—“The Portuguese, or Venetians, the first Christian traders in these parts, have called it Gardefui, which has no signification in any language. But in that part of the country where it is situated, it is called Gardefan and means the Straits of Burial, the reason of which will be seen afterwards.”—Bruce's Travels, i. 315.

[1823.—“. . . we soon obtained sight of Cape Gardafui. . . . It is called by the natives Ras Asere, and the high mountain immediately to its south is named (tibel) Jordafoon. . . . Keeping about nine miles off shore we rounded the peninsula of Hafoon. . . . Hafoon appears like an island, and belongs to a native Somauli prince. . . .”—Owen, Narr. i. 353.]

GUAVA, s. This fruit (Psidium Guayava, L., Ord. Myrtaceae; Span. guayava, Fr. goyavier, [from Brazilian guayaba, Stanf. Dict.]), Guayabo pomifera Indica of Caspar Bauhin, Guayava of Joh. Bauhin, strangely appears by name in Elliot's translation from Amīr Khosrū, who flourished in the 13th century: “He who has placed only guavas and quinces in his throat, and has never eaten a plantain, will say it is like so much jujube” (iii. 556). This must be due to some ambiguous word carelessly rendered. The fruit and its name are alike American. It appears to be the guaiabo of Oviedo in his History of the Indies (we use the Italian version in Ramusio, iii. f. 141v). There is no mention of the guava in either De Orta or Acosta. Amrūd, which is the commonest Hindustani (Pers.) name for the guava, means properly ‘a pear’; but the fruit is often called safarī ām, ‘journey mango’ (respecting which see under AN-ANAS). And this last term is sometimes vulgarly corrupted into supdrī ām (areca-mango!). In the Deccan (according to Moodeen Sheriff) and all over Guzerat and the Central Provinces (as we are informed by M.-Gen. Keatinge), the fruit is called jām, Mahr. jamba, which is in Bengal the name of Syzgium jambolanum (see JAMOON), and in Guzerāti jāmūd, which seems to be a factitious word in imitation of āmūd.

The guava, though its claims are so inferior to those of the pine-apple (indeed except to stew, or make jelly, it is nobis judicibus, an utter impostor), [Sir Joseph Hooker annotates: “You never ate good ones!”] must have spread like that fruit with great rapidity. Both appear in Blochmann's transl. of the Āin (i. 64) as served at Akbar's table; though when the guava is named among the fruits of Tūrān, doubts again arise as to the fruit intended, for the word used, amrūd, is ambiguous. In 1688 Dampier mentions guavas at Achin, and in Cochin China. The tree, like the custard-apple, has become wild in some parts of India. See Davidson, below.

c. 1550.—“The guaiava is like a peach-tree, with a leaf resembling the laurel . . . the red are better than the white, and are well-flavoured.”—Girol. Benzonei, p. 88.

1658.—There is a good cut of the guava, as guaiaba, in Piso, pp. 152-3.

1673.—“. . . flourish pleasant Tops of Plantains, Coccoes, Guiavas, a kind of Pear.”—Fryer, 40.

1676.—“The N.W. part is full of Guaver Trees of the greatest variety, and their Fruit the largest and best tasted I have met with.”—Dampier, ii. 107.

1685.—“The Guava . . . when the Fruit is ripe, it is yellow, soft, and very pleasant. It bakes well as a Pear.”—Ibid. i. 222.

c. 1750-60.—“Our guides too made us distinguish a number of goyava, and especially plumb-trees.”—Grose, i. 20.

1764.—

“A wholesome fruit the ripened guava yields, Boast of the housewife.”

Grainger, Bk. i.

1843.—“On some of these extensive plains (on the Mohur R. in Oudh) we found large orchards of the wild Guava . . . strongly resembling in their rough appearance the pear-trees in the hedges of Worcestershire.”—Col. C. J. Davidson, Diary of Travels, ii. 271.

GUBBER, s. This is some kind of gold ducat or sequin; Milburn says ‘a Dutch ducat.’ It may have adopted this special meaning, but could hardly have held it at the date of our first quotation. The name is probably gabr (dīnār-i-gabr), implying its being of infidel origin.

c. 1590.—“Mirza Jani Beg Sultān made this agreement with his soldiers, that every one who should bring in an enemy’s head should receive 500 gabars, every one of them worth 12 miris . . . of which 72 went to one tanka.”—Tārīkh-i-Tāhiri, in Elliot, i. 287.

1711.—“Rupees are the most current Coin; they have Venetians, Gubbers, Muggerbees, and Pagodas.”—Lockyer, 201.

“When a Parcel of Venetian Ducats are mixt with others the whole goes by the name of Chequeens at Surat, but when they are separated, one sort is called Venetians, and all the others Gubbers indifferently.”—Ibid. 242.

1762.—“Gold and Silver Weights :

	oz.	dwts.	grs.
100 Venetian Ducats	. 11	0	5
10 (100?) Gubbers	. 10	17	12.”

Brooks, Weights and Measures.

GUBBROW, v. To bully, to dumbfound, and perturb a person. Made from ghabrāo, the imperative of ghabrānā. The latter, though sometimes used transitively, is more usually neuter, ‘to be dumbfounded and perturbed.’

GUDDA, s. A donkey, literal and metaphorical. H. gadā: [Skt. gardabha, ‘the roarer’]. The coincidence of the Scotch cuddy has been attributed to a loan from H. through the gypsies, who were the chief owners of the animal in Scotland, where it is not common. On the other hand, this is ascribed to a nickname Cuddy (for Cuthbert), like the English Neddy, similarly applied. [So the N.E.D. with hesitation.] A Punjab proverbial phrase is gadōn khurkī, “Donkeys’ rubbing” their sides together, a sort of ‘claw me and I’ll claw thee.’

GUDDY, GUDDEE, s. H. gaddī, Mahr. gādī. ‘The Throne.’ Properly it is a cushion, a throne in the Oriental sense, i.e. the seat of royalty, “a simple sheet, or mat, or carpet on the floor, with a large cushion or pillow at the head, against which the great man reclines” (Wilson). “To be placed on the guddee” is to succeed to the kingdom. The word is also used for the pad placed on an elephant’s back.

[1809.—“Seendhiya was seated nearly in the centre, on a large square cushion covered with gold brocade; his back supported by a round bolster, and his arms resting upon two flat cushions; all covered with the same costly material, and forming together a kind of throne, called a musnud, or guddee.”—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 28.]

GUDGE, s. P.—H. gaz, and corr. gaj; a Persian yard measure or thereabouts; but in India applied to measures of very varying lengths, from the hdth, or natural cubit, to the English yard. In the Āin [ed. Jarrett, ii. 58 seqq.] Abu’l Fazl details numerous gaz which had been in use under the Caliphs or in India, varying from 18 inches English (as calculated by

J. Prinsep) to 52½. The Ilahi gaz of Akbar was intended to supersede all these as a standard; and as it was the basis of all records of land-measurements and rents in Upper India, the determination of its value was a subject of much importance when the revenue surveys were undertaken about 1824. The results of enquiry were very discrepant, however, and finally an arbitrary value of 33 inches was assumed. The bighā (see BEEGAH), based on this, and containing 3600 square gaz = $\frac{1}{4}$ of an acre, is the standard in the N.W.P., but statistics are now always rendered in acres. See Gladwin's Ayeen (1800) i. 302, seqq.; Prinsep's Useful Tables, ed. Thomas, 122; [Madras Administration Manual, ii. 505.]

[1532.—“... and if in quantity the measure and the weight, and whether ells, roods or gazes.”—Archiv. Port. Orient. f. 5, p. 1562.]

1754.—“Some of the townsmen again demanded of me to open my bales, and sell them some pieces of cloth; but... I rather chose to make several of them presents of 2½ gaz of cloth, which is the measure they usually take for a coat.”—Hanway, i. 125.

1768-71.—“A gess or goss is 2 cobidos, being at Chinsurah 2 feet and 10 inches Rhineland measure.”—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 463.

1814.—“They have no measures but the gudge, which is from their elbow to the end of the middle finger, for measuring length.” Pearce, Acc. of the Ways of the Abyssinians, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. ii. 58.

GUICOWAR, n.p. Gāekwār, the title of the Mahratta kings of Guzerat, descended from Dāmājī and Pīlājī Gāekwār, who rose to distinction among Mahratta warriors in the second quarter of the 18th century. The word means ‘Cowherd.’

[1813.—“These princes were all styled Guickwar, in addition to their family name... the word literally means a cow-keeper, which, although a low employment in general, has, in this noble family among the Hindoos, who venerate that animal, become a title of great importance.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 375.]

GUINEA-CLOTHS, GUINEA-STUFFS, s. Apparently these were piece-goods bought in India to be used in the West African trade. [On the other hand, Sir G. Birdwood identifies them with gunny (Report on old Recs., 224). The manufacture still goes on at Pondicherry.] These are presumably the Negros-tücher of Baldaeus (1672), p. 154.

[1675.—“Guinea-stuffs,” in Birdwood, ut supra.]

1726.—We find in a list of cloths purchased by the Dutch Factory at Porto Novo, Guinees Lywaat, and Negros-Kleederen (‘Guinea linens and Negro’s clothing’).—See Valentijn, Chorom. 9.

1813.—“The demand for Surat piece-goods has been much decreased in Europe... and from the abolition of the slave trade, the demand for the African market has been much reduced... Guinea stuffs, 4½ yards each (per ton) 1200 (pieces).”—Milburn, i. 289.

[1878.—“The chief trades of Pondicherry are, spinning, weaving and dyeing the cotton stuffs known by the name of Guinees.”—Gurstin, Man. of S. Arcot, 426.]

[GUINEA DEER, s. An old name for some species of Chevrotain, in the quotation probably the Trugulus meminna or Mouse Deer (Blanford, Mammalia, 555).

[1755.—“Common deer they have here (in Ceylon) in great abundance, and also Guinea Deer.”—Ives, 57.]

GUINEA-FOWL. There seems to have been, in the 16th century, some confusion between turkeys and Guinea-fowl. See however under TURKEY. The Guinea-fowl is the Meleagris of Aristotle and others, the Afra avis of Horace.

GUINEA-PIG, s. This was a nickname given to midshipmen or apprentices on board Indiamen in the 18th century, when the command of such a vessel was a sure fortune, and large fees were paid to the captain with whom the youngsters embarked. Admiral Smyth, in his Sailor's Handbook, 1867, defines: ‘The younger midshipmen of an Indiaman.’

[1779.—“I promise you, to me it was no slight penance to be exposed during the whole voyage to the half sneering, satirical looks of the mates and guinea-pigs.”—Macintosh, Travels, quoted in Carey, Old Days, i. 73.]

GUINEA-WORM, s. A parasitic worm (Filaria Medinensis) inhabiting the subcutaneous cellular tissue of man, frequently in the leg, varying from 6 inches to 12 feet in length, and common on the Pers. Gulf, in Upper Egypt, Guinea, &c. It is found India, published under the name of "Gup," in 1868.

1809-10.—"They (native ladies) sit on their cushions from day to day, with no other . . . amusement than hearing the 'gup-gup,' or gossip of the place."—Mrs. Sherwood's Autobiog. 357.

1876.—"The first day of mourning goes by the name of gup, i.e. commemorative talk."—Schuyler's Turkistan, i. 151.

GUREEBPURWUR, GURREEB-NUWAUZ, ss. Ar.—P. Gharibparwar, Gharibnawdz, used in Hind. as respectful terms of address, meaning respectively 'Provider of the Poor!' 'Cherisher of the Poor!'

1726.—"Those who are of equal condition bend the body somewhat towards each other, and lay hold of each other by the beard, saying Grab-anemoas, i.e. I wish you the prayers of the poor."—Valentijn, Chor. 109, who copies from Van Twist (1648), p. 55.

1824.—"I was appealed to loudly by both parties, the soldiers calling on me as 'Ghureeb purwur,' the Goomashta, not to be outdone, exclaiming 'Donai, Lord Sahib! Donai! Rajah!'" (Read Dohāi and see DOAI).—Heber, i. 266. See also p. 279.

1867.—" 'Protector of the poor!' he cried, prostrating himself at my feet, 'help thy most unworthy and wretched slave! An unblest and evil-minded alligator has this day devoured my little daughter. She went down to the river to fill her earthen jar with water, and the evil one dragged her down, and has devoured her. Alas! she had on her gold bangles. Great is my misfortune!'"—Lt-Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 99.

GURJAUT, n.p. The popular and official name of certain forest tracts at the back of Orissa. The word is a hybrid, being the Hind. garh, 'a fort,' Persianised into a plural garhjāt, in ignorance of which we have seen, in quasi-official documents, the use of a further English plural, Gurjauts or garhjāts, which is like 'fortses.' [In the quotation below, the writer seems to think it a name of a class of people.] This manner of denominating such tracts from the isolated occupation by fortified posts seems to be very ancient in that part of India. We have in Ptolemy and the Periplus Dosarēnē or Dēsarēnē, apparently representing Skt. Daśārṇa, quasi daśan rina, 'having Ten Forts,' which the lists of the Brhat Sanhitā shew us in this part of India (J.R. As. Soc., N.S., v. 83). The forest tract behind Orissa is called in the grant of an Orissa king, Nava Koti, 'the Nine Forts' (J.A.S.B. xxxiii. 84); and we have, in this region, further in the interior, the province of Chattisgarh, '36 Forts.'

[1820.—"At present nearly one half of this extensive region is under the immediate jurisdiction of the British Government; the other possessed by tributary zemindars called Ghurjauts, or hill chiefs. . . ."—Hamilton, Description of Hindostan, ii. 32.]

GURRY.

a. A little fort; Hind. garhī. Also Gurr, i.e. garh, 'a fort.'

1693.—". . . many of his Heathen Nobles, only such as were befriended by strong Gurrs, or Fastnesses upon the Mountains. . . ."—Fryer, 165.

1786.—". . . The Zemindars in 4 per-gunnahs are so refractory as to have forfeited (read fortified) themselves in their gurries, and to refuse all payments of revenue."—Articles against W. Hastings, in Burke, vii. 59.

[1835.—"A shot was at once fired upon them from a high Ghurree."—Forbes, Rās Mala, ed. 1878, p. 521.]

GUTTA PERCHA, s. This is the Malay name Gatah Pertja, i.e. 'Sap of the Percha,' Dichopsis Gutta, Benth. (Isonandra Gutta, Hooker; N.O. Sapotaceae). Dr. Oxley writes (J. Ind. Archip. i. 22) that percha is properly the name of a tree which produces a spurious article; the real gutta p. is produced by the tubau. [Mr. Maxwell (Ind. Ant. xvii. 358) points out that the proper reading is taban.] The product was first brought to notice in 1843 by Dr. Montgomery. It is collected by first ringing the tree and then felling it, and no doubt by this process the article will speedily become extinct. The history of G. P. is, however, far from well known. Several trees are known to contribute to the exported article; their juices being mixed together. [Mr. Scott (Malay Words, 55 seqq.) writes the word getah percha, or getah perchah, 'gum of percha,' and remarks that it has been otherwise explained as meaning 'gum of Sumatra,' "there being another word percha, a name of Sumatra, as well as a third word percha, 'a rag, a remnant.'" Mr. Maxwell (loc. cit.) writes: "It is still uncertain whether there is a gutta-producing tree called Percha by the Malays. My experience is that they give the name of Perchah to that kind of getah taban which hardens into strips in boiling. These are stuck together and made into balls for export."]

[1847.—"Gutta Percha is a remarkable example of the rapidity with which a really useful invention becomes of importance to the English public. A year ago it was almost unknown, but now its peculiar properties are daily being made more available in some new branch of the useful or ornamental arts."—Mundy, Journal, in Narrative of Events in Borneo and Celebes, ii. 342 seq. (quoted by Scott, loc. cit.).]

1868.—"The late Mr. d'Almeida was the first to call the attention of the public to the substance now so well known as gutta-percha. At that time the Isonandru Gutta was an abundant tree in the forests of Singapore, and was first known to the Malays, who made use of the juice which they obtained by cutting down the trees. . . . Mr. d'Almeida . . . acting under the advice of a friend, forwarded some of the substance to the Society of Arts. There it met with no immediate attention, and was put away uncared for. A year or two afterwards Dr. Montgomery sent specimens to England, and bringing it under the notice of competent persons, its value was at once acknowledged. . . . The sudden and great demand for it soon resulted in the disappearance of all the gutta-percha trees on Singapore Island."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, pp. 268-9.

GUZZY, s. Pers. and Hind. gazī; perhaps from its having been woven of a gaz (see GUDGE) in breadth. A very poor kind of cotton cloth.

1701.—In a price list for Persia we find: "Geşjes Bengaals."—Valentijn, v. 303.

1784.—"It is suggested that the following articles may be proper to compose the first adventure (to Tibet): . . . Guzzie, or coarse Cotton Cloths, and Otterskins. . . ."—In Seton-Karr, i. 4.

[1866.—". . . common unbleached fabrics . . . used for packing goods, and as a covering for the dead. . . These fabrics in Bengal pass under the names of Garrha and Guzee."—Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures, 83.]

GWALIOR, n.p. Hind. Gwāliār. A very famous rock-fortress of Upper India, rising suddenly and picturesquely out of a plain (or shallow valley rather) to a height of 300 feet, 65 m. south of Agra, in lat. 26° 13'. Gwalior may be traced back, in Gen. Cunningham's opinion, to the 3rd century of our era. It was the seat of several ancient Hindu dynasties, and from the time of the early Mahommedan sovereigns of Delhi down to the reign of Aurangzib it was used as a state-prison. Early in the 18th century it fell into the possession of the Mahratta family of Sindhia, whose residence was established to the south of the fortress, in what was originally a camp, but has long been a city known by the original title of Lashkar (camp). The older city lies below the northern foot of the rock. Gwalior has been three times taken by British arms: (1) escaladed by a force under the command of Major Popham in 1780, a very daring feat; * (2) by a regular attack under Gen. White in 1805; (3) most gallantly in June 1858, by a party of the 25th Bombay N. I. under Lieutenants Rose and Waller, in which the former officer fell. After the two first captures the fortress was restored to the Sindhia family. From 1858 it was retained in our hands, but in December 1885 it was formally restored to the Mahārājā Sindhia.

The name of the fortress, according to Gen. Cunningham (Archaeol. Survey, ii. 335), is derived from a small Hindū shrine within it dedicated to the hermit Gwāli or Gwāli-pā, after whom the fortress received the name of Gwāli-dwar, contracted into Gwāliār.

c. 1020.—"From Kanauj, in travelling south-east, on the western side of the Ganges, you come to Jajāhotī, at a distance of 30 parasangs, of which the capital is Kajurāha. In that country are the two forts of Gwāliār and Kālinjar. . . ."—Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i. 57-8.

1196.—The royal army marched "towards Gālewār, and invested that fort, which is the pearl of the necklace of the castles of Hind, the summit of which the nimble-footed wind from below cannot reach, and on the bastions of which the clouds have never cast their shade. . . ."—Hasan Nizāmī, in Elliot, ii. 227.

c. 1340.—"The castle of Gālyār, of which we have been speaking, is on the top of a high hill, and appears, so to speak, as if it were itself cut out of the rock. There is no other hill adjoining; it contains reservoirs

* The two companies which escaladed were led by Captain Bruce, a brother of the Abyssinian traveller. "It is said that the spot was pointed out to Popham by a cowherd, and that the whole of the attacking party were supplied with grass shoes to prevent them from slipping on the ledges of rock. There is a story also that the cost of these grass-shoes was deducted from Popham's pay, when he was about to leave India as a major-general, nearly a quarter of a century afterwards."—Cunningham, Arch. Surv. ii. 840.

of water, and some 20 wells walled round are attached to it: on the walls are mounted mangonels and catapults. The fortress is ascended by a wide road, traversed by elephants and horses. Near the castle-gate is the figure of an elephant carved in stone, and surmounted by a figure of the driver. Seeing it from a distance one has no doubt about its being a real elephant. At the foot of the fortress is a fine city, entirely built of white stone, mosques and houses alike; there is no timber to be seen in it, except that of the gates."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 193.

1526.—"I entered Gualiar by the Hatipul gate. . . . They call an elephant hāti, and a gate pāl. On the outside of this gate is the figure of an elephant, having two elephant drivers on it. . . ."—Baber, p. 383.

[c. 1590.—"Gualiar is a famous fort, in which are many stately buildings, and there is a stone elephant over the gate. The air and water of this place are both esteemed good. It has always been celebrated for fine singers and beautiful women. . . ."—Ayeen, Gladrin, ed. 1800, ii. 38; ed. Jarrett, ii. 181.]

1610.—"The 31 to Gwalere, 6 c., a pleasant Citie with a Castle. . . . On the West side of the Castle, which is a steep craggy cliffe of 6 c. compasse at least (divers say eleven). . . . From hence to the top, leads a narrow stone cawsey, walled on both sides; in the way are three gates to be passed, all exceeding strong, with Courts of guard to each. At the top of all, at the entrance of the last gate, standeth a mightie Elephant of stone very curiously wrought. . . ."—Finch, in Purchas, i. 426-7.

1616.—"23. Gwallier, the chief City so called, where the Mogol hath a very rich Treasury of Gold and Silver kept in this City, within an exceeding strong Castle, wherein the King's Prisoners are likewise kept. The Castle is continually guarded by a very strong Company of Armed Souldiers."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 356.

[, , "Kualiar," in Sir T. Roe's List, Hak. Soc. ii. 539.]

c. 1665.—"For to shut them up in Goualeor, which is a Fortress where the Princes are ordinarily kept close, and which is held impregnable, it being situated upon an inaccessible Rock, and having within itself good water, and provision enough for a Garison; that was not an easie thing."—Bernier E.T. 5; [ed. Constable, 14].

c. 1670.—"Since the Mahometan Kings became Masters of this Countrey, this Fortress of Goualeor is the place where they secure Princes and great Noblemen. Chaiehan coming to the Empire by foul-play, caus'd all the Princes and Lords whom he mistrusted, to be seiz'd one after another, and sent them to the Fortress of Goualeor; but he suffer'd them all to live and enjoy their estates. Aureng-zeb his Son acts quite otherwise; for when he sends any great Lord to this place, at the end of nine or ten days he orders him to be poison'd; and this he does that the people may not exclaim against him for a bloody Prince."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 35; [ed. Ball, i. 63].

GYAUL (properly GAYĀL), [Skt. go, 'an ox'], s. A large animal (Gavaeus frontalis, Jerd., Bos f. Blanford, Mammalia, 487) of the ox tribe, found wild in various forest tracts to the east of India. It is domesticated by the Mishmis of the Assam valley, and other tribes as far south as Chittagong. In Assam it is called Mithan.

[c. 1590.—In Arakan, "cows and buffaloes there are none, but there is an animal which has somewhat of the characteristics of both, piebald and particoloured whose milk the people drink."—Āin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 119.]

1824.—"In the park several uncommon animals are kept. Among them the Ghyal, an animal of which I had not, to my recollection, read any account, though the name was not unknown to me. It is a very noble creature, of the ox or buffalo kind, with immensely large horns. . . ."—Heber, i. 34.

1866-67.—"I was awakened by an extraordinary noise, something between a bull's bellow and a railway whistle. What was it? We started to our feet, and Fuzlah and I were looking to our arms when Adupah said, 'It is only the guyal calling; Sahib! Look, the dawn is just breaking, and they are opening the village gates for the beasts to go out to pasture.'

"These guyal were beautiful creatures, with broad fronts, sharp wide-spreading horns, and mild melancholy eyes. They were the indigenous cattle of the hills domesticated by these equally wild Lushais. . . ."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, &c., p. 303.

GYELONG, s. A Buddhist priest in Tibet. Tib. dGe-sLong, i.e. 'beggar of virtue,' i.e. a bhikshu or mendicant friar (see under BUXEE); but latterly a priest who has received the highest orders. See Jaeschke, p. 86.

1784.—"He was dressed in the festival habit of a gylong or priest, being covered with a scarlet satin cloak, and a gilded mitre on his head."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 25.

GYM-KHANA, s. This word is quite modern, and was unknown 40 years ago. The first use that we can trace is (on the authority of Major John Trotter) at Rūrki in 1861, when a gymkhana was instituted there. It is a factitious word, invented, we believe, in the Bombay Presidency, and probably based upon gend-khāna ('ball-house'), the name usually given 'a cart-wheel,' takes the forms haka and saka (see Kuhn, On Oldest Aryan Elements of Singhalese, translated by D. Ferguson in Indian Ant. xii. 64). [But this can have no connection with chhakra, which represents Skt. śakata, 'a waggon.']

1673.—"The Coach wherein I was breaking, we were forced to mount the Indian Hackery, a Two-wheeled Chariot, drawn by swift little Oxen."—Fryer, 83. [For these swift oxen, see quot. from Forbes below, and from Aelian under GYNEE].

1690.—"Their Hackeries likewise, which are a kind of Coach, with two Wheels, are all drawn by Oxen."—Ovington, 254.

1711.—"The Streets (at Surat) are wide and commodious; otherwise the Hackerys, which are very common, would be an Inconveniency. These are a sort of Coaches drawn by a Pair of Oxen."—Lockyer, 259.

1742.—"The bridges are much worn, and out of repair, by the number of Hackaries and other carriages which are continually passing over them."—In Wheeler, iii. 262.

1756.—"The 11th of July the Nawab arrived in the city, and with him Bundoo Sing, to whose house we were removed that afternoon in a hackery."—Holwell, in Wheeler's Early Records, 249.

c. 1760.—"The hackrees are a conveyance drawn by oxen, which would at first give an idea of slowness that they do not deserve . . . they are open on three sides, covered a-top, and are made to hold two people sitting cross-legged."—Grose, i. 155-156.

1780.—"A hackery is a small covered carriage upon two wheels drawn by bullocks, and used generally for the female part of the family."—Hodges, Travels, 5.

c. 1790.—"Quant aux palankins et hackaries (voitures à deux roues), on les passe sur une double sangarie" (see JANGAR).—Haafner, ii. 173.

1793.—"To be sold by Public Auction . . . a new Fashioned Hackery."—Bombay Courier, April 13.

1798.—"At half-past six o'clock we each got into a hackeray."—Stavorinus, tr. by Wilcocks, iii. 295.

1811.—Solvyns draws and describes the Hackery in the modern Bengal sense.

"Il y a cependant quelques endroits où l'on se sert de charettes couvertes à deux roues, appelées hickeris, devant lesquelles on attèle des bœufs, et qui servent à voyager."—Editor of Haafner, Voyages, ii. 3.

1813.—"Travelling in a light hackaree, at the rate of five miles an hour."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 376; [2nd ed. ii. 352; in i. 150, hackeries, ii. 253, hackarees]. Forbes's engraving represents such an ox-carriage as would be called in Bengal a baili (see BYLEE).

1829.—"The genuine vehicle of the country is the hackery. This is a sort of wee tent, covered more or less with tinsel and scarlet, and bells and gilding, and placed upon a clumsy two-wheeled carriage with a pole that seems to be also a kind of boot, as it is at least a foot deep. This is drawn by a pair of white bullocks."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed., 84.

1860.—"Native gentlemen, driving fast trotting oxen in little hackery carts, hastened home from it."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 140.

[HADDY, s. A grade of troops in the Mogul service. According to Prof. Blochmann (Āin, i. 20, note) they corresponded to our "Warranted officers." "Most clerks of the Imperial offices, the painters of the Court, the foremen in Akbar's workshops, &c., belonged to this corps. They were called Aḥadīs, or single men, because they stood under Akbar's immediate orders." And Mr. Irvine writes: "Midway between the nobles or leaders (mansabddars) with the horsemen under them (tabīndān) on the one hand, and the Aḥshām (see EYSHAM), or infantry, artillery, and artificers on the other, stood the Aḥadī, or gentleman trooper. The word is literally 'single' or 'alone' (A. aḥad, 'one'). It is easy to see why this name was applied to them; they offered their services singly, they did not attach themselves to any chief, thus forming a class apart from the tabīndān; but as they were horsemen, they stood equally apart from the specialised services included under the remaining head of Aḥshām." (J. R. As. Soc., July 1896, p. 545.)

[c. 1590.—"Some soldiers are placed under the care and guidance of one commander. They are called Ahadis, because they are fit for a harmonious unity."—Āin, ed. Blochmann, i. 231.

[1616.—"The Prince's Haddy . . . betrayed me."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 383.

[1617.—"A Haddey of horse sent down to see it effected."—Ibid. ii. 450.

[c. 1625.—"The day after, one of the King's Haddys finding the same."—Coryat, in Purchas, i. 600.]

HADGEE, s. Ar. Hāj, a pilgrim to Mecca; from hajj, the pilgrimage, or visit to a venerated spot. Hence Hājji and Hājī used colloquially in Persian and Turkish. Prof. Robertson Smith writes: "There is current confusion about the word hajj. It is originally the participle of hajj, 'he went on the hajj.' But in modern use hajij is used as part., and hajj is the title given to one who has made the pilgrimage. When this is prefixed to a name, the double j cannot be pronounced without inserting a short vowel and the a is shortened; thus you say 'el-Hajjē Soleimān,' or the like. The incorrect form Hajjī is however used by Turks and Persians."

[1609.—"Upon your order, if Hoghee Careen so please, I purpose to delve him 25 pigs of lead."—Danvers, Letters, i. 26.

[c. 1610.—"Those who have been to Arabia . . . are called Agy."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 165.

[c. 1665.—"Aureng-Zebe once observed perhaps by way of joke, that Sultan Sujah was become at last an Agy or pilgrim."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 113.

[1673.—"Hodge, a Pilgrimage to Mecca." (See under A MUCK.)

[1683.—"Hodgee Sophee Caun." See under FIRMAUN.]

1765.—"Hodgee acquired this title from his having in his early years made a pilgrimage to Hodge (or the tomb of Mahommed at Mecca)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 59.

[c. 1833.—"The very word in Hebrew Khog, which means 'festival,' originally meant 'pilgrimage,' and corresponds with what the Arabs call hatch. . . ."—Travels of Dr. Wolff, ii. 155.]

HÁKIM, s. H. from Ar. hakim, 'a judge, a ruler, a master'; 'the authority.' The same Ar. root hakm, 'bridling, restraining, judging,' supplies a variety of words occurring in this Glossary, viz. Hákim (as here); Hakim (see HUCKEEM); Hukm (see HOOKUM); Hikmat (see HICKMAT).

[1611.—"Not standing with his greatness to answer every Haccam, which is as a Governor or petty King."—Danvers, Letters, i. 158. In ibid. i. 175, Hackum is used in the same way.]

c. 1861.—

"Then comes a settlement Hakim, to teach me to plough and weed—
I sowed the cotton he gave me—but first
I boiled the seed. . . ."

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

HALÁL CORE, s. Lit. Ar.—P. halál-khor, 'one who eats what is lawful,' [halál being the technical Mahomedan phrase for the slaying of an animal to be used for food according to the proper ritual], applied euphemistically to a person of very low caste, a sweeper or scavenger, implying 'to whom all is lawful food.'

Generally used as synonymous with bungy (q.v.). [According to Prof. Blochmann, "Halálkhūr, i.e. one who eats that which the ceremonial law allows, is a euphemism for hardmkhūr, one who eats forbidden things, as pork, &c. The word halálkhūr is still in use among educated Muhammadans; but it is doubtful whether (as stated in the Āīn) it was Akbar's invention." (Āīn, i. 139 note.)]

1623.—"Schiah Selim nel principio . . . si sdegnò tanto, che poco mancò che per dispetto non la desse per forza in matrimonio ad uno della razza che chiamano halal chor, quasi dica 'mangia lecito,' cioè che ha per lecito di mangiare ogni cosa. . . ." (See other quotation under HAREM).—P. della Valle, ii. 525; [Hak. Soc. i. 54].

1638.—". . . sont obligez de se purifier depuis la teste i'usqu'aux pieds si quelqu'un de ces gens qu'ils appellent Alchores, leur a touché."—Mandelslo, Paris, 1659, 219.

1665.—"Ceux qui ne parlent que Persan dans les Indes, les appellent Halalcour, c'est à dire celui qui se donne la liberté de manger de tout ce qu'il lui plait, ou, selon quelques uns, celui qui mange ce qu'il a légitimement gagné. Et ceux qui approuvent cette dernière explication, disent qu'autrefois Halalcours s'appellent Haramcours, mangeurs de Viande défenduës."—Thevenot, v. 190.

1673.—"That they should be accounted the Offscum of the People, and as base as the Holencores (whom they account so, because they defile themselves by eating anything)."—Fryer, 28; [and see under BOY, b].

1690.—"The Halalchors . . . are another Sort of Indians at Suratt, the most contemptible, but extremely necessary to be there."—Ovington, 382.

1763.—"And now I must mention the Hallachores, whom I cannot call a Tribe, being rather the refuse of all the Tribes. These are a set of poor unhappy wretches, destined to misery from their birth. . . ."—Reflexions, &c., by Luke Scrafton, Esq., 7-8. It was probably in this passage that Burns (see below) picked up the word.

1783.—"That no Hollocore, Derah, or Chandala caste, shall upon any consideration come out of their houses after 9 o'clock in the morning, lest they should taint the air, or touch the superior Hindoos in the streets."—Mahratta Proclamation at Baroch, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 232.

1786.—"When all my schoolfellows and youthful compeers (those misguided few excepted who joined, to use a Gentoo phrase, the hallachores of the human race) were striking off with eager hope and earnest intent, in some one or other of the many paths of a busy life, I was 'standing idle in the market-place.'"—Letter of Robert Burns, in A. Cunningham's ed. of Works and Life, vi. 63.

1788.—The Indian Vocabulary also gives Halachore.

1810.—"For the meaner offices we have a Halalcor or Chandela (one of the most wretched Pariahs)."—Maria Graham, 51.

HALALLOUR. V. used in the imperative for infinitive, as is common in the Anglo-Indian use of H. verbs, being Ar.—H. haldal-kar, 'make lawful,' i.e. put (an animal) to death in the manner prescribed to Mahomedans, when it is to be used for food.

[1855.—"Before breakfast I bought a moderately sized sheep for a dollar. Shaykh Hamid 'halaled' (butchered) it according to rule. . . ."—Burton, Pilgrimage, ed. 1893, i. 256.]

1883.—"The diving powers of the poor duck are exhausted. . . . I have only . . . to seize my booty, which has just enough of life left to allow Peer Khan to make it halal, by cutting its throat in the name of Allah, and dividing the webs of its feet."—Tribes on My Frontier, 167.

HALF-CASTE. s. A person of mixt European and Indian blood. (See MUSTEES; EURASIAK.)

1789.—"Mulattoes, or as they are called in the East Indies, half-caste."—Munro's Narrative, 51.

1793.—"They (the Mahratta Infantry) are commanded by half-cast people of Portuguese and French extraction, who draw off the attention of the spectators from the bad clothing of their men, by the profusion of antiquated lace bestowed on their own."—Drom, Narrative, ii.

1809.—"The Padre, who is a half-cast Portuguese, informed me that he had three districts under him."—Ld. Valentia, i. 329.

1828.—"An invalid sergeant . . . came, attended by his wife, a very pretty young half-caste."—Heber, i. 298.

1875.—"Othello is black—the very tragedy lies there; the whole force of the contrast, the whole pathos and extenuation of his doubts of Desdemona, depend on this blackness. Fechter makes him a half-caste."—G. H. Lewes, On Actors and the Art of Acting.

HANGER. s. The word in this form is not in Anglo-Indian use, but (with the Scotch whinger, Old Eng. whinyard, Fr. cangiar, &c., other forms of the same) may be noted here as a corruption of the Arab. khanjar, 'a dagger or short falchion.' This (vulg. cunjar) is the Indian form. [According to the N.E.D. though 'hanger' has sometimes been employed to translate khanjar (probably with a notion of etymological identity) there is no connection between the words.] The khanjar in India is a large double-edged dagger with a very broad base and a slight curve. [See drawings in Egerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, pl. X. Nos. 504, 505, &c.]

1574.—"Patrick Spreull . . . being persewit be Johnes Boill Chepman . . . in invadyng of him, and stryking him with ano quhinger . . . through the quhilk the said Johnes neis was woundit to the effusioun of his blude."—Acts from Records of the Burgh of Glasgow (1876), p. 2.

1601.—"The other day I happened to enter into some discourse of a hanger, which I assure you, both for fashion and workmanship was most peremptory beautiful and gentlemanlike. . . ."—B. Jonson, Every Man in His Humour, i. 4.

[c. 1610.—"The islanders also bore their arms, viz., alfanges (al-khanjar) or scimitars."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 43.]

1653.—"Gangeard est en Turq, Persan et Indistanni vn poignard courbé."—De la Boullaye-Le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 539.

1672.—". . . il s'estoit emporté contre elle jusqu'à un tel excès qu'il luy avoit porté quelques coups de Cangiar dans les mamelles. . . ."—Journal d'Ant. Gailhard, i. 177.

1673.—". . . handjar de diamants. . . ."—App. to do. ii. 189.

1676.—
"His pistol next he cock'd anew
And out his nutbrown whinyard drew."
Hudibras, Canto iii.

1684.—"The Souldiers do not wear Hangers or Scimitars like the Persians, but broad Swords like the Switzers. . . ."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 65; [ed. Ball, i. 167].

1712.—"His Excy . . . was presented by the Emperor with a Hindoostany Candjar, or dagger, set with fine stones."—Valentin, iv. (Soratte), 286.

[1717.—"The 23rd ultimo, John Surman received from his Majesty a horse and a Cunger. . . ."—In Wheeler, Early Records, 183.]

1781.—"I fancy myself now one of the most formidable men in Europe; a blunderbuss for Joe, a pair of double barrels to stick in my belt, and a cut and thrust hanger with a little pistol in the hilt, to hang by my side."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 56.

"Lost out of a buggy on the Road between Barnagur and Calcutta, a steel mounted Hanger with a single guard."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, June 30.

1883.—". . . by farrashes, the carpet-spreader class, a large canjar, or curved dagger, with a heavy ivory handle, is carried; less for use than as a badge of office."—Willis, Modern Persia, 326.

List of Men's Names, &c., immediately in the Service of the Honble. the United Compy. in their Factory of Fort William, Bengall, November, 1706 (MS. in India Office).

c. 1753.—Among the expenses of the Mayor's Court at Calcutta we find: "A harry . . . Rs. 1."—Long, 43.

c. 1754.—"A Harry or water-wench. . . ." (at Madras).—Ives, 50.

[, " Harries are the same at Bengal, as Frosts (see FARASH) are at Bombay. Their women do all the drudgery at your houses, and the men carry your Palanquin."—Ibid. 26.]

„ In a tariff of wages recommended by the "Zemindars of Calcutta," we have: " Harry-woman to a Family . . . 2 Rs."—In Seton-Karr, i. 95.

1768-71.—"Every house has likewise . . . a harry-maid or matarani (see MATRANEE) who carries out the dirt; and a great number of slaves, both male and female."—Starorinus, i. 523.

1781.—"2 Harries or Sweepers . . . 6 Rs.

[1813.—"He was left to view a considerable time, and was then carried by the Hurries to the Golgotha."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 131.]

HATTY, s. Hind. hāthī, the most common word for an elephant; from Skt. hasta, 'the hand,' and hastī, 'the elephant,' come the Hind. words hāth and hāthī, with the same meanings. The analogy of the elephant's trunk to the hand presents itself to Pliny:

"Mandunt ore; spirant et bibunt odoranturque haud inproprie appellatā manu."—viii. 10 and to Tennyson:

„ . . . camels knelt
Unbidden, and the brutes of mountain back
That carry kings in castles, bow'd black knees
Of homage, ringing with their serpent hands,
To make her smile, her golden ankle-bells."
Merlin and Vivien.

c. 1526.—"As for the animals peculiar to Hindustān, one is the elephant, as the Hindustānis call it Hathi, which inhabits the district of Kalpi, the more do the wild elephants increase in number. That is the tract in which the elephant is chiefly taken."—Baber, 315. This notice of Baber's shows how remarkably times have changed. No elephants now exist anywhere near the region indicated. [On elephants in Hindustan, see Blochmann's Ain, i. 618].

[1838.—"You are of course aware that we habitually call elephants Hotties, a name that might be safely applied to every other animal in India, but I suppose the elephants had the first choice of names and took the most appropriate."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 269.]

HATTYCHOOK, s. Hind. hāthī-chak, servant's and gardener's Hind. for the globe artichoke; [the Jerusalem artichoke is hāthipich]. This is worth producing, because our word (artichoke) is itself the corruption of an Oriental word thus carried back to the East in a mangled form.

HAUT, s.

a. Hind. hāth, (the hand or forearm, and thence) 'a cubit,' from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger; a measure of 18 inches, and sometimes more.

[1614.—"A godown 10 Hast high."—Foster, Letters, ii. 112.

[c. 1810.—". . . even in the measurements made by order of the collectors, I am assured, that the only standards used were the different Kazis' arms, which leaves great room for fraud. . . . All persons measuring cloth know how to apply their arm, so as to measure a cubit of 18 inches with wonderful exactness."—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 576.]

b. Hind. hāt, Skt. hātta, 'a market held on certain days.'

[1800.—"In this Carnatic . . . there are no fairs like the hauts of Bengal."—Buchanan, Mysore, i. 19.

[1818.—"The Hindoos have also market days (hātūs), when the buyers and sellers assemble, sometimes in an open plain, but in general in market places."—Ward, Hindoos, i. 151.]

HAVILDAR, s. Hind. ḥavildār.

A sepoy non-commissioned officer, corresponding to a sergeant, and wearing the chevrons of a sergeant. This dating from about the middle of the 18th century is the only modern use of the term in that form. It is a corruption of Pers. ḥawāladār, or ḥawāldār, 'one holding an office of trust'; and in this form it had, in other times, a variety of applications to different charges and subordinate officers. Thus among the Mahrattas the commandant of a fort was so styled; whilst in Eastern Bengal the term was, and perhaps still is, applied to the holder of a hawdla, an intermediate tenure between those of zemindar and ryot.

1672.—Regarding the Cowle obtained from the Nabob of Golcondah for the Fort and Town of Chinapatnam. 11,000 Pagodas to be paid in full of all demands for the past, and in future Pagodas 1200 per annum rent, "and so to hold the Fort and Town free from any Avildar or Divan's People, or any other imposition for ever."—Fort St. George Consn., April 11, in Notes and Exts., No. i. 25.

1673.—"We landed at about Nine in the Morning, and were civilly treated by the Customer in his Choultry, till the Havildar could be acquainted of my arrival."—Fryer, 123.

[1680.—"Avaldar." See under JUNCA-MEER.]

1696.—"... the havildar of St. Thomé and Pulecat."—Wheeler, i. 308.

[1763.—"Three araldars (avaldares) or receivers."—India Office MSS. Conselho, Ultramarino, vol. i.

[1773.—"One or two Hircars, one Havildah, and a company of sepoys. . . ."—Ives, 67.]

1824.—"Curreeem Musseeh was, I believe, a havildar in the Company's army, and his sword and sash were still hung up, with a not unpleasing vanity, over the desk where he now presided as catechist."—Heber, i. 149.

HAVILDAR'S GUARD, s. There is a common way of cooking the fry of fresh-water fish (a little larger than whitebait) as a breakfast dish, by frying them in rows of a dozen or so, spitted on a small skewer. On the Bombay side this dish is known by the whimsical name in question.

HAZREE, s. This word is commonly used in Anglo-Indian households in the Bengal Presidency for 'breakfast.' It is not clear how it got this meaning. [The earlier sense was religious, as below.] It is properly hāziri, 'muster,' from the Ar. hāzir, 'ready or present.' (See CHOTA-HAZRY.)

[1832.—"The Sheeahs prepare hazree (breakfast) in the name of his holiness Abbas Allee Ullum-burdar, Hosein's step-brother; i.e. they cook polao, rotee, curries, &c., and distribute them."—Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, ed. 1863, p. 183.]

HENDRY KENDRY, n.p. Two islands off the coast of the Concan, about 7 m. south of the entrance to Bombay Harbour, and now belonging to Kolāba District. The names, according to Ph. Anderson, are Haneri and Khaneri; in the Admy. chart they are Oonari, and Khundari. They are also variously written (the one) Hundry, Ondera, Hunarey, Henery, and (the other) Kundra, Cundry, Cunarey, Kenery. The real names are given in the Bombay Gazetteer as Underi and Khanderi. Both islands were piratically occupied as late as the beginning of the 19th century. Khanderi passed to us in 1818 as part of the Peshwa's territory; Underi lapsed in 1840. [Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Records, 83), describing the "Consultations" of 1679, writes: "At page 69, notice of 'Sevagee' fortifying 'Hendry Kendry,' the twin islets, now called Henery (i.e. Vondari, 'Mouse-like,' Kenery (i.e. Khandari), i.e. 'Sacred to Khandaroo.' The former is thus derived from Skt. undaru, unduru, 'a rat'; the latter from Mahr. Khanderdv, 'Lord of the Sword,' a form of Siva.]

1673.—"These islands are in number seven; viz. Bombaim, Canorein, Trumbay, Elephanto, the Putachoes, Munchumbay, and Kerenjan, with the Rock of Henry Kenry. . . ."—Fryer, 61.

1681.—"Although we have formerly wrote you that we will have no war for Hendry Kendry, yet all war is so contrary to our constitution, as well as our interest, that we cannot too often inculcate to you our aversion thereunto."—Court of Directors to Surat, quoted in Anderson's Western India, p. 175.

1727.—"... four Leagues south of Bombay, are two small Islands Undra, and Cundra. The first has a Fortress belonging to the Sedee, and the other is fortified by the Sevajee, and is now in the Hands of Connajee Angria."—A. Hamilton, i. 243; [ed. 1744].

c. 1760.—"At the harbor's mouth lie two small fortified rocks, called Henara and Canara. . . . These were formerly in the hands of Angria, and the Siddes, or Moors, which last have long been dispossessed of them."—Grose, i. 58.

HERBED, s. A Parsee priest, not specially engaged in priestly duties. Pers. hirbad, from Pahlavi aérpat.

1630.—"The Herbood or ordinary Churchman."—Lord's Display, ch. viii.

HICKMAT, s. Ar.—H. hikmat; an ingenious device or contrivance. (See under HAKIM.)

1838.—"The house has been roofed in, and my relative has come up from Meerut, to have the slates put on after some peculiar hikmat of his own."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 240.

HIDGELEE, n.p. The tract so called was under native rule a chakla, or district, of Orissa, and under our rule formerly a milla of Bengal; but now it is a part of the Midnapūr Zilla, of which it constitutes the S.E. portion, viz. the low coast lands on the west side of the Hoogly estuary, and below the junction of the Rūpnārāyan. The name is properly Hijili; but it has gone through many strange phases in European records.

1553.—"The first of these rivers (from the E. side of the Ghauts) rises from two sources to the east of Chaul, about 15 leagues distant, and in an altitude of 18 to 19 degrees. The river from the most northerly of these sources is called Crusna, and the more southerly Benkora, and when they combine they are called Ganga: and this river discharges into the illustrious stream of the Ganges between the two places called Angeli and Picholda in about 22 degrees."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1586.—"An haven which is called Angeli in the Country of Orixá."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 389.

1686.—"Chanock, on the 15th December (1686) . . . burned and destroyed all the magazines of salt, and granaries of rice, which he found in the way between Hughley and the island of Ingelee."—Orme (reprint), ii. 12.

1726.—"Hingeli."—Valentijn, v. 158.

1727.—". . . inhabited by Fishers, as are also Ingellie and Kidgerie (see KEDGE-REE), two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mouth of the Ganges."—A. Hamilton, i. 275; [ed. 1744, ii. 2].

1758.—In apprehension of a French Fleet the Select Committee at Fort William recommend: "That the pagoda at Ingellie should be washed black, the great tree at the place cut down, and the buoys removed."—In Long, 153.

1784.—"Ships laying at Kedgerree, Ingellee, or any other parts of the great River."—In Seton-Karr, i. 37.

HILSA, s. Hind. hilsā, Skt. ilīśa, illīśa; a rich and savoury fish of the shad kind (Clupea ilisha, Day), called in books the 'sable-fish' (a name, from the Port. savel, quite obsolete in India) and on the Indus pulla (palla). The large shad which of late has been commonly sold by London fishmongers in the beginning of summer, is very near the hilsa, but not so rich. The hilsa is a sea-fish, ascending the river to spawn, and is taken as high as Delhi on the Jumna, as high as Mandalay on the Irawadi (Day). It is also taken in the Guzerat rivers, though not in the short and shallow streams of the Concan, nor in the Deccan rivers, from which it seems to be excluded by the rocky obstructions. It is the special fish of Sind under the name of palla, and monopolizes the name of fish, just as salmon does on the Scotch rivers (Dr. Macdonald's Acct. of Bombay Fisheries, 1883).

1539.—". . . A little Island, called Apo-fingua (Ape-Fingan) . . . inhabited by poor people who live by the fishing of shads (que vive de la pescaria dos saveis)."—Pinto (orig. cap. xviii.), Cogan, p. 22.

1810.—"The hilsah (or sable-fish) seems to be midway between a mackerel and a salmon."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 154-5.

1813.—Forbes calls it the sable or salmon-fish, and says "it a little resembles the European fish (salmon) from which it is named."—Or. Mem. i. 53; [2nd ed. i. 36].

1824.—"The fishery, we were told by these people, was of the 'Hilsa' or 'Sable-fish.'"—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 81.

HIMALYA, n.p. This is the common pronunciation of the name of the great range "Whose snowy ridge the roving Tartar bounds," properly Himalāya, 'the Abode of Snow'; also called Himavat, 'the Snowy'; Himagiri and Himaśaila; Himādri, Himakūta, &c., from various forms of which the ancients made Imaus, Emōdus, &c. Pliny had got somewhere the true meaning of the name: ". . . a montibus Hemodis, quorum promontorium Imaus vocatur nivosum significante . . ." (vi. 17). We do not know how far back the use of the modern name is to be found. [The references in early Hindu literature are collected by Atkinson (Hima- layan Gazetteer, ii. 273 seqq..)] We do not find it in Baber, who gives Siwalak as the Indian name of the mountains (see SIWALIK). The oldest occurrence we know of is in the Āin, which gives in the Geographical Tables, under the Third Climate, Koh-i-Himālah (orig. ii. 36); [ed. Jarrett, iii. 69]. This is disguised in Gladwin's version by a wrong reading into Kerlehmaleh (ed. 1800, ii. 367).* This form (Himmaleh) is used by Major Rennell, but hardly as if it was yet a familiar term. In Elphinstone's Letters Himāleh or some other spelling of that form is always used (see below). When we get to Bishop Heber we find Himalaya, the established English form.

1822.—“What pleases me most is the contrast between your present enjoyment, and your former sickness and despondency. Depend upon it England will turn out as well as Hemaleh.”—Elphinstone to Major Close, in Life, ii. 139; see also i. 336, where it is written Himalleh.

HINDEE, s. This is the Pers. adjective form from Hind, ‘India,’ and illustration of its use for a native of India will be found under HINDOO. By Europeans it is most commonly used for those dialects of Hindustani speech which are less modified by P. vocables than the usual Hindustani, and which are spoken by the rural population of the N.W. Provinces and its outskirts. The earliest literary work in Hindi is the great poem of Chand Bardai (c. 1200), which records the deeds of Prithirāja, the last Hindu sovereign of Delhi. [On this literature see Dr. G. A. Grierson, The Modern Vernacular Literature of Hindustān, in J.A.S.B. Part I., 1888.] The term Hinduwi appears to have been formerly used, in the Madras Presidency, for the Marāṭhī language. (See a note in Sir A. Arbuthnot's ed. of Munro's Minutes, i. 133.)

* Hemāchul and Hemakūt also occur in the Āin (see Gladwin, ii. 342, 343; [ed. Jarrett, iii. 80, 81]). Karūchal is the name used by Ibn Batuta in the 14th century, and by Al-Birūnī 300 years earlier. 17th century writers often call the Himālaya the “Mountains of Nuggur-Cote” (q.v.). [Mr. Tawney writes: “We have in Rig Veda (x. 121) im himaranto parvatāh, ‘these snowy mountains,’ spoken of as abiding by the might of Prajāpati. In the Bhagavadgītā, an episode of the Mahābhārata, Krishna says that he is ‘the Himālaya among stable things,’ and the word Himālaya is found in the Kumāra Sambhava of Kālidāsa, about the date of which opinions differ. Perhaps the Greek Imaos is himavat; Ἡμωδός, hīmādri.”]

HINDKĪ, HINDEKĪ, n.p. This modification of the name is applied to people of Indian descent, but converted to Islam, on the Peshawar frontier, and scattered over other parts of Afghanistan. They do the banking business, and hold a large part of the trade in their hands.

[1842.—“The inhabitants of Peshawar are of Indian origin, but speak Pushtoo as well as Hindkee.”—Elphinstone, Caubul, i. 74.]

HINDOO, n.p. P. Hindū. A person of Indian religion and race. This is a term derived from the use of the Mahommedan conquerors (see under INDIA). The word in this form is Persian; Hindī is that used in Arabic, e.g.

c. 940.—“An inhabitant of Mansūra in Sind, among the most illustrious and powerful of that city . . . had brought up a young Indian or Sindian slave (Hindī aw Sindī).”—Mas'ūdī, vi. 264.

In the following quotation from a writer in Persian observe the distinction made between Hindū and Hindī:

c. 1290.—“Whatever live Hindū fell into the King's hands was pounded into bits under the feet of elephants. The Musalmāns, who were Hindīs (country born), had their lives spared.”—Amir Khosrū, in Elliot, iii. 539.

1563.—“. . . moreover if people of Arabia or Persia would ask of the men of this country whether they are Moors or Gentoos, they ask in these words: ‘Art thou Mosalman or Indu?’”—Garcia, f. 137b.

Hindu is often used on the Peshawar frontier as synonymous with bunya (see under BANYAN). A soldier (of the tribes) will say: ‘I am going to the Hindu,’ i.e. to the bunya of the company.

HINDOO KOOSH, n.p. Hindū-Kūsh; a term applied by our geographers to the whole of the Alpine range which separates the basins of the Kabul River and the Helmand from that of the Oxus. It is, as Rennell points out, properly that part of the range immediately north of Kabul, the Caucasus of the historians of Alexander, who crossed and recrossed it somewhere not far from the longitude of that city. The real origin of the name is not known; [the most plausible explanation is perhaps that it is a corruption of Indicus Caucasus]. It is, as far as we know, first used in literature by Ibn Batuta, and the explanation of the name which he gives, however doubtful, is still popular. The name has been by some later writers modified into Hindu Koh (mountain), but this is factitious, and throws no light on the origin of the name.

c. 1334.—“Another motive for our stoppage was the fear of snow; for there is midway on the road a mountain called Hindū-Kūsh, i.e. ‘the Hindu-Killer,’ because so many of the slaves, male and female, brought from India, die in the passage of this mountain, owing to the severe cold and quantity of snow.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 84.

1504.—“The country of Kābul is very strong, and of difficult access. . . . Between Balkh, Kundez, and Badakhshān on the one side, and Kābul on the other, is interposed the mountain of Hindū-kūsh, the passes over which are seven in number.”—Baber, p. 139.

1548.—“From this place marched, and entered the mountains called Hindū-Kush.”—Mem. of Emp. Humayun, 89.

“It was therefore determined to invade Badakhshan . . . The Emperor, passing over the heel of the Hindū-Kush, encamped at Shergirān.”—Tabakāt-i-Akbarī, in Elliot, v. 223.

1753.—“Les montagnes qui donnent naissance à l’Indus, et à plusieurs des rivières qu’il reçoit, se nomment Hendou Kesh, et c’est l’histoire de Timur qui m’instruit de cette denomination. Elle est composée du nom d’Hendou ou Hind, qui désigne l’Inde . . . et de kush ou kesh . . . que je remarque être propre à diverses montagnes.”—D’Anville, p. 16.

1793.—“The term Hindoo-Kho, or Hindoo-Kush, is not applied to the ridge throughout its full extent; but seems confined to that part of it which forms the N.W. boundary of Cabul; and this is the INDIAN CAUCASUS of Alexander.”—Rennell, Mem. 3rd ed. 150.

1817.—“ . . . those Who dwell beyond the everlasting snows
Of Hindoo Koosh, in stormy freedom bred.”—Mokanna.

HINDOSTAN, n.p. Pers. Hindū-stān. (a) ‘The country of the Hindūs,’ India. In modern native parlance this word indicates distinctively (b) India north of the Nerbudda, and exclusive of Bengal and Behar. The latter provinces are regarded as pūrb (see POORUB), and all south of the Nerbudda as Dakhan (see DECCAN). But the word is used in older Mahom-edan authors just as it is used in English school-books and atlases, viz. as (a) the equivalent of India Proper. Thus Baber says of Hindustān: “On the East, the South, and the West it is bounded by the Ocean” (310).

1553.—“ . . . and so the Persian nation adjacent to it give it as at present its proper name that of Indostān.”—Barros, I. iv. 7.

1563.—“ . . . and common usage in Persia, and Coraçone, and Arabia, and Turkey, calls this country Industam . . . for istām is as much as to say ‘region,’ and indu ‘India.’” —Garcia, f. 137b.

In the following stanza of the good bishop’s the application is apparently the same; but the accentuation is excruciating—‘Hindóstan,’ as if rhyming to ‘Boston.’

Collectors, and officers writing the proceedings of Courts-Martial, and all Staff Officers, to indite their various papers in English, larded with as small a portion of the to him unknown tongues as they conveniently can, instead of those he generally receives—namely, papers written in Hindostanee larded with occasional words in English.

"Any Indent made for English Dictionaries shall be duly attended to, if such be in the stores at Kurrachee; if not, gentlemen who have forgotten the vulgar tongue are requested to procure the requisite assistance from England." — GG. OO., by Sir Charles Napier, 85.

HING, s. Asafoetida. Skt. hingu, Hind. hīng, Dakh. hīngu. A repulsively smelling gum-resin which forms a favourite Hindu condiment, and is used also by Europeans in Western and Southern India as an ingredient in certain cakes eaten with curry. (See POPPER-CAKE). This product affords a curious example of the uncertainty which sometimes besets the origin of drugs which are the objects even of a large traffic. Hanbury and Flückiger, whilst describing Falconer's Narthex Asafoetida (Ferula Narthex, Boiss.) and Scorodosma foetidum, Bunge; (F. asafoetida, Boiss.) two umbelliferous plants, both cited as the source of this drug, say that neither has been proved to furnish the asafoetida of commerce. Yet the plant producing it has been described and drawn by Kaempfer, who saw the gum-resin collected in the Persian Province of Lāristān (near the eastern shore of the P. Gulf); and in recent years (1857) Surgeon-Major Bellew has described the collection of the drug near Kandahar. Asafoetida has been identified with the σλφιον or laserpitium of the ancients. The substance is probably yielded not only by the species mentioned above, but by other allied plants, e.g. Ferula Jaeschki- ana, Vatke, of Kashmir and Turkistan. The hing of the Bombay market is the produce of F. alliacea, Boiss. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 328 seqq.]

c. 645.—"This kingdom of Tsao-kiu-tcha (Tsāukūta?) has about 7000 li of compass,—the compass of the capital called Ho-si-nu (Ghazna) is 30 li. . . . The soil is favourable to the plant Yō-Kin (Curcuma, or turmeric) and to that called Hing-kiu."—Pèlerin's Boudd., iii. 187.

1563.—"A Portuguese in Bisnagar had a horse of great value, but which exhibited a deal of flatulence, and on that account the King would not buy it. The Portuguese cured it by giving it this ymgu mixt with flour: the King then bought it, finding it thoroughly well, and asked him how he had cured it. When the man said it was with ymgu, the King replied: 'Tis nothing then to marvel at, for you have given it to eat the food of the gods' (or, as the poets say, nectar). Whereupon the Portuguese made answer sotto voce and in Portuguese: 'Better call it the food of the devils!'—Garcia, f. 21b. HODGETT, s. This is used among the English in Turkey and Egypt for a title-deed of land. It is Arabic hujjat, ‘evidence.’ Hojat, perhaps a corruption of the same word, is used in Western India for an account current between landlord and tenant. [Molesworth, Mahr. Dict., gives “Hujjat, Ar., a Government acknowledgment or receipt.”]

[1871.—“... the Kadee attends, and writes a document (hogget-el-buhr) to attest the fact of the river's having risen to the height sufficient for the opening of the Canal. ...”—Lane, Mod. Egypt., 5th ed. ii. 233.]

[1895.—“Between the tree-stems he heard a hog-bear digging hard in the moist warm earth.”—R. Kipling, The Jungle Book, 171.]

HOG-DEER, s. The Anglo-Indian popular name of the Axis porcinus, Jerd.; [Cervus porcinus (Blanford, Mammalia, 549)], the Pārd of Hindustan. The name is nearly the same as that which Cosmas (c. 545) applies to an animal (Χαρέλαφος) which he draws (see under BABI-ROUSSA), but the two have no other relation. The Hog-deer is abundant in the grassy openings of forests throughout the Gangetic valley and further east. “It runs with its head low, and in a somewhat ungainly manner; hence its popular appellation."—Jerdon, Mammals, 263.

[1885.—"Two hog-deer were brought forward, very curious-shaped animals that I had never seen before."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 146.]

HOG-PLUM, s. The austere fruit of the amrd (Hind.), Spondias mangifera, Pers. (Ord. Terebinthaceae), is sometimes so called; also called the wild mango. It is used in curries, pickles, and tarts. It is a native of various parts of India, and is cultivated in many tropical climates.

1852.—"The Karens have a tradition that in those golden days when God dwelt with men, all nations came before him on a certain day, each with an offering from the fruits of their lands, and the Karens selected the hog's plum for this oblation; which gave such offence that God cursed the Karen nation and placed it lowest. . . ."—Mason's Burmah, ed. 1860, p. 461.

HOKCHEW, HOKSIEU, AU-CHEO, etc., n.p. These are forms which the names of the great Chinese port of Fuh-chau, the capital of Fuh-kien, takes in many old works. They, in fact, imitate the pronunciation in the Fuh-kien dialect, which is Hok-chiu; Fuh-kien similarly being called Hoh-kien.

1585.—"After they had travelled more than halfe a league in the suburbs of the cittie of Aucheo, they met with a post that came from the vizroy."—Mendoza, ii. 78.

1616.—"Also this day arrived a small China bark or soma from Hochchew, laden with silk and stuffes."—Cocks, i. 219.

HOME. In Anglo-Indian and colonial speech this means England.

1837.—"Home always means England; nobody calls India home—not even those who have been here thirty years or more, and are never likely to return to Europe."—Letters from Madras, 92.

1865.—"You may perhaps remember how often in times past we debated, with a seriousness becoming the gravity of the subject, what article of food we should each of us respectively indulge in, on our first arrival at home."—Waring, Tropical Resident, 154.

So also in the West Indies :

c. 1830.—". . . 'Oh, your cousin Mary, I forgot—fine girl, Tom—may do for you at home yonder' (all Creoles speak of England as home, although they may never have seen it)."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 238.

HONG, s. The Chinese word is hang, meaning 'a row or rank'; a house of business; at Canton a warehouse, a factory, and particularly applied to the establishments of the European nations ("Foreign Hong"), and to those of the so-called "Hong-Merchants." These were a body of merchants who had the monopoly of trade with foreigners, in return for which privilege they became security for the good behaviour of the foreigners, and for their payment of dues. The guild of these merchants was called 'The Hong.' The monopoly seems to have been first established about 1720-30, and it was terminated under the Treaty of Nanking, in 1842. The Hong merchants are of course not mentioned in Lockyer (1711), nor by A. Hamilton (in China previous to and after 1700, pubd. 1727). The latter uses the word, however, and the rudiments of the institution may be traced not only in this narrative, but in that of Ibn Batuta.

c. 1346.—"When a Musulman trader arrives in a Chinese city, he is allowed to choose whether he will take up his quarters with one of the merchants of his own faith settled in the country, or will go to an inn. If he prefers to go and lodge with a merchant, they count all his money and confide it to the merchant of his choice; the latter then takes charge of all expenditure on account of the stranger's wants, but acts with perfect integrity. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 265-6.

1727.—"When I arrived at Canton the Hapoa (see HOPPO) ordered me lodgings for myself, my Men, and Cargo, in (a) Haung or Inn belonging to one of his Merchants . . . and when I went abroad, I had always some Servants belonging to the Haung to follow me at a Distance."—A. Hamilton, ii. 227; [ed. 1744].

1782.—". . . l'Opeou (see HOPPO) . . . s'embarque en grande ceremonie dans une galère pavoisée, emmenant ordinairement avec lui trois ou quatre Hanistes."—Sonnerat, ii. 236.

" . . . Les loges Européennes s'appellent hams."—Ibid. 245.

1783.—"It is stated indeed that a monopolizing Company in Canton, called the Cohong, had reduced commerce there to a desperate state."—Report of Com. on Affairs of India, Burke, vi. 461.

1797.—"A Society of Hong, or united merchants, who are answerable for one another, both to the Government and the foreign nations."—Sir G. Staunton, Embassy to China, ii. 565.

1882.—"The Hong merchants (or the Co-hong) of a body corporate, 1720."—The Fantoms at Canton

Cohong is, we believe, though speaking with diffidence, an exogamous union between the Latin co- and the Chinese hong. [Mr. G. T. Gardner confirms this explanation, and writes: "The term used in Canton itself is invariable: 'The Thirteen Hong,' or 'The Thirteen Firms'; and as these thirteen firms formed an association that had at one time the monopoly of the foreign trade, and as they were collectively responsible to the Chinese Government for the conduct of the trade, and to the foreign merchants for goods supplied to any one of the firms, some collective expression was required to denote the co-operation of the Thirteen Firms, and the word Co-hang, I presume, was found most expressive."]

HONG-BOAT, s. A kind of sampan (q.v.) or boat, with a small wooden house in the middle, used by foreigners at Canton. "A public passenger-boat (all over China, I believe) is called Hang-chwen, where chwen is generically 'vessel,' and hang is perhaps used in the sense of 'plying regularly.' Boats built for this purpose, used as private boats by merchants and others, probably gave the English name Hong-boat to those used by our countrymen at Canton" (Note by Bp. Moule).

[1878.—"The Koong-Sze Teng, or Hong-Mee-Teng, or hong boats are from thirty to forty feet in length, and are somewhat like the gondolas of Venice. They are in many instances carved and gilded, and the saloon is so spacious as to afford sitting room for eight or ten persons. Aft the saloon there is a cabin for the boatmen. The boats are propelled by a large scull, which works on a pivot made fast in the stern post."—Gray, China, ii. 273.]

HONG KONG, n.p. The name of this flourishing settlement is hiang-kiang, 'fragrant waterway' (Bp. Moule).

HONORE, ONORE, n.p. Hondvar, a town and port of Canara, of ancient standing and long of piratical repute. The etymology is unknown to us (see what Barbosa gives as the native name below). [A place of the same name in the Bellary District is said to be Can. Honnūru, honnu, 'gold,' ūru, 'village.'] Vincent has supposed it to be the Náoupa of the Periplus, "the first part of the pepper-country Λιμυρικὴ,"—for which read Διμυρικὴ, the Tamil country or Malabar. But this can hardly be accepted, for Honore is less than 5000 stadia from Barygaza, instead of being 7000 as it ought to be by the Periplus, nor is it in the Tamil region. The true Náoupa must have been Cannanore, or Pudopatana, a little south of the last. [The Madras Gloss. explains Náoupa as the country of the Nairs.] The long defence of Honore by Captain Torriano, of the Bombay Artillery, against the forces of Tippoo, in 1783-1784, is one of the most noble records of the Indian army. (See an account of it in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109 seqq.; [2nd ed. ii. 455 seqq.]).

c. 1343.—"Next day we arrived at the city of Hinaur, beside a great estuary which big ships enter. . . . The women of Hinaur are beautiful and chaste . . . they all know the Kurān al-'Azīm by heart. I saw at Hinaur 13 schools for the instruction of girls and 23 for boys,—such a thing as I have seen nowhere else. The inhabitants of Maleibār pay the Sultan . . . a fixed annual sum from fear of his maritime power."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 65-67.

1516.—". . . there is another river on which stands a good town called Honor; the inhabitants use the language of the country, and the Malabars call it Ponou-aram (or Ponaram, in Ramusio); here the Malabars carry on much traffic. . . . In this town of Onor are two Gentoo corsairs patronised by the Lord of the Land, one called Timoja and the other Raogy, each of whom has 5 or 6 very big ships with large and well-armed crews."—Barbosa, Lisbon, ed. 291.

1553.—"This port (Onor) and that of Baticalá . . . belonged to the King of Bisnaga, and to this King of Onor his tributary, and these ports, less than 40 years before were the most famous of all that coast, not only for the fertility of the soil and its abundance in provisions . . . but for being the ingress and egress of all merchandize for the kingdom of Bisnaga, from which the King had a great revenue; and principally of horses from Arabia. . . ."—Barros, I. viii. cap. x. [And see P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 202; Comm. Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. i. 148.]

HOGLY, HOOHLEY, n.p. Properly Hūgli, [and said to take its name from Beng. hoglā, 'the elephant grass' (Typha angustifolia)]: a town on the right bank of the Western Delta Branch of the Ganges, that which has long been known from this place as the Hoogly River, and on which Calcutta also stands, on the other bank, and 25 miles nearer the sea. Hoogly was one of the first places occupied says: "There was a dinner party in the evening (at Agra), mostly civilians, as I quickly discovered by their hugas. I have never seen the huga smoked save at Delhi and Agra, except by a very old general officer at Calcutta." (Life in the Mission, ii. 196). In 1837 Miss Eden says: "the aides-de-camp and doctor get their newspapers and hookahs in a cluster on their side of the street." (Up the Country, i. 70). The rules for the Calcutta Subscription Dances in 1792 provide: "That hookers be not admitted to the ball room during any part of the night. But hookers might be admitted to the supper rooms, to the card rooms, to the boxes in the theatre, and to each side of the assembly room, between the large pillars and the walls."—Carey, Good Old Days, i. 98.] "In former days it was a dire offence to step over another person's hooka-carpet and hooka-snake. Men who did so intentionally were called out." (M.-Gen. Keatinge).

1768. — "This last Season I have been without Company (except that of my Pipe or Hooker), and when employed in the innocent diversion of smoaking it, have often thought of you, and Old England."—M.S. Letter of James Rennell, July 1.

1782. — "When he observes that the gentlemen introduce their hookas and smook in the company of ladies, why did he not add that the mixture of sweet-scented Persian tobacco, sweet herbs, coarse sugar, spice, etc., which they inhale . . . comes through clean water, and is so very pleasant, that many ladies take the tube, and draw a little of the smook into their mouths."—Price's Tracts, vol. i. p. 78.

1783. — "For my part, in thirty years' residence, I never could find out one single luxury of the East, so much talked of here, except sitting in an arm-chair, smoaking a hooka, drinking cool water (when I could get it), and wearing clean linen."—(Jos. Price), Some Observations on a late Publication, &c., 79.

1789. — "When the cloth is removed, all the servants except the hookerbedar retire, and make way for the sea breeze to circulate, which is very refreshing to the Company, whilst they drink their wine, and smoke the hooker, a machine not easily described. . . ."—Munro's Narrative, 53.

HOOLUCK, s. Beng. hūlak? The word is not in the Dicts., [but it is possibly connected with ulūk, Skt. ulūka, 'an owl,' both bird and animal taking their name from their wailing note]. The black gibbon (Hylobates hoolook, Jerd.; [Blanford, Mammalia, 5]), not unfrequently tamed on our E. frontier, and from its gentle engaging ways, and plaintive cries, often becoming a great pet. In the forests of the Kasia Hills, when there was neither sound nor sign of a living creature, by calling out hoo! hoo! one sometimes could wake a clamour in response from the hoolucks, as if hundreds had suddenly started to life, each shouting hoo! hoo! hoo! at the top of his voice.

c. 1809. — "The Hulluks live in considerable herds; and although exceedingly noisy, it is difficult to procure a view, their activity in springing from tree to tree being very great; and they are very shy." — Buchanan's Rungpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 563.

1868.—“Our only captive this time was a huluq monkey, a shy little beast, and very rarely seen or caught. They have black fur with white breasts, and go about usually in pairs, swinging from branch to branch with incredible agility, and making the forest resound with their strange cachinatory cry. . . .”—T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 374.

1884.—“He then . . . describes a gibbon he had (not an historian nor a book, but a specimen of Hylobates hooluck) who must have been wholly delightful. This engaging anthropoid used to put his arm through Mr. Sterndale's, was extremely clean in his habits ('which,' says Mr. Sterndale thoughtfully and truthfully, 'cannot be said of all the monkey tribe'), and would not go to sleep without a pillow. Of course he died of consumption. The gibbon, however, as a pet has one weakness, that of 'howling in a piercing and somewhat hysterical fashion for some minutes till exhausted.'”—Saty. Review, May 31, on Sterndale's Nat. Hist. of Mammalia of India, &c.

HOOLY, s. Hind. holī (Skt. holakā), [perhaps from the sound made in singing]. The spring festival, held at the approach of the vernal equinox, during the 10 days preceding the full moon of the month Phālguna. It is a sort of carnival in honour of Kṛishna and the milkmaids. Passers-by are chaffed, and pelted with red powder, or drenched with yellow liquids from squirts. Songs, mostly obscene, are sung in praise of Kṛishna, and dances performed round fires. In Bengal the feast is called dol jatra, or 'Swing-cradle festival.' [On the idea underlying the rite, see Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. iii. 306 seq.]

c. 1590.—“Here is also a place called Cheramutty, where, during the feast of the Hooly, flames issue out of the ground in a most astonishing manner.”—Gladwin's Ayeen Akbery, ii. 34; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 173].

[1671.—“In Feb. or March they have a feast the Romanists call Carnival, the Indians Whoolye.”—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxiv.]

1673.—“. . . their Hooly, which is at their other Seed-Time.”—Fryer, 180.

1727.—“One (Feast) they kept on Sight of a New Moon in February, exceeded the rest in ridiculous Actions and Expense; and this they called the Feast of Wooly, who was . . . a fierce fellow in a War with some Giants that infested Sindy. . . .”—A. Hamilton, i. 128; [ed. 1744, i. 129].

1808.—“I have delivered your message to Mr. H. about April day, but he says he understands the learned to place the Hooly as according with May day, and he believes they have no occasion in India to set apart a particular day in the year for the manufacture. . . .”—Letter from Mrs. Halked to W. Hastings, in Cal. Review, xxvi. 93.

1809.—“. . . We paid the Muha Raj (Sindhia) the customary visit at the Hohlee. Everything was prepared for playing; but at Captain C.'s particular request, that part of the ceremony was dispensed with. Playing the Hohlee consists in throwing about a quantity of flour, made from a water-nut called singara, and dyed with red sanders; it is called abeer; and the principal sport is to cast it into the eyes, mouth, and nose of the players, and to splash them all over with water tinged of an orange colour with the flowers of the dak (see DHAWK) tree.”—Broughton's Letters, p. 87; [ed. 1892, p. 65 seq.].

HOON, s. A gold Pagoda (coin), q.v. Hind. hūn, “perhaps from Canar. honnu (gold)”—Wilson. [See Rice, Mysore, i. 801.]

1647.—“A wonderfully large diamond from a mine in the territory of Golkonda had fallen into the hands of Kutbu-l-Mulk; whereupon an order was issued, directing him to forward the same to Court; when its estimated value would be taken into account as part of the two lacs of huns which was the stipulated amount of his annual tribute.”—Indyat Khan, in Elliot, vii. 84.

1879.—“In Exhibit 320 Ramji engages to pay five hons (=Rs. 20) to Vithoba, besides paying the Government assessment.”—Bombay High Court Judgment, Jan. 27, p. 121.

HOONDY, s. Hind. hundī, hundavī; Mahr. and Guj. hundī. A bill of exchange in a native language.

1810.—“Hoondies (i.e. bankers' drafts) would be of no use whatever to them.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 530.

HOONIMAUN, s. The great ape; also called Lungoor.

1653.—“Hermant est vn singe que les Indou tiennent pour Saint.”—De la Boulaye-le-Goux, p. 541.

HOOWA. A peculiar call (hūwa) used by the Singhalese, and thence applied to the distance over which this call can be heard. Compare the Australian coo-ee.

HOPPER, s. A colloquial term in S. India for cakes (usually of rice-flour), somewhat resembling the wheaten chupatties (q.v.) of Upper India. It is the Tamil appam, [from appu, 'to clap with the hand.' In Bombay the form used is ap.]

1582.—“Thus having talked a while, he gave him very good entertainment, and commanded to give him certaine cakes, made of the flower of Wheate, which the Malabars do call Apes, and with the same honnie."—Castañeda (by N.L.), f. 38.

1606.—"Great dishes of apas."—Gouvea, f. 48v.

1672.—"These cakes are called Apen by the Malabars."—Baldaeus, Afgoderye (Dutch ed.), 39.

c. 1690.—"Ex iis (the chestnuts of the Jack fruit) in sole siccatis farinam, ex eaque placentas, apas dictas, conficiunt."—Rheede, iii.

1707.—"Those who bake oppers without permission will be subject to severe penalty."—Thesavaleme (Tamil Laws of Jaffna), 700.

[1826.—"He sat down beside me, and shared between us his coarse brown aps."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 81.]

1860.—"Appas (called hoppers by the English) . . . supply their morning repast."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 161.

HOPPO, s. The Chinese Superintendent of Customs at Canton. Giles says: "The term is said to be a corruption of Hoo poo, the Board of Revenue, with which office the Hoppo, or Collector of duties, is in direct communication." Dr. Williams gives a different account (see below). Neither affords much satisfaction. [The N.E.D. accepts the account given in the quotation from Williams.]

1711.—"The Hoppos, who look on Europe Ships as a great Branch of their Profits, will give you all the fair words imaginable."—Lockyer, 101.

1727.—"I have staid about a Week, and found no Merchants come near me, which made me suspect, that there were some underhand dealings between the Hapoa and his Chaps, to my Prejudice."—A. Hamilton, ii. 228; [ed. 1744, ii. 227]. (See also under HONG.)

1743.—". . . just as he (Mr. Anson) was ready to embark, the Hoppo or Chinese Custom-house officer of Macao refused to grant a permit to the boat."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. 1756, p. 355.

1750-52.—"The hoppo, happa, or first inspector of customs . . . came to see us to-day."—Osbeck, i. 359.

1782.—"La charge d'Opeou répond à celle d'intendant de province."—Sonnerat, ii. 236.

1797.—". . . the Hoppo or mandarine more immediately connected with Europeans."—Sir G. Staunton, i. 239.

1842 (?).—"The term hoppo is confined to Canton, and is a corruption of the term hoi-po-sho, the name of the officer who has control over the boats on the river, strangely applied to the Collector of Customs by foreigners."—Wells Williams, Chinese Commercial Guide, 221.

[1878.—"The second board or tribunal is named hoopoo, and to it is entrusted the care and keeping of the imperial revenue."—Gray, China, i. 19.]

1882.—"It may be as well to mention here that the 'Hoppo' (as he was incorrectly styled) filled an office especially created for the foreign trade at Canton. . . . The Board of Revenue is in Chinese 'Hoo-poo,' and the office was locally misapplied to the officer in question."—The Fankwa at Canton, p. 36.

HORSE-KEEPER, s. An old provincial English term, used in the Madras Presidency and in Ceylon, for 'groom.' The usual corresponding words are, in N. India, syce (q.v.), and in Bombay ghordwāla (see GORAWALLAH).

1555.—"There in the reste of the Cophine made for the nones thei bewrie one of his diereſt lemmans, a waityng manne, a Cooke, a Horse-keeper, a Lacquie, a Butler, and a Horse, whiche thei al at first strangle, and thruste in."—W. Watreman, Fardle of Faciouns, N. 1.

1609.—"Watermen, Lackeyes, Horse-keepers."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 216.

1673.—"On St. George's Day I was commanded by the Honourable Gerald Aungier . . . to embarque on a Bombaim Boat . . . waited on by two of the Governor's servants . . . an Horsekeeper. . . ."—Fryer, 123.

1698.—". . . followed by his boy . . . and his horsekeeper."—In Wheeler, i. 300.

1829.—"In my English buggy, with lamps lighted and an English sort of a nag, I might almost have fancied myself in England, but for the black horse-keeper alongside of me."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 87.

1837.—"Even my horse pretends he is too fine to switch off his own flies with his own long tail, but turns his head round to order the horsekeeper . . . to wipe them off for him."—Letters from Madras, 50.

HORSE-RADISH TREE, s. This is a common name, in both N. and S. India, for the tree called in Hind. sa-hajnd; Moringa pterygosperma, Gaertn., Hyperanthera Moringa, Vahl. (N. O. Moringaceae), in Skt. sobhānjana. Sir G. Birdwood says: "A marvellous tree botanically, as no one knows in what order to put it; it has links with so many; and it is evidently a 'head-centre' in the progressive development of forms." The name is given because the scraped root is used in place of horse-radish, which it closely resembles in flavour. In S. India the same plant is called the Drumstick-tree (q.v.), from the shape of the long slender fruit, which is used as a vegetable, or in curry, or made into a native pickle

"most nauseous to Europeans" (Punjab Plants). It is a native of N.W. India, and also extensively cultivated in India and other tropical countries, and is used also for many purposes in the native pharmacopœia. [See MYROBALAN.]

HOSBOLHOOKUM, &c. Properly (Ar. used in Hind.) hasb-ul-hukm, literally 'according to order'; these words forming the initial formula of a document issued by officers of State on royal authority, and thence applied as the title of such a document.

[1678.—"Had it bin another King, as Shahjehawn, whose phirmaund (see FIRMAUN) and hasbullhookims were of such great force and binding."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xlv.]

"... the other given in the 10th year of Oranzeeb, for the English to pay 2 per cent. at Surat, which the Mogul interpreted by his order, and Husbull Hookum (il est, a word of command by word of mouth) to his Devan in Bengall, that the English were to pay 2 per cent. custom at Surat, and in all other his dominions to be custom free."—Fl. St. Geo. Consns., 17th Dec., in Notes and Exts., Pt. I. pp. 97-98.

1702.—"The Nabob told me that the great God knows that he had ever a hearty respect for the English . . . saying, here is the Hosbulhocum, which the king has sent me to seize Factories and all their effects."—In Wheeler, i. 387.

1727.—"The Phirmaund is presented (by the Goosberdaar (Goorzburdar), or Hosbalhouckain, or, in English, the King's Messenger) and the Governor of the Province or City makes a short speech."—A. Hamilton, i. 230; [ed. 1744, i. 233].

1757.—"This Treaty was conceived in the following Terms. I. Whatever Rights and Privileges the King had granted the English Company, in their Phirmaund, and the Hushulhoorums (sic), sent from Delly, shall not be disputed."—Mem. of the Revolution in Bengal, pp. 21-22.

1759.—"Housbul-hookum (under the great seal of the Nabob Vizier, Ulmah Maleck, Nizam al Muluck Bahadour. Be peace unto the high and renowned Mr. John Spencer . . ."—In Cambridge's Acct. of the War, &c., 229.

1761.—"A grant signed by the Mogul is called a Phirmaund (farmān). By the Mogul's Son, a Nushawn (nishān). By the Nabob a Perwanna (parwāna). By the Vizier, a Housebul-hookum."—Ibid. 226.

1769.—"Besides it is obvious, that as great a sum might have been drawn from that Company without affecting property . . . or running into his golden dream of cockets on the Ganges, or visions of Stamp duties, Perwannas, Dusticks, Kistbundeas and Hasbulhookums."—Burke, Obsns. on a late

Publication called "The Present State of the Nation."

HOT-WINDS, s. This may almost be termed the name of one of the seasons of the year in Upper India, when the hot dry westerly winds prevail, and such aids to coolness as the tatty and thermantidote (q.v.) are brought into use. May is the typical month of such winds.

1804.—"Holkar appears to me to wish to avoid the contest at present; and so does Gen. Lake, possibly from a desire to give his troops some repose, and not to expose the Europeans to the hot winds in Hindustan."—Wellington, iii. 180.

1873.—"It's no use thinking of lunch in this roaring hot wind that's getting up, so we shall be all light and fresh for another shy at the pigs this afternoon."—The True Reformer, i. p. 8.

HOWDAH, vulg. HOWDER, &c., s. Hind. modified from Ar. haudaj. A great chair or framed seat carried by an elephant. The original Arabic word haudaj is applied to litters carried by camels.

c. 1663.—"At other times he rideth on an Elephant in a Mik-dember or Hauze . . . the Mik-dember being a little square House or Turret of Wood, is always painted and gilded; and the Hauze, which is an Oval seat, having a Canopy with Pillars over it, is so likewise."—Bernier, E.T. 119; [ed. Constable, 370].

c. 1785.—"Colonel Smith . . . reviewed his troops from the hondar of his elephant."—Carraccioli's L. of Clive, iii. 133.

A popular rhyme which was applied in India successively to Warren Hastings' escape from Benares in 1781, and to Col. Monson's retreat from Malwa in 1804, and which was perhaps much older than either, runs:

"Ghore par hauda, hāthī par jīn
Jaldī bhāg-gāyā { Warren Hastīn!
Kornail Munsīn!"

which may be rendered with some anachronism in expression:

"Horses with howdahs, and elephants saddled
Off helter skelter the Sahibs skedaddled."

[1805.—"Houza, howda." See under AMBAREE.]

1831.—

"And when they talked of Elephants,
And riding in my Howder,
(So it was called by all my aunts)
I prouder grew and prouder."

H. M. Parker, in Bengal Annual, 1830.

1856.—

"But she, the gallant lady, holding fast
With one soft arm the jewelled howdah's side,
Still with the other circles tight the babe
Sore smitten by a cruel shaft . . ."

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

1863.—"Elephants are also liable to be disabled . . . ulcers arise from neglect or carelessness in fitting on the howdah."—Sat. Review, Sept. 6, 312.

HUBBA, s. A grain ; a jot or tittle.
Ar. habba.

1786—"For two years we have not received a hubba on account of our tunkaw, though the ministers have annually charged a lac of rupees, and never paid us anything."—In Art. agst. Hastings, Burke, vii. 141.

[1836.—"The habbeh (or grain of barley) is the 48th part of dirhem, or third of a keerat . . . or in commerce fully equal to an English grain."—Lane, Mod. Egypt., ii. 326.]

HUBBLE-BUBBLE, s. An onomatopoeia applied to the hooka in its rudimentary form, as used by the masses in India. Tobacco, or a mixture containing tobacco amongst other things, is placed with embers in a terra-cotta chillum (q.v.), from which a reed carries the smoke into a coconut shell half full of water, and the smoke is drawn through a hole in the side, generally without any kind of mouth-piece, making a bubbling or gurgling sound. An elaborate description is given in Terry's Voyage (see below), and another in Govinda Samanta, i. 29 (1872).

1616.—". . . they have little Earthen Pots . . . having a narrow neck and an open round top, out of the belly of which comes a small spout, to the lower part of which spout they fill the Pot with water: then putting their Tobacco loose in the top, and a burning coal upon it, they having first fastened a very small strait hollow Cane or Reed . . . within that spout . . . the Pot standing on the ground, draw that smoke into their mouths, which first falls upon the Superficies of the water, and much discolours it. And this way of taking their Tobacco, they believe makes it much more cool and wholsom."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 363.

c. 1630.—"Tobacco is of great account here; not strong (as our men love), but weak and leafie; suckt out of long canes call'd hubble-bubbles . . ."—Sir. T. Herbert, 28.

1673.—"Coming back I found my troublesome Comrade very merry, and packing up his Household Stuff, his Bang bowl, and Hubble-bubble, to go along with me."—Fryer, 127.

1673.—". . . bolstered up with embroidered Cushions, smoaking out of a silver Hubble-bubble."—Fryer, 131.

1697.—". . . Yesterday the King's Dewan, and this day the King's Buxee . . . arrived . . . to each of whom sent two bottles of Rose-water, and a glass Hubble-bubble, with a compliment."—In Wheeler, i. 318.

c. 1760.—See Grose, i. 146.

1811.—"Cette manière de fumer est extrêmement commune . . . on la nomme Hubbel de Bubbel."—Solvy's, tom. iii.

1868.—"His (the Dyak's) favourite pipe is a huge Hubble-bubble."—Wallace, Mal. Archip., ed. 1880, p. 80.

HUBSHEE, n.p. Ar. Habashī, P. Habshī, 'an Abyssinian,' an Ethiopian, a negro. The name is often specifically applied to the chief of Jinjira on the western coast, who is the descendant of an Abyssinian family.

1298.—"There are numerous cities and villages in this province of Abash, and many merchants."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 425.

[c. 1346.—"Habashis." See under COLOMBO.]

1553.—"At this time, among certain Moors, who came to sell provisions to the ships, had come three Abeshis (Abexijs) of the country of the Prester John . . ."—Barros, I. iv. 4.

[1612.—"Sent away the Thomas towards the Habash coast."—Danvers, Letters, i. 166; "The Habesh shore."—Ibid. i. 131.

[c. 1661.—". . . on my way to Gonder, the capital of Habech, or Kingdom of Ethiopia."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 2.]

1673.—"Cowis Cawn, an Hobsy or Arabian Coffery (Caffer)."—Fryer, 147.

1681.—"Habessini . . . nunc passim nominantur; vocabulo ab Arabibus indito, quibus Habesh colluviam vel mixturam gentium denotat."—Ludolphi, Hist. Aethiop. lib. i. c. i.

1750-60.—"The Moors are also fond of having Abyssinian slaves known in India by the name of Hobahy Coffrees."—Grose, i. 148.

1789.—"In India Negroes, Habissinians, Nobis (i.e. Nubians) &c. &c. are promiscuously called Habashies or Habissians, although the two latter are no negroes; and the Nobies and Habashes differ greatly from one another."—Note to Seir Mutagherin, iii. 36.

[1813.—". . . the master of a family adopts a slave, frequently a Haffshee Abyssinian, of the darkest hue, for his heir."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 473.]

1884.—"One of my Tibetan ponies had short curly brown hair, and was called both by my servants, and by Dr. Campbell, 'a Hubahee.'

1840.—“The hamals groaned under the weight of their precious load, the Apostle of the Ganges” (Dr. Duff to wit).—Smith's Life of Dr. John Wilson, 1878, p. 282.

1877.—“The stately iron gate enclosing the front garden of the Russian Embassy was beset by a motley crowd. . . . Hamals, or street porters, bent double under the burden of heavy trunks and boxes, would come now and then up one or other of the two semicircular avenues.”—Letter from Constantinople, in Times, May 7.

HUMMING-BIRD, s. This name is popularly applied in some parts of India to the sun-birds (sub-fam. Nectariniinae).

HUMP, s. ‘Calcutta humps’ are the salted humps of Indian oxen exported from that city. (See under BUFFALO.)

HURCARA, HIRCARA, &c., s. Hind. harkārā, ‘a messenger, a courier; an emissary, a spy’ (Wilson). The etymology, according to the same authority, is har, ‘every,’ kār, ‘business.’ The word became very familiar in the Gilchristian spelling Hurkaru, from the existence of a Calcutta newspaper bearing that title (Bengal Hurkaru, generally enunciated by non-Indians as Hurkēroō), for the first 60 years of last century, or thereabouts.

1747.—“Given to the Ircaras for bringing news of the Engagement. (Pag.) 4 3 0.”—Fort St David, Expenses of the Paymaster, under January. MS. Records in India Office.

1748.—“The city of Dacca is in the utmost confusion on account of . . . advices of a large force of Mahrattas coming by way of the Sunderbunds, and that they were advanced as far as Sundra Col, when first descried by their Hurcurrahs.”—In Long, 4.

1757.—“I beg you to send me a good alcara who understands the Portuguese language.”—Letter in Ives, 159.

“Hircars or Spies.”—Ibid. 161; [and comp. 67].

1761.—“The head Harcar returned, and told me this as well as several other secrets very useful to me, which I got from him by dint of money and some rum.”—Letter of Capt. Martin White, in Long, 260.

[1772.—“Hercarras.” (See under DALO-YET.)]

1780.—“One day upon the march a Hircarrah came up and delivered him a letter from Colonel Baillie.”—Letter of T. Munro, in Life, i. 26.

1803.—“The hircarras reported the enemy to be at Bokerdun.”—Letter of A. Wellesley, ibid. 348.

c. 1810.—“We were met at the entrance of Tippoo’s dominions by four hircarrahs, or soldiers, whom the Sultan sent as a guard to conduct us safely.”—Miss Edgeworth, Lane Jervas. Miss Edgeworth has oddly misused the word here.

1813.—“The contrivances of the native halcarrahs and spies to conceal a letter are extremely clever, and the measures they frequently adopt to elude the vigilance of an enemy are equally extraordinary.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 129; [compare 2nd ed. i. 64; ii. 201].

HURTAUL, s. Hind. from Skt. hari-talaka, hartāl, haritāl, yellow arsenic, orpiment.

c. 1347.—Ibn Batuta seems oddly to confound it with camphor. “The best (camphor) called in the country itself al-hardāla, is that which attains the highest degree of cold.”—iv. 241.

c. 1759.—“. . . hartal and Cotch, Earth-Oil and Wood-Oil. . . .”—List of Burmese Products, in Dalrymple's Or. Reper. i. 109.

HUZĀRA, n.p. This name has two quite distinct uses.

(a.) Pers. Hazdra. It is used as a generic name for a number of tribes occupying some of the wildest parts of Afghanistan, chiefly N.W. and S.W. of Kabul. These tribes are in no respect Afghan, but are in fact most or all of them Mongol in features, and some of them also in language. The term at one time appears to have been used more generally for a variety of the wilder clans in the higher hill countries of Afghanistan and the Oxus basin, much as in Scotland of a century and a half ago they spoke of “the clans.” It appears to be merely from the Pers. hazdr, 1000. The regiments, so to speak, of the Mongol hosts of Chinghiz and his immediate successors were called hazāras, and if we accept the belief that the Hazdras of Afghanistan were predatory bands of those hosts who settled in that region (in favour of which there is a good deal to be said), this name is intelligible. If so, its application to the non-Mongol people of Wakhān, &c., must have been a later transfer. [See the discussion by Bellew, who points out that “amongst themselves this people never use the term Hazdrah as their national appellation, and yet they have no name for their people as a nation.

They are only known amongst themselves by the names of their principal tribes and the clans subordinate to them respectively." (Races of Afghanistan, 114.)]

c. 1480.—"The Hasāra, Takdari, and all the other tribes having seen this, quietly submitted to his authority."—Parkhda-Nāma, in Elliot, i. 308. For Takdari we should probably read Nakdari; and see Marco Polo, Bk. I. ch. 18, note on Nigudaris.

c. 1505.—Kabul "on the west has the mountain districts, in which are situated Karnod and Ghūr. This mountainous tract is at present occupied and inhabited by the Hasāra and Nukdari tribes."—Baber, p. 136.

1508.—"Mirza Ababeker, the ruler and tyrant of Kāshghar, had seized all the Upper Hasāras of Badakhshān."—Erskine's Baber and Humāyūn, i. 287. "Hasāra jāti bāddat. The upper districts in Badakhshān were called Hasāras." Erskine's note. He is using the Farīk Kashghar. But is not the word Hasāras here, 'the clans,' used elliptically for the highland districts occupied by them?]

[c. 1500.—"The Hasāras are the descendants of the Chaghatai army, sent by Manku Khān to the assistance of Hulāku Khān. . . . They possess horses, sheep and goats. They are divided into factions, each covetous of what they can obtain, deceptive in their common intercourse and their conventions of amity savour of the wolf."—Ata, ed. Jarrett, ii. 402.]

(b.) A mountain district in the extreme N.W. of the Punjab, of which Abbottābād, called after its founder, General James Abbott, is the British head-quarter. The name of this region apparently has nothing to do with Hasāras in the tribal sense, but is probably a survival of the ancient name of a territory in this quarter, called in Sanskrit Abhisāra, and figuring in Ptolemy, Arrian and Curtius as the kingdom of King Abisāras. [See McCrindle, Invasion of India, 69.]

HUZOOR, s. Ar. ḥuzūr, 'the presence'; used by natives as a respectful way of talking of or to exalted personages, to or of their master, or occasionally of any European gentleman in presence of another European. [The allied words ḥazrat and ḥuzūrī are used in kindred senses as in the examples.]

[1787.—"You will send to the Huzoor an account particular of the assessment payable by each ryot."—Parasana of Tippee, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 125.

IDALCAN, HIDALCAN, and sometimes IDALXA, n.p. The title by which the Portuguese distinguished the kings of the Mahommedan dynasty of Biḡapūr which rose at the end of the 15th century on the dissolution of the Bahmani kingdom of the Deccan. These names represented 'Adil Khān, the title of the founder before he became king, more generally called by the Portuguese the Sabaio (q.v.), and 'Adil Shāh, the distinctive style of all the kings of the dynasty. The Portuguese commonly called their kingdom Balaguant (q.v.).

1510.—"The Hidalcan entered the city (Goa) with great festivity and rejoicings, and went to the castle to see what the ships were doing, and there, inside and out, he found the dead Moors, whom Timoja had slain; and round about them the brothers and parents and wives, raising great wailings and lamentations, thus the festivity of the Hidalcan was celebrated by weepings and wailings. . . . so that he sent João Machado to the Governor to speak about terms of peace. . . . The Governor replied that Goa belonged to his lord the K. of Portugal, and that he would hold no peace with him (Hidalcan) unless he delivered up the city with all its territories. . . . With which reply back went João Machado, and the Hidalcan on hearing it was left amazed, saying that our people were sons of the devil. . . ."—Correa, ii. 86.

INDIA, INDIES.

440, c. 400). The last, though repeating more fables than Herodotus, shows a truer conception of what India was.

Before going further, we ought to point out that India itself is a Latin form, and does not appear in a Greek writer, we believe, before Lucian and Polyænus, both writers of the middle of the 2nd century. The Greek form is ἡ Ἰνδική, or else 'The Land of the Indians.'

The name of 'India' spread not only from its original application, as denoting the country on the banks of the Indus, to the whole peninsula between (and including) the valleys of Indus and Ganges; but also in a vaguer way to all the regions beyond. The compromise between the vaguer and the more precise use of the term is seen in Ptolemy, where the boundaries of the true India are defined, on the whole, with surprising exactness, as 'India within the Ganges,' whilst the darker regions beyond appear as 'India beyond the Ganges.' And this double conception of India, as 'India Proper' (as we may call it), and India in the vaguer sense, has descended to our own time.

So vague became the conception in the 'dark ages' that the name is sometimes found to be used as synonymous with Asia, 'Europe, Africa, and India,' forming the three parts of the world. Earlier than this, however, we find a tendency to discriminate different Indias, in a form distinct from Ptolemy's Intra et extra Gangem; and the terms India Major, India Minor can be traced back to the 4th century. As was natural where there was so little knowledge, the application of these terms was various and oscillating, but they continued to hold their ground for 1000 years, and in the later centuries of that period we generally find a third India also, and a tendency (of which the roots go back, as far at least as Virgil's time) to place one of the three in Africa.

It is this conception of a twofold or threefold India that has given us and the other nations of Europe the vernacular expressions in plural form which hold their ground to this day: the Indies, les Indes, (It.) le Indie, &c.

And we may add further, that China is called by Friar Odoric Upper India (India Superior), whilst Marignolli calls it India Magna and Maxima, and calls Malabar India Parva, and India Inferior.

There was yet another, and an Oriental, application of the term India to the country at the mouth of the Tigris and Euphrates, which the people of Basra still call Hind; and which Sir H. Rawlinson connects with the fact that the Talmudic writers confounded Obillah in that region with the Harilu of Genesis. (See Cathay, &c., 55, note.)

In the work of the Chinese traveller Hwen T'sang again we find that by him and his co-religionists a plurality of Indias was recognised, i.e. five, viz. North, Central, East, South, and West.

Here we may remark how two names grew out of the original Sindhu. The aspirated and Persianised form Hind, as applied to the great country beyond the Indus, passed to the Arabs. But when they invaded the valley of the Indus and found it called Sindhu, they adopted that name in the form Sind, and thenceforward 'Hind and Sind' were habitually distinguished, though generally coupled, and conceived as two parts of a great whole.

Of the application of India to an Ethiopian region, an application of which indications extend over 1500 years, we have not space to speak here. On this and on the medieval plurality of Indias reference may be made to two notes on Marco Polo, 2nd ed. vol. ii. pp. 419 and 425.

The vague extension of the term India to which we have referred, survives in another form besides that in the use of 'Indies.' India, to each European nation which has possessions in the East, may be said, without much inaccuracy, to mean in colloquial use that part of the East in which their own possessions lie. Thus to the Portuguese, India was, and probably still is, the West Coast only. In their writers of the 16th and 17th century a distinction is made between India, the territory of the Portuguese and their immediate neighbours on the West Coast, and Mogor, the dominions of the Great Mogul. To the Dutchman India means Java and its dependencies. To the Spaniard, if we mistake not, India is Manila. To the Gaul are not les Indes Pondicherry, Chander-nagore, and Réunion?

As regards the West Indies, this expression originates in the misconception of the great Admiral himself, who in his memorable enterprise was seeking, and thought he had found, a new route to the 'Indias' by sailing west instead of east. His discoveries were to Spain the Indies, until it gradually became manifest that they were not identical with the ancient lands of the east, and then they became the West-Indies.

Indian is a name which has been carried still further abroad; from being applied, as a matter of course, to the natives of the islands, supposed of India, discovered by Columbus, it naturally passed to the natives of the adjoining continent, till it came to be the familiar name of all the tribes between (and sometimes even including) the Esquimaux of the North and the Patagonians of the South.

This abuse no doubt has led to our hesitation in applying the term to a native of India itself. We use the adjective Indian, but no modern Englishman who has had to do with India ever speaks of a man of that country as 'an Indian.' Forrest, in his Voyage to Mergui, uses the inelegant word Indostaners; but in India itself a Hindustani means, as has been indicated under that word, a native of the upper Gangetic valley and adjoining districts. Among the Greeks 'an Indian' (Ἰνδός) acquired a notable specific application. viz. to an elephant driver or mahout (q.v.).

B.C. c. 486.—"Says Darius the King: By the grace of Ormazd these (are) the countries which I have acquired besides Persia. I have established my power over them. They have brought tribute to me. That which has been said to them by me they have done. They have obeyed my law. Medea . . . B.C. c. 440.—"Eastward of India lies a tract which is entirely sand. Indeed, of all the inhabitants of Asia, concerning whom anything is known, the Indians dwell nearest to the east, and the rising of the Sun."—Herodotus, iii. c. 98 (Rawlinson).

B.C. c. 300.—"India then (ἡ τοῦτον Ἰνδική) being four-sided in plan, the side which looks to the Orient and that to the South, the Great Sea compasseth; that towards the Arctic is divided by the mountain chain of Hēmōdus from Scythia, inhabited by that tribe of Scythians who are called Sakai; and on the fourth side, turned towards the West, the Indus marks the boundary, the biggest or nearly so of all rivers after the Nile."

c. 590.—"As for the land of the Hind it is bounded on the East by the Persian Sea (i.e. the Indian Ocean), on the W. and S. by the countries of Islām, and on the N. by the Chinese Empire. . . . The length of the land of the Hind from the government of Mokrān, the country of Mansūra and Bodha and the rest of Sind, till thou comest to Kannūj and thence passest on to Tobbat (see TIBET), is about 4 months, and its breadth from the Indian Ocean to the country of Kannūj about three months."—Istakhri, pp. 6 and 11.

c. 650.—"The name of T'ien-chu (India) has gone through various and confused forms. . . . Anciently they said Shin-tu; whilst some authors called it Hien-teou. Now conforming to the true pronunciation one should say In-tu."—Hwen Tsang, in Pél. Bouddh., ii. 57.

c. 944.—"For the nonce let us confine ourselves to summary notices concerning the kings of Sind and Hind. The language of Sind is different from that of Hind. . . ."—Maṣ'ūdī, i. 381.

c. 1020.—"India (Al-Hind) is one of those plains bounded on the south by the Sea of the Indians. Lofty mountains bound it on all the other quarters. Through this plain the waters descending from the mountains are discharged. Moreover, if thou wilt examine this country with thine eyes, if thou wilt regard the rounded and worn stones that are found in the soil, however deep thou mayest dig,—stones which near the mountains, where the rivers roll down violently, are large; but small at a distance from the mountains, where the current slackens; and which become mere sand where the currents are at rest, where the waters sink into the soil, and where the sea is at hand—then thou wilt be tempted to believe that this country was at a former period only a sea which the debris washed down by the torrents hath filled up. . . ."—Al-Birūnī, in Reinaud's Extracts, Journ. As. ser. 4. 1844.

"Hind is surrounded on the East by Chín and Máchín, on the West by Sind and Kábul, and on the South by the Sea."—Ibid. in Elliot, i. 45.

1205.—"The whole country of Hind, from Pershaur to the shores of the Ocean, and in the other direction, from Siwistán to the hills of Chín. . . ."—Hasan Nizāmī, in Elliot, ii. 236. That is, from Peshawar in the north, to the Indian Ocean in the south; from Sehwan (on the west bank of the Indus) to the mountains on the east dividing from China.

c. 1500.—"Hodu quae est India extra et intra Gangem."—Itinera Mundi (in Hebrew), by Abr. Peritsol, in Hyde, Syntagma Dissert., Oxon, 1767, i. 75.

1553.—“And had Vasco da Gama belonged to a nation so glorious as the Romans he would perchance have added to the style of his family, noble as that is, the surname ‘Of India,’ since we know that those symbols of honour that a man wins are more glorious than those that he inherits, and that Scipio gloried more in the achievement which gave him the surname of ‘Africanus,’ than in the name of Cornelius, which was that of his family.”—Barros, I. iv. 12.

1572.—Defined, without being named, by Camoens:

“Alem do Indo faz, e aquem do Gange
Hu terreno muy grãde, e assaz famoso,
Que pela parte Austral o mar abrange,
E para o Norte o Emodio cavernoso.”
Lusiadas, vii. 17.

Englished by Burton:

“Outside of Indus, inside Ganges, lies a wide-spread country, famed enough of yore;
northward the peaks of caved Emódus rise, and southward Ocean doth confine the shore.”

1577.—“India is properly called that great Province of Asia, in the whiche great Alexander kepte his warres, and was so named of the ryuer Indus.”—Eden, Hist. of Trauayle, f. 3v.

The distinct Indias.

c. 650.—“The circumference of the Five Indies is about 90,000 li; on three sides it is bounded by a great sea; on the north it is backed by snowy mountains. It is wide at the north and narrow at the south; its figure is that of a half-moon.”—Hwen Tsang, in Pél. Bouddh., ii. 58.

1298.—“India the Greater is that which extends from Maabar to Kesmacoran (i.e. from Coromandel to Mekran), and it contains 13 great kingdoms. . . . India the Lesser extends from the Province of Champa to Mutfli (i.e. from Cochin-China to the Kistna Delta), and contains 8 great Kingdoms. . . . Abash (Abyssinia) is a very great province, and you must know that it constitutes the Middle India.”—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 34, 35.

c. 1328.—“What shall I say? The greatness of this India is beyond description. But let this much suffice concerning India the Greater and the Less. Of India Tertia I will say this, that I have not indeed seen its many marvels, not having been there. . . .”—Friar Jordanus, p. 41.

India Minor, in Clavijo, looks as if it were applied to Afghanistan:

1404.—“And this same Thursday that the said Ambassadors arrived at this great River (the Oxus) they crossed to the other side. And the same day . . . came in the evening to a great city which is called Tenmit (Termedh), and this used to belong to India Minor, but now belongs to the empire of Samarkand, having been conquered by Tamurbec.”—Clavijo, § ciii. (Markham, 119).

c. 1567.—“Di qui (Coilan) a Cao Comeri si fanno settanta due miglia, e qui si finisce la costa dell' India.”—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 390.

1598.—“At the ende of the countrey of Cambaia beginneth India and the lands of Decam and Cuncam . . . from the island called Das Vaguas (read Vaguas) . . . which is the righte coast that in all the East Countries is called India. . . . Now you must vnderstande that this coast of India beginneth at Daman, or the Island Das Vaguas, and stretched South and by East, to the Cape of Comorin, where it endeth.”—Linschoten, ch. ix.-x.; [Hak. Soc. i. 62. See also under ABADA].

c. 1610.—“Il y a grand nombre des Portugais qui demeurent ès ports du cette coste de Bengale . . . ils n'osoient retourner en l'Inde, pour quelques fautes qu'ils y ont commis.”—Pyrard de Laval, i. 239; [Hak. Soc. i. 334].

1615.—“Sociorum literis, qui Mogoris Regiam incolunt auditum est in India de celeberrimo Regno illo quod Saraceni Cataium vocant.”—Trigautius, De Christianâ Expeditione apud Sinâs, p. 544.

1644.—(Speaking of the Daman district above Bombay.—“The fruits are nearly all the same as those that you get in India, and especially many Mangas and Cassarus (?), which are like chestnuts.”—Bocarro, MS.

It is remarkable to find the term used, in a similar restricted sense, by the Court of the E.I.C. in writing to Fort St. George. They certainly mean some part of the west coast.

1670.—They desire that dungarees may be supplied thence if possible, as “they were not procurable on the Coast of India, by reason of the disturbances of Sevajee.”—Notes and Exts., Pt. i. 2.

1673.—“The Portugals . . . might have subdued India by this time, had not we fallen out with them, and given them the [1605-6.—“... for all which we shall buie Ryse, Indico, Lapes Bezar which theare in aboundance are to be hadd.”—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 77.

[1609.—“... to buy such Comodities as they shall finde there as Indico, of Laher (Lahore), here worth viij^s the pounce Serchis and the best Belondri. . . .”—Ibid. 287. Serchis is Sarkhej, the Sercaze of Forbes (Or. Mem., 2nd ed. ii. 204) near Ahmadāhād: Sir G. Birdwood with some hesitation identifies Belondri with Valabhi, 20 m. N.W. of Bhāvnagar.

[1610.—“Anil or Indigne, which is a violet-blue dye.”—Pyrard de Lacal, Hak. Soc. ii. 246.]

1610.—“In the country thereabouts is made some Indigo.”—Sir H. Middleton, in Purchas, i. 259.

[1616.—“Indigo is made thus. In the prime June they sow it, which the rains bring up about the prime September: this they cut and it is called the Newty (H. naudhā, ‘a young plant’), formerly mentioned, and is a good sort. Next year it sprouts again in the prime August, which they cut and is the best Indigo, called Jerry (H. jari, ‘growing from the root (jar).’”—Foster, Letters, iv. 241.]

c. 1670.—Tavernier gives a detailed account of the manufacture as it was in his time. “They that sift this Indigo must be careful to keep a Linnen-cloth before their faces, and that their nostrils be well stopt. . . . Yet . . . they that have sifted Indigo for 9 or 10 days shall spit nothing but blew for a good while together. Once I laid an egg in the morning among the sifters, and when I came to break it in the evening it was all blew within.”—E.T. ii. 128-9; [ed. Bull, ii. 11].

We have no conception what is meant by the following singular (apparently sarcastic) entry in the Indian Vocabulary:—

1788.—“Indergo—a drug of no estimation that grows wild in the woods.” [This is H. indarjau, Skt. indra-yara, “barley of Indra,” the Wrightia tinctoria, from the leaves of which a sort of indigo is made. See Watt, Recon. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 316. “Inderjò of the species of warm bitters.”—Halhed, Code, ed. 1781, p. 9.]

1881.—“Découvertes et Inventions.—Décidément le cabinet Gladstone est poursuivi par la malechance. Voici un savant chimiste de Munich qui vient de trouver le moyen se preparer artificiellement et à très bon marché le bleu Indigo. Cette découverte peut amener la ruine du gouvernement des Indes anglaises, qui est déjà menacé de la banqueroute. L’indigo, en effet, est le principal article de commerce des Indes (!); dans l’Allemagne, seulement, on en importe par an pour plus de cent cinquante millions de francs.”—Havre Commercial Paper, quoted in Pioneer Mail, Feb. 3, INGLEES, s. Hind. Inglis and Inglis. Wilson gives as the explanation of this: “Invalid soldiers and sipahis, to whom allotments of land were assigned as pensions; the lands so granted.” But the word is now used as the equivalent of (sepoy’s) pension simply. Mr. Carnegie, [who is followed by Platts], says the word is “probably a corruption of English, as pensions were unknown among native Governments, whose rewards invariably took the shape of land assignments.” This, however, is quite unsatisfactory; and Sir H. Elliot’s suggestion (mentioned by Wilson) that the word was a corruption of invalid (which the sepoys may have confounded in some way with English) is most probable.

INTERLOPER, s. One in former days who traded without the license, or outside the service, of a company (such as the E.I.C.) which had a charter of monopoly. The etymology of the word remains obscure. It looks like Dutch, but intelligent Dutch friends have sought in vain for a Dutch original. Onderloopen, the nearest word we can find, means ‘to be inundated.’ The hybrid etymology given by Bailey, though allowed by Skeat, seems hardly possible. Perhaps it is an English corruption from ont-loopen, ‘to evade, escape, run away from.’ [The N.E.D. without hesitation gives interlope, a form of leap. Skeat, in his Concise Dict., 2nd ed., agrees, and quotes Low Germ. and Dutch enterloper, ‘a runner between.’] 1627.—“Interlopers in trade, ¶ Attur Acad. pa. 54.”—Minsheu. (What is the meaning of the reference?) [It refers to “The Atturneyes Academie” by Thomas Powell or Powel, for which see 9 ser. Notes and Queries, vii. 198, 392].

1680.—“The commissions relating to the Interloper, or private trader, being considered, it is resolved that a notice be fixed up warning all the Inhabitants of the Towne, not, directly or indirectly, to trade, negotiate, aid, assist, countenance, or hold any correspondence, with Captain William Alley or any person belonging to him or his ship without the license of the Honorable Company. Whoever shall offend herein shall answere it at their Perill.”—Notes and Exts., Pt. iii. 29.

1681.—“The Shippe EXPECTATION, Capt. Ally Comādr, an Interloper, arrived in ye Downes from Porto Novo.”—Hedys, Diary, Jan. 4; [Hak. Soc. i. 15].

[1682.—“The Agent having notice of an Interloper lying in Titticorin Bay, immediately sent for ye Councell to consult about it. . . .”—Pringle, Diary of Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. i. 69.]

“The Spirit of Commerce, which sees its drifts with eagle's eyes, formed associations at the risque of trying the consequence at law . . . since the statutes did not authorize the Company to seize or stop the ships of these adventurers, whom they called Interlopers.”—Orme's Fragments, 127.

1683.—“If God gives me life to get this Phirmaund into my possession, ye Honble. Compy. shall never more be much troubled with Interlopers.”—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 62].

“May 28. About 9 this morning Mr. Littleton, Mr. Nedham, and Mr. Douglass came to y^e factory, and being sent for, were asked ‘Whether they did now, or ever intended, directly or indirectly, to trade with any Interlopers that shall arrive in the Bay of Bengall?’

“Mr. Littleton answered that, ‘he did not, nor ever intended to trade with any Interloper.’

“Mr. Nedham answered, ‘that at present he did not, and that he came to gett money, and if any such offer should happen, he would not refuse it.’

“Mr. Douglass answered, he did not, nor ever intended to trade with them; but he said ‘what Estate he should gett here he would not scruple to send it home upon any Interloper.’

“And having given their respective answers they were dismiss.”—Ibid. Hak. Soc. i. 90-91.

1694.—“Whether y^e souldiers lately sent up hath created any jealousye in y^e Interlopers: or their own Actions or guilt I know not, but they are so cautious y^t every 2 or 3 bales y^t are packt they immediately send on board.”—MS. Letter from Edwd. Hern at Hugley to the Rt. Worshp^l Charles Eyre Esq. Agent for Affaires of the Rt. Honble. East India Comp^a. in Bengall, &c^a. (9th Sept.). MS. Record in India Office.

1719.—“. . . their business in the South Seas was to sweep those coasts clear of the French interlopers, which they did very effectually.”—Shelrocke's Voyage, 29.

“I wish you would explain yourself; I cannot imagine what reason I have to be afraid of any of the Company's ships, or Dutch ships, I am no interloper.”—Robinson Crusoe, Pt. ii.

1730.—“To Interlope [of inter, L. between, and looptu, Du. to run, q. d. to run in between, and intercept the Commerce of others], to trade without proper Authority, or interfere with a Company in Commerce.”—Bailey's English Dict. s.v.

1760.—“Enterlooper. Terme de Commerce de Mer, fort en usage parmi les Compagnies des Pays du Nord, comme l'Angleterre, la Hollande, Hambourg, le Danemark, &c. Il signifie un vaisseau d'un particulier qui pratique et fréquente les Côtes, et les Havres ou Ports de Mer éloignés, pour y faire un commerce clandestin, au préjudice des Compagnies qui sont autorisées elles seules à le faire dans ces mêmes lieux. . . . Ce mot se prononce comme s'il étoit écrit Eintrelopre. Il est emprunté de l'Anglois, de enter qui signifie entrer et entreprendre, et de Looper, Courreur.”—Savary des Bruslons, Dict. Univ. de Commerce, Nouv. ed., Copenhague, s.v.

c. 1812.—“The fault lies in the clause which gives the Company power to send home interlopers . . . and is just as reasonable as one which should forbid all the people of England, except a select few, to look at the moon.”—Letter of Dr. Carey, in William Carey, by James Culross, D.D., 1881, p. 165.

IPECACUANHA (WILD), s. The garden name of a plant (Asclepias curassavica, L.) naturalised in all tropical countries. It has nothing to do with the true ipecacuanha, but its root is a powerful emetic, whence the name. The true ipecacuanha is cultivated in India.

IRON-WOOD. This name is applied to several trees in different parts; e.g. to Mesua ferrea, L. (N.O. Clusiaceae), Hind. nagkesar; and in the Burmese provinces to Xylia dolabri-formis, Benth.

I-SAY. The Chinese mob used to call the English soldiers A'says or Isays, from the frequency of this apostrophe in their mouths. (The French gamins, it is said, do the same at Boulogne.) At Amoy the Chinese used to call out after foreigners Akee! Akee! a tradition from the Portuguese Aqui! ‘Here!’ In Java the French are called by the natives Orang deedong, i.e. the dites-donc people. (See Fortune's Two Visits to the Tea Countries, 1853, p. 52; and Notes and Queries in China and Japan, ii. 175.)

ISKAT, s. Ratlines. A marine term from Port. escada (Roebuck).

[ISLAM, s. Inf. of Ar. salm, ‘to be or become safe’; the word generally used by Mahommedans for their religion.

[1616.—“Dated in Achen 1025 according to the rate of Slam.”—Foster, Letters, iv. 125.

[1617.—“I demanded the debts . . . one [of the debtors] for the valew of 110 r[ials] is termed Slam.”—Letter of E. Young, from Jacatra, Oct. 3, I.O. Records: O.C. No. 541.]

ISTOOP, s. Oakum. A marine term from Port. estopa (Roebuck).

ISTUBBUL, s. This usual Hind. word for ‘stable’ may naturally be imagined to be a corruption of the English word. But it is really Ar. istabl, though that no doubt came in old times from the Latin stabulum through some Byzantine Greek form.

ITZEBOO, s. A Japanese coin, the smallest silver denomination. Itsi-bū, ‘one drachm.’ [The N.E.D. gives itse, itche, ‘one,’ bū, ‘division, part, quarter’]. Present value about 1s. Marsden says: “Itzebo, a small gold piece of oblong form, being 0·6 inch long, and 0·3 broad. Two specimens weighed 2 dwt. 3 grs. only” (Numism. Orient., 814-5). See Cocks’s Diary, i. 176, ii. 77. [The coin does not appear in the last currency list; see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 99.]

[1616.—“Ichibos.” (See under KO-BANG.)

[1859.—“We found the greatest difficulty in obtaining specimens of the currency of the country, and I came away at last the possessor of a solitary Itzibu. These are either of gold or silver: the gold Itzibu is a small oblong piece of money, intrinsically worth about seven and sixpence. The intrinsic value of the gold half-itzibu, which is not too large to convert into a shirt-stud, is about one and tenpence.”—L. Oliphant, Narr. of Mission, ii. 232.]

IZAM MALUCO, n.p. We often find this form in Correa, instead of Nizamaluco (q.v.).

J

JACK, s. Short for Jack-Sepoy; in former days a familiar style for the native soldier; kindly, rather than otherwise.

1853.—“ . . . he should be leading the Jacks.”—Oakfield, ii. 66.

JACK, s. The tree called by botanists Artocarpus integrifolia, L. fil., and its fruit. The name, says Drury, is “a corruption of the Skt. word Tchackka, which means the fruit of the tree” (Useful Plants, p. 55). There is, however, no such Skt. word; the Skt. names are Kantaka, Phala, Panasa, and Phalasa. [But the Malayāl. chakka is from the Skt. chakra, ‘round.’] Rheede rightly gives Tsjaka (chākka) as the Malayālam name, and from this no doubt the Portuguese took jaca and handed it on to us. “They call it,” says Garcia Orta, “in Malavar jacas, in Canarese and Guzerati panas” (f. 111). “The Tamil form is sākkei, the meaning of which, as may be adduced from various uses to which the word is put in Tamil, is ‘the fruit abounding in rind and refuse.’” (Letter from Bp. Caldwell.)

We can hardly doubt that this is the fruit of which Pliny writes: “Major alia pomo et suavitate prae-cellentior; quo sapientiores Indorum vivunt. (Folium alas avium imitatur longitudine trium cubitorum, latitudine duum). Fructum e cortice mittit admirabilem succi dulcedine; ut uno quaternos satiet. Arbori nomen pala, pomo arienae; plurima est in Sydracis, expeditionum Alexandri termino. Est et alia similis huic; dulcior pomo; sed interaneorum valetudini infesta” (Hist. Nat. xii. 12). Thus rendered, not too faithfully, by Philemon Holland: “Another tree there is in India, greater yet than the former; bearing a fruit much fairer, bigger, and sweeter than the figs aforesaid; and whereof the Indian Sages and Philosophers do ordinarily live. The leaf resembleth birds’ wings, carrying three cubits in length, and two in breadth. The fruit it putteth forth at the bark, having within it a wonderfull pleasant juice: insomuch as one of them is sufficient to give four men a competent and full refection. The tree’s name is Pala, and the fruit is called Ariena. Great plenty of them is in the country of the Sydraci, the utmost limit of Alexander the Great his expeditions and voyages. And yet there is another tree much like to this, and beareth a fruit more delectable than this Ariena, albeit the guts in a man’s belly it wringeth and breeds the bloudie flux” (i. 361).

Strange to say, the fruit thus described has been generally identified with the plantain: so generally that

JAFNA, JAFNAPATÁM.

[JAFFRY, s. A screen or lattice-work, made generally of bamboo, used for various purposes, such as a fence, a support for climbing plants, &c. The ordinary Pers. ja'farī is derived from a person of the name of Ja'far; but Mr. Platts suggests that in the sense under consideration it may be a corr. of Ar. zafīrat, zafīr, 'a braided lock.'

[1832.—“Of vines, the branches must also be equally spread over the jaffry, so that light and heat may have access to the whole.”—Trans. Agri. Hort. Soc. Ind. ii. 202.]

JAGGERY, s. Coarse brown (or almost black) sugar, made from the sap of various palms. The wild date tree (Phoenix sylvestris, Roxb.), Hind. khajūr, is that which chiefly supplies palm-sugar in Guzerat and Coromandel, and almost alone in Bengal. But the palmyra, the caryota, and the coco-palm all give it; the first as the staple of Tinnevely and northern Ceylon; the second chiefly in southern Ceylon, where it is known to Europeans as the Jaggery Palm (kitūl of natives); the third is much drawn for toddy (q.v.) in the coast districts of Western India, and this is occasionally boiled for sugar. Jaggery is usually made in the form of small round cakes. Great quantities are produced in Tinnevely, where the cakes used to pass as a kind of currency (as cakes of salt used to pass in parts of Africa, and in Western China), and do even yet to some small extent. In Bombay all rough unrefined sugar-stuff is known by this name; and it is the title under which all kinds of half-prepared sugar is classified in the tariff of the Railways there. The word jaggery is only another form of sugar (q.v.), being like it a corr. of the Skt. śarkarā, Konkani sakkarā, [Malayāl. chakkarā, whence it passed into Port. jagara, jagra].

1516.—“Sugar of palms, which they call xagara.”—Barbosa, 59.

1553.—Exports from the Maldives “also of fish-oil, coco-nuts, and jagara, which is made from these after the manner of sugar.”—Barros, Dec. III. liv. iii. cap. 7.

1561.—“Jagre, which is sugar of palm-trees.”—Correa, Lendas, i. 2, 592.

1563.—“And after they have drawn this pot of çura, if the tree gives much they draw another, of which they make sugar, prepared either by sun or fire, and this they call jagra.”—Garcia, f. 67.

c. 1567.—“There come every yeere from Cochin and from Cananor tenne or fiftene great Shippes (to Chaul) laden with great nuts . . . and with sugar made of the selfe same nuts called Giafra.”—Cæsar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 344.

1598.—“Of the aforesaid sura they likewise make sugar, which is called İagra; they seeth the water, and set it in the sun, whereof it becometh sugar, but it is little esteemed, because it is of a browne colour.”—Linxhoten, 102; [Hak. Soc. ii. 49].

1616.—“Some small quantity of wine, but not common, is made among them; they call it Ruak (see ARRACK), distilled from Sugar, and a spicy rinde of a tree called Jagra.”—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 365.

1727.—“The Produce of the Samorin's Country is . . . Cocoa-Nut, and that tree produceth Jaggery, a kind of sugar, and Copera (see COPRAH), or the kernels of the Nut dried.”—A. Hamilton, i. 306; [ed. 1744, i. 308].

c. 1750-60.—“Arrack, a coarse sort of sugar called Jagree, and vinegar are also extracted from it” (coco-palm).—Grose, i. 47.

1807.—“The Turi or fermented juice, and the Jagory or inspissated juice of the Pal-mira tree . . . are in this country more esteemed than those of the wild date, which is contrary to the opinion of the Bengalese.”—F. Buchanan, Mysore, &c., i. 5.

1860.—“In this state it is sold as jaggery in the bazaars, at about three farthings per pound.”—Tennent's Ceylon, iii. 524.

JAGHEER, JAGHIRE, s. Pers. jāgīr, lit. ‘place-holding.’ A hereditary assignment of land and of its rent as annuity.

[c. 1590.—“Farmān-i-zabīts are issued for . . . appointments to jāgirs, without military service.”—Āin, i. 261.

[1617.—“Hee quittes diuers small Jaggers to the King.”—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 449.]

c. 1666.—“. . . Not to speak of what they finger out of the Pay of every Horseman, and of the number of the Horses; which certainly amounts to very considerable Pensions, especially if they can obtain good Jah-ghirs, that is, good Lands for their Pensions.”—Bernier, E.T. 66; [ed. Constable, 213].

1673.—“It (Surat) has for its Maintenance the Income of six Villages; over which the Governor sometimes presides, sometimes not, being in the Jaggea, or diocese of another.”—Fryer, 120.

„ “Jageah, an Annuity.”—Ibid. Index, vi.

1768.—“I say, Madam, I know nothing of books; and yet I believe upon a land-carriage fishery, a stamp act, or a jaghire, I can talk my two hours without feeling the want of them.”—Mr. Lofty, in The Good-Natured Man, Act ii.

1778.—“Should it be more agreeable to the parties, Sir Matthew will settle upon Sir John and his Lady, for their joint lives, a jagghire.”

“Sir John.—A Jagghire?

“Thomas.—The term is Indian, and means an annual Income.”—Foote, The Nabob, i. 1.

We believe the traditional stage pronunciation in these passages is Jag Hire (assonant in both syllables to Quag Mire): and this is also the pronunciation given in some dictionaries.

1778.—“... Jaghires, which were always rents arising from lands.”—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 52.

1809.—“He was nominally in possession of a larger jaghire.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 401.

A territory adjoining Fort St. George was long known as the Jaghire, or the Company's Jaghire, and is often so mentioned in histories of the 18th century. This territory, granted to the Company by the Nabob of Arcot in 1750 and 1763, nearly answers to the former Collectorate of Chennagalput and present Collectorate of Madras.

[In the following the reference is to the Jirgah or tribal council of the Pathan tribes on the N.W. frontier.

[1900.—“No doubt upon the occasion of Lord Curzon's introduction to the Waziris and the Mohmunds, he will inform their Jagirs that he has long since written a book about them.”—Contemporary Rev. Aug. p. 282.]

JAGHEERDAR, s. P.—H. jadgīr-dār, the holder of a jagheer.

[1813.—“... in the Mahratta empire the principal Jaghiredars, or nobles, appear in the field. . . .”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 328.]

1826.—“The Resident, many officers, men of rank . . . jagheerdars, Brahmins, and Pundits, were present, assembled round my father.”—Pandurang Hari, 389; [ed. 1873, ii. 259].

1883. — “The Sikhs administered the country by means of jagheerdars, and paid them by their jagheers: the English administered it by highly paid British officers, at the same time that they endeavoured to lower the land-tax, and to introduce grand material reforms.”—Bosworth Smith, L. of Ld. Lawrence, i. 378.

JAIL-KHANA, s. A hybrid word for ‘a gaol,’ commonly used in the Bengal Presidency.

JAIN, s. and adj. The non-Brahmanical sect so called; believed to represent the earliest heretics of Buddhism, at present chiefly to be found in the Bombay Presidency. There are a few in Mysore, Canara, and in some parts of the Madras Presidency, but in the Middle Ages they appear to have been numerous on the coast of the Peninsula generally. They are also found in various parts of Central and Northern India and Behar. The Jains are generally merchants, and some have been men of enormous wealth (see Colebrooke's Essays, i. 378 seqq.; [Lassen, in Ind. Antiq. ii. 193 seqq., 258 seqq.]). The name is Skt. jaina, meaning a follower of jina. The latter word is a title applied to certain saints worshipped by the sect in the place of gods; it is also a name of the Buddhas. An older name for the followers of the sect appears to have been Nirgrantha, ‘without bond,’ properly the title of Jain ascetics only (otherwise Yatis), [and in particular of the Digambara or ‘sky-clad,’ naked branch]. (Burnell, S. Indian Palaeography, p. 47, note.)

[c. 1590.—“Jaina. The founder of this wonderful system was Jina, also called Arhat, or Arhant.”—Āin, ed. Jarrett, iii. 188.]

JALEEBOTE, s. Jālibōt. A marine corruption of jolly-boat (Roe-buck). (See GALLEVAT.)

JAM, s. Jām.

a. A title borne by certain chiefs in Kutch, in Kāthiāwār, and on the lower Indus. The derivation is very obscure (see Elliot, i. 495). The title is probably Bilūch originally. There are several Jāms in Lower Sind and its borders, and notably the Jām of Las Bela State, a well-known dependency of Kelat, bordering the sea. [Mr. Longworth Dames writes: “I do not think the word is of Balochi origin, although it is certainly made use of in the Balochi language. It is rather Sindhi, in the broad sense of the word, using Sindhi as the natives do, referring to the tribes of the Indus valley without regard to the modern boundaries of the province of Sindh. As far as I know, it is used as a title, not by Baloches, but by indigenous tribes of Rājput or Jat origin, now, of course, all Musulmans. The Jām of Las Bela belongs to a tribe of this nature known as the Jāmhat. In the Dera Ghāzī Khān District it is used by certain local notables of this class, none of them Baloches. The principal tribe there using it is the Udhāna. It is also an honorific title among the Mochis of Dera Ghāzī Khān town.”]

[c. 1590.—“On the Gujarat side towards the south is a Zamíndár of note whom they call Jám. . . .”—Āin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 250.

[1843.—See under DAWK.]

b. A nautical measure, Ar. zdm, pl. azwdm. It occurs in the form geme in a quotation of 1614 under JASK. It is repeatedly used in the Mohit of Sidi 'Ali, published in the J. As. Soc. Bengal. It would appear from J. Prinsep's remarks there that the word is used in various ways. Thus Baron J. Hammer writes to Prinsep: “Concerning the measure of azwdm the first section of the III^d. chapter explains as follows: ‘The zdm is either the practical one ('arfī), or the rhetorical (istilāhī—but this the acute Prinsep suggests should be astarlābī, ‘pertaining to the divisions of the astrolabe’). The practical is one of the 8 parts into which day and night are divided; the rhetorical (but read the astrolabic) is the 8th part of an inch (iṣḍba) in the ascension and descension of the stars; . . . an explanation which helps me not a bit to understand the true measure of a zdm, in the reckoning of a ship's course.” Prinsep then elucidates this: The zdm in practical parlance is said to be the 8th part of day and night; it is in fact a nautical watch or Hindu pahar (see PUHUR). Again, it is the 8th part of the ordinary inch, like the jau or barleycorn of the Hindus (the 8th part of an angul or digit), of which jau, zdm is possibly a corruption. Again, the iṣḍba or inch, and the zdm or $\frac{1}{8}$ of an inch, had been transferred to the rude angle-instruments of the Arab navigators; and Prinsep deduces from statements in Sidi 'Ali's book that the iṣḍba was very nearly equal to 96' and the zdm to 12'. Prinsep had also found on enquiry among Arab mariners, that the term zām was still well known to nautical people as $\frac{1}{8}$ of a geographical degree, or 12 nautical miles, quite confirmatory of the former calculation; it was also stated to be still applied to terrestrial measurements (see J.A.S.B. v. 642-3).

1013.—“J'ai déjà parlé de Sérira (read Sarbaza) qui est située à l'extrémité de l'île de Lameri, à cont-vingt zāmā de Kala.”—Ajāib-al-Hind, ed. Van der Lith et Marcel Devic, 176.

“Un marin m'a rapporté qu'il avait fait la traversée de Sérira (Sarbaza) à la Chine dans un Sambouq (see SAMBOOK). ‘Nous avons parcouru,’ dit-il, ‘un espace de cinquante zāmā, lorsqu'une tempête fondit sur notre embarcation. . . . Ayant fait de l'eau, nous remîmes à la voile vers le Senf, suivant ses instructions, et nous y abordâmes sains et saufs, après un voyage de quinze zāmā.”—Ibid. pp. 190-91.

1554.—“26th VOYAGE from Calicut to Kardafun” (see GUARDAFUI).

“ . . . you run from Calicut to Kolfaini (i.e. Kalpeni, one of the Laccadive Ids.) two zāms in the direction of W. by S., the 8 or 9 zāms W.S.W. (this course is in the 9 degree channel through the Laccadives), then you may rejoice as you have got clear of the islands of Fúl, from thence W. by N. and W.N.W. till the pole is 4 inches and a quarter, and then true west to Kardafun.”

“27th VOYAGE, from Diú to Malucca.

“Leaving Diú you go first S.S.E. till the pole is 5 inches, and side then towards the land, till the distance between it and the ship is six zāms; from thence you steer S.S.E. . . . you must not side all at once but by degrees, first till the farkadain (β and γ in the Little Bear) are made by a quarter less than 8 inches, from thence to S.E. till the farkadain are $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches, from thence true east at a rate of 18 zāms, then you have passed Ceylon.”—The Mohit, in J.A.S.B. v. 465.

The meaning of this last roulier is: “Steer S.S.E. till you are in 8° N. Lat. (lat. of Cape Comorin); make then a little more easting, but keep 72 miles between you and the coast of Ceylon till you find the β and γ of Ursa Minor have an altitude of only 12° 24' (i.e. till you are in N. Lat. 6° or 5°), and then steer due east. When you have gone 216 miles you will be quite clear of Ceylon.”

1625.—“We cast anchor under the island of Kharg, which is distant from Cais, which we left behind us, 24 giam. Giam is a measure used by the Arab and Persian pilots in the Persian Gulf; and every giam is equal to 3 leagues; insomuch that from Cais to Kharg we had made 72 leagues.”—P. della Valle, ii. 816.

JAMBOO, JUMBOO, s. The Rose-apple, Eugenia jambos, L. Jambosa vulgaris, Decand.; Skt. jambū, Hind. jam, jambū, jamrūl, &c. This is the use in Bengal, but there is great confusion in application, both colloquially and in books. The name jambū is applied in some parts of India to the exotic guava (q.v.), as well as to other species of Eugenia; including the jāmun (see JAMOON), with which the rose-apple is often confounded in books. They are very different fruits, though they have both been classed by Linnaeus under the genus Eugenia (see further remarks under JAMOON). [Mr. Skeat notes that the word is applied by the Malays both to the rose-apple and the guava, and Wilkinson (Dict. s.v.) notes a large number of fruits to which the name jambū is applied.]

Garcia de Orta mentions the rose-apple under the name Iambos, and says (1563) that it had been recently introduced into Goa from Malacca. This may have been the Eugenia Malaccensis, L., which is stated in Forbes Watson's Catalogue of nomenclature to be called in Bengal Malaka Jamrūi, and in Tamil Malakā maram i.e. 'Malacca tree.' The Skt. name jambū is, in the Malay language, applied with distinguishing adjectives to all the species.

[1598.—"The trees whereon the Iambos do grow are as great as Plumtrees."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 31.]

1672. — P. Vincenzo Maria describes the Giambo d'India with great precision, and also the Giambo di China—no doubt J. malaccensis—but at too great length for extract, pp. 351-352.

1673.—"In the South a Wood of Jamboes, Mangoes, Coccoes."—Fryer, 46.

1727.—"Their Jambo Malacca (at Goa) is very beautiful and pleasant."—A. Hamilton, i. 255; [ed. 1744, i. 258].

1810.—"The jumboo, a species of rose-apple, with its flower like crimson tassels covering every part of the stem."—Maria Graham, 22.

JAMES AND MARY, n.p. The name of a famous sand-bank in the Hoogly R. below Calcutta, which has been fatal to many a ship. It is mentioned under 1748, in the record of a survey of the river quoted in Long, p. 10. It is a common allegation that the name is a corruption of the Hind. words jal mari, with the supposed meaning of 'dead water.' But the real origin of the name dates, as Sir G. Birdwood has shown, out of India Office records, from the wreck of a vessel called the "Royal James and Mary," in September 1694, on that sand-bank (Letter to the Court, from Chuttanuttee, Dec. 19, 1694). [Report on Old Records, 90.] This shoal appears by name in a chart belonging to the English Pilot, 1711.

JAMMA, s. P.—H. jāma, a piece of native clothing. Thus, in composition, see PYJAMMAS. Also stuff for clothing, &c., e.g. mom-jama, wax-cloth. ["The jama may have been brought by the Aryans from Central Asia, but as it is still now seen it is thoroughly Indian and of ancient date" (Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 187 seq.)

[1813.—"The better sort (of Hindus) wear . . . a jama, or long gown of white calico, which is tied round the middle with a fringed or embroidered sash."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 52].

JAMOON, s. Hind. jāmun, jāman, jāmlī, &c. The name of a poor fruit common in many parts of India, and apparently in E. Africa, the Eugenia jambolana, Lamk. (Calyptanthus jambolana of Willdenow, Syzygium jambolanum of Decand.) This seems to be confounded with the Eugenia jambos, or Rose-apple (see JAMBOO, above), by the author of a note on Leyden's Baber which Mr. Erskine justly corrects (Baber's own account is very accurate), by the translators of Ibn Batuta, and apparently, as regards the botanical name, by Sir R. Burton. The latter gives jāmlī as the Indian, and zam as the Arabic name. The name jambū appears to be applied to this fruit at Bombay, which of course promotes the confusion spoken of. In native practice the stones of this fruit have been alleged to be a cure for diabetes, but European trials do not seem to have confirmed this.

c. 13.—"The inhabitants (of Mombasa) gather also a fruit which they call jāmun, and which resembles an olive; it has a stone like the olive, but has a very sweet taste."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 191. Elsewhere the translators write ichoumoān (iii. 128, iv. 114, 229), a spelling indicated in the original, but surely by some error.

c. 1530.—"Another is the jaman. . . . It is on the whole a fine looking tree. Its fruit resembles the black grape, but has a more acid taste, and is not very good."—Baber, 325. The note on this runs: "This, Dr. Hunter says, is the Eugenia Jambolana, the rose-apple (Eugenia jambolana, but not the rose-apple, which is now called Eugenia jambu.—D.W.). The jāman has no resemblance to the rose-apple; it is more like an oblong sloe than anything else, but grows on a tall tree."

1563.—"I will eat of those olives, —, at least they look like such; but they are very astringent (ponticas) as if binding, —, and yet they do look like ripe Cordova olives.

"O. They are called jambolones, and grow wild in a wood that looks like a myrtle grove; in its leaves the tree resembles the arbutus; but like the jack, the people of the country don't hold this fruit for very wholesome."—Garcia, f. 111y.

1859.—“The Indian jamli. . . . It is a noble tree, which adorns some of the coast villages and plantations, and it produces a damson-like fruit, with a pleasant sub-acid flavour.”—Burton, in J.R.G.S. ix. 36.

JANCADA, s. This name was given to certain responsible guides in the Nair country who escorted travellers from one inhabited place to another, guaranteeing their security with their own lives, like the Bhāts of Guzerat. The word is Malayāl. channddam (i.e. changngādam, [the Madras Gloss. writes channdtam, and derives it from Skt. sanghāta, ‘union’]), with the same spelling as that of the word given as the origin of jangar or jangada, ‘a raft.’ These jancadas or jangadas seem also to have been placed in other confidential and dangerous charges. Thus:

1543.—“This man who so resolutely died was one of the jangadas of the Pagode. They are called jangades because the kings and lords of those lands, according to a custom of theirs, send as guardians of the houses of the Pagodes in their territories, two men as captains, who are men of honour and good cavaliers. Such guardians are called jangadas, and have soldiers of guard under them, and are as it were the Counsellors and Ministers of the affairs of the pagodes, and they receive their maintenance from the establishment and its revenues. And sometimes the king changes them and appoints others.”—Correa, iv. 328.

c. 1610.—“I travelled with another Captain . . . who had with him these Jangai, who are the Nair guides, and who are found at the gates of towns to act as escort to those who require them. . . . Every one takes them, the weak for safety and protection, those who are stronger, and travel in great companies and well armed, take them only as witnesses that they are not aggressors in case of any dispute with the Nairs.”—Pyrard de Laval, ch. xxv. ; [Hak. Soc. i. 339, and see Mr. Gray’s note in loco].

1672.—“The safest of all journeyings in India are those through the Kingdom of the Nairs and the Samorin, if you travel with Giancadas, the most perilous if you go alone. These Giancadas are certain heathen men, who venture their own life and the lives of their kinsfolk for small remuneration, to guarantee the safety of travellers.”—P. Vincenzo Maria, 127.

See also Chungathum, in Burton’s Goa, p. 198.

JANGAR, s. A raft. Port. jangada. [“A double platform canoe made by placing a floor of boards across two boats, with a bamboo railing.” (Madras Gloss.)] This word, chiefly colloquial, is the Tamil-Malayāl. shangādam, channdtam (for the derivation of which see JANCADA). It is a word of particular interest as being one of the few Dravidian words, [but perhaps ultimately of Skt. origin], preserved in the remains of classical antiquity, occurring in the Periplus as our quotation shows. Bluteau does not call the word an Indian term.

c. 80-90.—“The vessels belonging to these places (Camara, Poducē, and Sopatma on the east coast) which hug the shore to Limyricē (Dimyricē), and others also called Σάγγαρα, which consist of the largest canoes of single timbers lashed together; and again those biggest of all which sail to Chryse and Ganges, and are called Κολανδρόφωνα.”—Periplus, in Müller’s Geog. Gr. Min., i. “The first part of this name for boats or ships is most probably the Tam. kulinda=hollowed: the last ōdam=boat.”—Burnell, S.I. Palaeography, 612.

c. 1504.—“He held in readiness many jangadas of timber.”—Correa, Lendas, I. i. 476.

c. 1540.—“. . . and to that purpose had already commanded two great Rafts (jāgadas), covered with dry wood, barrels of pitch and other combustible stuff, to be placed at the entering into the Port.”—Pinto (orig. cap. xlv.), in Cogan, p. 56.

1553.—“. . . the fleet . . . which might consist of more than 200 rowing vessels of all kinds, a great part of them combined into jangadas in order to carry a greater mass of men, and among them two of these contrivances on which were 150 men.”—Barros, II. i. 5.

1598.—“Such as stayed in the ship, some tooke bords, deals, and other peeces of wood, and bound them together (which ye Portingals cal Iangadas) every man what they could catch, all hoping to save their lives, but of all those there came but two men safe to shore.”—Linschoten, p. 147 ; [Hak. Soc. ii. 181 ; and see Mr. Gray on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 53 seq.].

1602.—“For his object was to see if he could rescue them in jangadas, which he ordered him immediately to put together of baulks, planks, and oars.”—Couto, Dec. IV. liv. iv. cap. 10.

1756.—“. . . having set fire to a jungodo of Boats, these driving down towards the Fleet, compelled them to weigh.”—Capt. Jackson, in Dalrymple’s Or. Rep. i. 199.

c. 1790.—“Sangarie.” See quotation under HACKERY.

c. 1793.—“Nous nous remîmes en chemin à six heures du matin, et passâmes la rivière dans un sangarie ou canot fait d’un palmier creusé.”—Haafner, ii. 77.

tinta, the former passing for rubies."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 38.

JAROOL, s. The Lagerstroemia reginae, Roxb. H.-Beng. jarul, jdral. A tree very extensively diffused in the forests of Eastern and Western India and Pegu. It furnishes excellent boat-timber, and is a splendid flowering tree. "An exceeding glorious tree of the Concan jungles, in the month of May robed as in imperial purple, with its terminal panicles of large showy purple flowers. I for the first time introduced it largely into Bombay gardens, and called it Flos reginae"—Sir G. Birdwood, MS.

1850.—"Their forests are frequented by timber-cutters, who fell jarool, a magnificent tree with red wood, which, though soft, is durable under water, and therefore in universal use for boat building."—Hooker, Him. Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 318.

1855.—"Much of the way from Rangoon also, by the creeks, to the great river, was through actual dense forest, in which the jarool, covered with purple blossoms, made a noble figure."—Blackwood's Mag., May 1856, 538.

JASK, JASQUES, CAPE-, n.p. Ar. Rds Jāshak, a point on the eastern side of the Gulf of Omān, near the entrance to the Persian Gulf, and 6 miles south of a port of the same name. The latter was frequented by the vessels of the English Company whilst the Portuguese held Ormus. After the Portuguese were driven out of Ormus (1622) the English trade was moved to Gombroon (q.v.). The peninsula of which Cape Jask is the point, is now the terminus of the submarine cable from Bushire; and a company of native infantry is quartered there. Jdsak appears in Yākūt as "a large island between the land of Omān and the Island of Kish." No island corresponds to this description, and probably the reference is an incorrect one to Jask (see Dict. de la Perse, p. 149). By a curious misapprehension, Cape Jasques seems to have been Englished as Cape James (see Dunn's Or. Navigator, 1780, p. 94).

1553.—"Crossing from this Cape Moçandan to that opposite to it called Jasque, which with it forms the mouth of the strait, we enter on the second section (of the coast) according to our division. . . ."—Barros, I. ix. i.

November 22, 1614, in India Office; [Printed in Foster, Letters, ii. 177, and compare ii. 145].

1617.—"There came news at this time that there was an English ship lying inside the Cape of Rosalgate (see ROSALGAT) with the intention of making a fort at Jasques in Persia, as a point from which to plunder our cargoes. . . ."—Bocarro, 672.

1727.—"I'll travel along the Sea-coast, towards Industan, or the Great Mogul's Empire. All the Shore from Jasques to Sindy, is inhabited by uncivilized People, who admit of no Commerce with Strangers. . . ."—A. Hamilton, i. 115; [ed. 1744].

JASOOS, s. Ar.-H. jdsūs, 'a spy.'

1803.—"I have some Jasooses, selected by Col. C——'s brahmin for their stupidity, that they might not pry into state secrets, who go to Sindia's camp, remain there a phaur (see PUHUR) in fear. . . ."—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 62.

JAUN, s. This is a term used in Calcutta, and occasionally in Madras, of which the origin is unknown to the present writers. [Mr. H. Beveridge points out that it is derived from H.—Beng. yān, defined by Sir G. Haughton: "a vehicle, any means of conveyance, a horse, a carriage, a palkee." It is Skt. yāna, with the same meaning. The initial ya in Bengali is usually pronounced ja. The root is ya, 'to go.' It is, or was, applied to a small palankin carriage, such as is commonly used by business men in going to their offices, &c.

c. 1836.—

With its drab and yellow lining, and picked out black between,
Which down the Esplanade did go at the ninth hour of the day. . . ."—

[The Jaun Bazar is a well-known low quarter of Calcutta.]

JAVA, n.p. This is a geographical name of great antiquity, and occurs, as our first quotation shows, in Ptolemy's Tables. His Ἰαβὰδλον represents with singular correctness what was probably the Prakrit or popular form of Yava-dvīpa (see under DIU and MALDIVES), and his interpretation of the Sanskrit is perfectly correct. It will still remain a question whether Yava was not applied to some cereal more congenial to the latitude than barley,* or was (as is possible) an attempt to give an Indian meaning to some aboriginal name of similar sound. But the sixth of our quotations, the transcript and translation of a Sanskrit inscription in the Museum at Batavia by Mr. Holle, which we owe to the kindness of Prof. Kern, indicates that a signification of wealth in cereals was attached to the name in the early days of its Indian civilization. This inscription is most interesting, as it is the oldest dated inscription yet discovered upon Javanese soil. Till a recent time it was not known that there was any mention of Java in Sanskrit literature, and this was so when Lassen published the 2nd vol. of his Indian Antiquities (1849). But in fact Java was mentioned in the Rāmāyana, though a perverted reading disguised the fact until the publication of the Bombay edition in 1863. The passage is given in our second quotation; and we also give passages from two later astronomical works whose date is approximately known. The Yava-Koṭi, or Java Point of these writers is understood by Prof. Kern to be the eastern extremity of the island.

* The Teutonic word Corn affords a handy instance of the varying application of the name of a cereal to that which is, or has been, the staple grain of each country. Corn in England familiarly means 'wheat'; in Scotland 'oats'; in Germany 'rye'; in America 'maize.'

We have already (see BENJAMIN) alluded to the fact that the terms Jāva, Jāvi were applied by the Arabs to the Archipelago generally, and often with specific reference to Sumatra. Prof. Kern, in a paper to which we are largely indebted, has indicated that this larger application of the term was originally Indian. He has discussed it in connection with the terms "Golden and Silver Islands" (Suvarṇa dvīpa and Rūpya dvīpa), which occur in the quotation from the Rāmāyana, and elsewhere in Sanskrit literature, and which evidently were the basis of the Chrysē and Argyrē, which take various forms in the writings of the Greek and Roman geographers. We cannot give the details of his discussion, but his condensed conclusions are as follows:— (1.) Suvarṇa-dvīpa and Yava-dvīpa were according to the prevalent representations the same; (2.) Two names of islands originally distinct were confounded with one another; (3.) Suvarṇa-dvīpa in its proper meaning is Sumatra, Yava-dvīpa in its proper meaning is Java; (4.) Sumatra, or a part of it, and Java were regarded as one whole, doubtless because they were politically united; (5.) By Yava-koṭi was indicated the east point of Java.

This Indian (and also insular) identification, in whole or in part, of Sumatra with Java explains a variety of puzzles, e.g. not merely the Arab application of Java, but also the ascription, in so many passages, of great wealth of gold to Java, though the island, to which that name properly belongs, produces no gold. This tradition of gold-produce we find in the passages quoted from Ptolemy, from the Rāmāyana, from the Holle inscription, and from Marco Polo. It becomes quite intelligible when we are taught that Java and Sumatra were at one time both embraced under the former name, for Sumatra has always been famous for its gold-production. [Mr. Skeat notes as an interesting fact that the standard Malay name Jāwā and the Javanese Jāwa preserve the original form of the word.]

(Ancient).—"Search carefully Yava dvipa, adorned by seven Kingdoms, the Gold and Silver Island, rich in mines of gold. Beyond Yava dvipa is the Mountain called Sisira, whose top touches the sky, and which is visited by gods and demons."—Rāmāyana, IV. xl. 30 (from Kern).

A.D. c. 150.—"Iabadiu ('Iaβaδlou), which means 'Island of Barley,' most fruitful the island is said to be, and also to produce much gold; also the metropolis is said to have the name Argyrē (Silver), and to stand at the western end of the island."—Ptolemy, VII. ii. 29.

414.—"Thus they voyaged for about ninety days, when they arrived at a country called Ya-va-di [i.e. Yava-dvīpa]. In this country heretics and Brahmans flourish, but the Law of Buddha hardly deserves mentioning."—Fahian, ext. in Groeneveldt's Notes from Chinese Sources.

A.D. c. 500.—"When the sun rises in Ceylon it is sunset in the City of the Blessed (Siddha-pura, i.e. The Fortunate Islands), noon at Yava-koti, and midnight in the Land of the Romans."—Aryabhata, IV. v. 13 (from Kern).

A.D. c. 650.—"Eastward by a fourth part of the earth's circumference, in the world-quarter of the Bhadrāsvas lies the City famous under the name of Yava koti whose walls and gates are of gold."—Surya-Siddhanta, XII. v. 38 (from Kern).

Saka, 654, i.e. A.D. 762.—"Dvīpavaram Yavākhyam atulan dhān-yādivājāhikam sampannam kanakākaraḥ" . . . i.e. the incomparable splendid island called Java, excessively rich in grain and other seeds, and well provided with gold-mines."—Inscription in Batavia Museum (see above).

943.—"Eager . . . to study with my own eyes the peculiarities of each country, I have with this object visited Sind and Zanj, and Sanf (see CHAMPA) and Sin (China), and Zābaj."—Mas'ūdī, i. 5.

„ "This Kingdom (India) borders upon that of Zābaj, which is the empire of the Mahrāj, King of the Isles."—Ibid. 163.

992.—"Djava is situated in the Southern Ocean. . . . In the 12th month of the year (992) their King Maradja sent an embassy . . . to go to court and bring tribute."—Groeneveldt's Notes from Chinese Sources, pp. 15-17.

1298.—"When you sail from Ziamba (Chamba) 1500 miles in a course between south and south-east, you come to a very great island called Java, which, according to the statement of some good mariners, is the greatest Island that there is in the world, seeing that it has a compass of more than 3000 miles, and is under the dominion of a great king. . . . Pepper, nutmegs, spike, galanga, cubebs, cloves, and all the other good spices are produced in this island, and it is visited by many ships with quantities of merchandise from which they make great profits and gain, for such an amount of gold is found there that no one would believe it or venture to tell it."—Marco Polo, in Ramusio, ii. 51.

c. 1330.—"In the neighbourhood of that realm is a great island, Java by name, which hath a compass of a good 3000 miles. Now this island is populous exceedingly, and is the second best of all islands that exist. . . . The King of this island hath a palace which is truly marvellous. . . . Now the great Khan of Cathay many a time engaged in war with this King; but this King always vanquished and got the better of him."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 87-89.

c. 1349.—"She clandestinely gave birth to a daughter, whom she made when grown up Queen of the finest island in the world, Saba by name. . . ."—John de' Marignolli, ibid. 391.

c. 1444.—"Sunt insulae duae in interiori India, e pene extremis orbis finibus, ambae Java nomine, quarum altera tribus, altera duobus millibus milliarum protenditur orientem versus; sed Majoris, Minorisque cognomine discernuntur."—N. Conti, in Poggius, De Var. Fortunae.

1503.—The Syrian Bishops Thomas, Jaballaha, Jacob, and Denha, sent on a mission to India in 1503 by the (Nestorian) Patriarch Elias, were ordained to go "to the land of the Indians and the islands of the seas which are between Dabag and Sin and Masin (see MACHEEN)."—Assemani, III. Pt. i. 592. This Dabag is probably a relic of the Zabaj of the Relation, of Mas'ūdī, and of Al-birūnī.

1516.—"Further on . . . there are many islands, small and great, amongst which is one very large which they call Java the Great. . . . They say that this island is the most abundant country in the world. . . . There grow pepper, cinnamon, ginger, bamboos, cubebs, and gold. . . ."—Barbosa, 197.

Referring to Sumatra, or the Archipelago in general.

Saka, 578, i.e. A.D. 656.—"The Prince Adityadharma is the Deva of the First Java Land (prathama Yava-bhū). May he be great! Written in the year of Saka, 578. May it be great!"—From a Sanskrit Inscription from Pager-Ruyong, in Menang Karbau (Sumatra), publ. by Friedrich, in the Batavian Transactions, vol. xxiii.

1224.—"Ma'bar (q.v.) is the last part of India; then comes the country of China (Sin), the first part of which is Jāwa, reached by a difficult and fatal sea."—Fakūt, i. 516.

„ "This is some account of remotest Sin, which I record without vouching for its truth . . . for in sooth it is a far off land. I have seen no one who had gone to it and penetrated far into it; only the merchants seek its outlying parts, to wit the country known as Jāwa on the sea-coast, like to India; from it are brought Aloeswood ('ūd), camphor, and nard (sunbul), and clove, and mace (basbāsa), and China drugs, and vessels of china-ware."—Ibid. iii. 445.

original in the Darbar room" (M.-Gen. Keatinge). ["The masjid with three domes of white marble occupies the left wing and has a counterpart (jawāb) in a precisely similar building on the right hand side of the Tāj. This last is sometimes called the false masjid; but it is in no sense dedicated to religious purposes."—Führer, Monumental Antiquities, N.W.P., p. 64.]

JAY, s. The name usually given by Europeans to the Coracias Indica, Linn., the Nilkanth, or 'blue-throat' of the Hindus, found all over India.

[1878.—"They are the commonality of birddom, who furnish forth the mobs which bewilder the drunken-flighted jay when he jerks, shrieking in a series of blue hyphen-flashes through the air. . . ."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 3.]

JEEL, s. Hind. jhīl. A stagnant sheet of inundation; a mere or lagoon. Especially applied to the great sheets of remanent inundation in Bengal. In Eastern Bengal they are also called bheel (q.v).

[1757.—"Towards five the guard waked me with notice that the Nawab would presently pass by to his palace of Mootee jeel."—Holwell's Letter of Feb. 28, in Wheeler, Early Records, 250.]

The Jhīls of Silhet are vividly and most accurately described (though the word is not used) in the following passage:—

c. 1778.—"I shall not therefore be disbelieved when I say that in pointing my boat towards Sylhet I had recourse to my compass, the same as at sea, and steered a straight course through a lake not less than 100 miles in extent, occasionally passing through villages built on artificial mounds: but so scanty was the ground that each house had a canoe attached to it."—Hon. Robert Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 166.

1824.—"At length we . . . entered what might be called a sea of reeds. It was, in fact, a vast jeel or marsh, whose tall rushes rise above the surface of the water, having depth enough for a very large vessel. We sailed briskly on, rustling like a greyhound in a field of corn."—Heber, i. 101.

1850.—"To the geologist the Jheels and Sunderbunds are a most instructive region, as whatever may be the mean elevation of their waters, a permanent depression of 10 to 15 feet would submerge an immense tract."—Hooker's Himalayan Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 265.

1885.—"You attribute to me an act, the credit of which was due to Lieut. George Hutchinson, of the late Bengal Engineers.* That able officer, in company with the late Colonel Berkley, H.M. 32nd Regt., laid out the defences of the Alum Bagh camp, remarkable for its bold plan, which was so well devised that, with an apparently dangerous extent, it was defensible at every point by the small but ever ready force under Sir James Outram. A long interval . . . was defended by a post of support called 'Moir's Picket' . . . covered by a wide expanse of jheel, or lake, resulting from the rainy season. Foreseeing the probable drying up of the water, Lieut. Hutchinson, by a clever inspiration, marched all the transport elephants through and through the lake, and when the water disappeared, the dried clay-bed, pierced into a honey-combed surface of circular holes a foot in diameter and two or more feet deep, became a better protection against either cavalry or infantry than the water had been. . . ."—Letter to Lt.-Col. P. R. Innes from F. M. Lord Napier of Magdala, dd. April 15.

Jeel and bheel are both applied to the artificial lakes in Central India and Bundelkhand.

JEETUL, s. Hind. jītal. A very old Indian denomination of copper coin, now entirely obsolete. It long survived on the western coast, and the name was used by the Portuguese for one of their small copper coins in the forms ceitils and zoitoles. It is doubtful, however, if ceitil is the same word. At least there is a medieval Portuguese coin called ceitil and ceptil (see Fernandes, in Memorias da Academia Real das Sciencias de Lisboa, 2da Classe, 1856); this may have got confounded with the Indian Jital. The jītal of the Delhi coinage of Alā-ud-dīn (c. 1300) was, according to Mr. E. Thomas's calculations, $\frac{1}{4}$ of the silver tanga, the coin called in later days the rupee. It was therefore just the equivalent of our modern pice. But of course, like most modern denominations of coin, it has varied greatly.

c. 1193-4.—"According to Kutb-ud-Dīn's command, Nizam-ud-Dīn Mohammad, on his return, brought them [the two slaves] along with him to the capital, Dihli; and Malik Kutb-ud-Dīn purchased both the Turks for the sum of 100,000 jitals."—Raverty, Tabakat-i-Nasiri, p. 603.

c. 1290.—"In the same year . . . there was dearth in Dehli, and grain rose to a jital per sir (see SEER)."—Zidh-ud-dīn Barāt, in Elliot, iii. 146.

* Afterwards M.-Gen. G. Hutchinson, C.B., C.S.I., Sec. to the Ch. Missy. Society.

c. 1340.—“The dirhem sulṭānī is worth $\frac{1}{2}$ of the dirhem shahīdānī . . . and is worth $\frac{3}{4}$ ṣāṭ, whilst the jūṭāl is worth 4 ṣāṭ; and the dirhem hashkīdānī, which is exactly the silver dirhem of Egypt and Syria, is worth 52 ṣāṭ.”—Shihabuddin, in Notices et Extraits, xiii. 212.

1554.—In Sunda. “The cash (cairas) here go 120 to the tanga of silver; the which cairas are a copper money larger than ostills, and pierced in the middle, which they say have come from China for many years, and the whole place is full of them.”—A. Nunes, 42.

c. 1590.—“For the purposes of calculation the dam is divided into 25 parts, each of which is called a jūṭāl. This imaginary division is only used by accountants.”—Ata, ed. Blockmann, i. 31.

1678.—“48 Juttālā, 1 Pagod, an Imaginary Coin.”—Fryer (at Surat), 206.

c. 1750-60.—“At Carwar 6 pieces make the juttāl, and 48 juttālā a Pagoda.”—Grose, i. 282.

JEHAUD, a. Ar. jihād, [‘an effort, a striving’]; then a sacred war of Muslims against the infidel; which Sir Herbert Edwards called, not very neatly, ‘a crescentade.’

[c. 630 A.D.—“Make war upon such of those to whom the Scriptures have been given who believe not in God, or in the last day, and who forbid not that which God and his Prophet have forbidden, and who profess not the profession of the truth, until they pay tribute (jizyah) out of hand, and they be humbled.”—Kordā, Surah ix. 29.]

1880.—“When the Athenians invaded Ephesus, towards the end of the Peloponnesian War, Tissaphernes offered a mighty sacrifice at Artemis, and raised the people in a sort of Jehād, or holy war, for her defence.”—Sat. Review, July 17, 846.

[1901.—“The matter has now assumed the aspect of a ‘Ṣḥād,’ or holy war against Christianity.”—Times, April 4.]

JELAUBEE, a. Hind. jalebi, [which is apparently a corruption of the Ar. zaldibiya, P. zāḍibiya]. A rich sweetmeat made of sugar and ghee, with a little flour, melted and trickled into a pan so as to form a kind of interlaced work, when baked.

[1870.—“The poison is said to have been given once in sweetmeats, Jelabees.”—Chevers, Med. Jurisp. 178.]

JELLY, a. In South India this is applied to vitrified brick refuse used as metal for roads. [The Madras Gloss. gives it as a synonym for kunkur.] It would appear from a remark of

C. P. Brown (MS. notes) to be Telugu zalki, Tam. shalki, which means properly ‘shivers, bits, pieces.’

[1868.—“ . . . anicots in some instances coated over the crown with jelly in chunam.”—Nelson, Man. of Madras, Pt. v. 53.]

JELUM, n.p. The most westerly of the “Five Rivers” that give their name to the Punjab (q.v.), (among which the Indus itself is not usually included). Properly Jailam or Jilam, now apparently written Jhilam, and taking this name from a town on the right bank. The Jhilam is the Tádorras of Alexander’s historians, a name corrupted from the Skt. Vitasta, which is more nearly represented by Ptolemy’s Bádorras. A still further (Prakritic) corruption of the same is Behat (see BEHUT).

1087.—“Here he (Mahmūd) fell ill, and remained sick for fourteen days, and got no better. So in a fit of repentance he forswore wine, and ordered his servants to throw all his supply . . . into the Jailam . . .”—Bairakti, in Elliot, ii. 139.

c. 1204.—“ . . . in the height of the conflict, Shams-ud-din, in all his panoply, rode right into the water of the river Jilam . . . and his warlike feats while in that water reached such a pitch that he was despatching those infidels from the height of the waters to the lowest depths of Hell . . .”—Tabakāt, by Raverty, 604-5.

“Hydaspes! often have thy waves run tuned
To battle music, since the soldier King,
The Macedonian, dipped his golden casque
And swam thy swollen flood, until the time
When Night the peace-maker, with pious hand, Unclasping her dark mantle, smoothed it soft
O’er the pale faces of the brave who slept Cold in their clay, on Chilian’s bloody field.”
The Banyan Tree.

JEMADAR, JEMAUTDAR, &c. Hind. from Ar.—P. jama’dar, jama’ meaning ‘an aggregate,’ the word indicates generally, a leader of a body of individuals. [Some of the forms are as if from Ar.—P. jama’at, ‘an assemblage.’] Technically, in the Indian army, it is the title of the second rank of native officer in a company of sepoy, the Sūbadār (see SOUBADAR) being the first. In this sense the word dates from the re-organisation of the army in 1768. It is also applied to certain officers of police (under the dārogah), of the customs, and of other civil departments. And in larger domestic establishments there is often a jemadar, who is over the servants generally, or over the stables, camp service and orderlies. It is also an honorific title often used by the other household servants in addressing the bishahi (see BHEESTY).

1752.—"The English battalion no sooner quitted Trichinopoly than the regent set about accomplishing his scheme of surprising the City, and . . . endeavoured to gain 600 of the Nabob's best peons with firelocks. The jemadars, or captains of these troops, received his bribes and promised to join."—Orme, ed. 1808, i. 267.

1817.—". . . Calland had commenced an intrigue with some of the jemadars, or captains of the enemy's troops, when he received intelligence that the French had arrived at Trichinopoly."—Mill, iii. 176.

1824.—"'Abdullah' was a Mussulman convert of Mr. Corrie's, who had travelled in Persia with Sir Gore Ouseley, and accompanied him to England, from whence he was returning . . . when the Bishop took him into his service as a 'jemantdar,' or head officer of the peons."—Editor's note to Heber, ed. 1844, i. 65.

[1826.—"The principal officers are called Jummadars, some of whom command five thousand horse."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 56.]

JENNYE, n.p. Hind. Jamai. The name of a great river in Bengal, which is in fact a portion of the course of the Brahmaputra (see BURRAM-FOOTER), and the conditions of which are explained in the following passage written by one of the authors of this Glossary many years ago: "In Rennell's time, the Burrampooter, after issuing westward from the Assam valley, swept south-eastward, and forming with the Ganges a fluvial peninsula, entered the sea abreast of that river below Dacca. And so almost all English maps persist in representing it, though this eastern channel is now, unless in the rainy season, shallow and insignificant; the vast body of the Burrampooter cutting across the neck of the peninsula under the name of Jamai, and uniting with the Ganges near Puhna (about 150 miles N.E. of Calcutta), from which point the two rivers under the name of Pudda (Padda) flow on in mighty union to the sea." (Blackwood's Mag., March 1852, p. 338.)

The river is indicated as an offshoot of the Burrampooter in Rennell's Bengal Atlas (Map No. 6) under the name of Jenni, but it is not mentioned in his Memoir of the Map of Hindostan. The great change of the river's course was palpably imminent at the beginning of the last century; for Buchanan (c. 1809) says: "The river threatens to carry away all the vicinity of Dewangunj, and perhaps to force its way into the heart of Nator." (Eastern India, iii. 394; see also 377.) Nator or Nattore was the territory now called Rajshahi District. The real direction of the change has been further south. The Jamai is also called the Jamuna (see under JUMNA). Hooker calls it Jummai (?) noticing that the maps still led him to suppose the Burrampooter flowed 70 miles further east (see Him. Journals, ed. 1866, ii. 259).

JENNYRICKSHAW, s. Read Capt. Gill's description below. Giles states the word to be taken from the Japanese pronunciation of three characters, reading jin-ri-ki-sha, signifying 'Man—Strength—Cart.' The term is therefore, observes our friend E. C. Baber, an exact equivalent of "Pull-man-Car!" The article has been introduced into India, and is now in use at Simla and other hill-stations. (The invention of the vehicle is attributed to various people—to an Englishman known as "Public-spirited Smith" (8 ser. Notes and Queries, viii. 325); to native Japanese about 1863-70, or to an American named Goble, "half-cobbler and half-missionary." See Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 236 seq.)

1876.—"A machine called a jinnyrickshaw is the usual public conveyance of Shanghai. This is an importation from Japan, and is admirably adapted for the flat country, where the roads are good, and coolie hire cheap. . . . In shape they are like a buggy, but very much smaller, with room inside for one person only. One coolie goes into the shafts and runs along at the rate of 6 miles an hour; if the distance is long, he is usually accompanied by a companion who runs behind, and they take it in turn to draw the vehicle."—W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 19. See also p. 163.

1880.—"The Kuruma or jin-ri-ki-sha consists of a light perambulator body, an adjustable hood of oiled paper, a velvet or silk lining and cushion, a well for parcels under the seat, two high slim wheels, and a pair of shafts connected by a bar at the ends."—Miss Bird, Japan, i. 18.

[1885.—"We . . . got into rickshaws to make an otherwise impossible descent."

the theatre." — Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 89.]

JEZYA, s. Ar. jizya. The poll-tax which the Musulman law imposes on subjects who are not Moslem.

[c. 630 A.D. See under JEHAUD.]

c. 1300. — "The Kāzi replied . . . 'No doctor but the great doctor (Hanifa) to whose school we belong, has assented to the imposition of Jizya on Hindus. Doctors of other schools allow of no alternative but "Death or Islam."'" — Ẓiā-ud-dīn Barnī, in Elliot, iii. 184.

1688. — "Understand what custome ye English paid formerly, and compare ye difference between that and our last order for taking custome and Jidgea. If they pay no more than they did formerly, they complain without occasion. If more, write what it is, and there shall be an abatement." — Vizier's Letter to Nabob, in Hedges, Diary, July 18; [Hak. Soc. i. 100].

1686. — "Books of accounts received from Dacca, with advice that it was reported at the Court there that the Poll-money or Judgeea lately ordered by the Mogul would be exacted of the English and Dutch. . . . Among the orders issued to Pattana Cossum-bazar, and Dacca, instructions are given to the latter place not to pay the Judgeea or Poll-tax, if demanded." — Ft. St. Geo. Consns. (on Tour) Sept. 29 and Oct. 10; Notes and Extracts, No. i. p. 49.

1765. — "When the Hindoo Rajahs . . . submitted to Tamarlane; it was on these capital stipulations: That . . . the emperors should never impose the jesserah (or poll-tax) upon the Hindoos." — Holwell, Hist. Events, i. 37.

JHAUMP, s. A hurdle of matting and bamboo, used as a shutter or door. Hind. jhānp, Mahr. jhānpa; in connection with which there are verbs, Hind. jhānp-nā, jhānpnd, dhānpnd, 'to cover.' See jhoprā, s.v. ak; [but there seems to be no etymological connection].

JHOOM, s. jhūm. This is a word used on the eastern frontiers of Bengal for that kind of cultivation which is practised in the hill forests of India and Indo-China, under which a tract is cleared by fire, cultivated for a year or two, and then abandoned for another tract, where a like process is pursued. This is the Kumari (see COOMRY) of S.W. India, the Chena of Ceylon (see Emerson Tennent, ii. 463), the toung-gyan of Burma [Gazetteer, ii. 72, 757, the dahya of North India (Skt. dah, 'to burn'), ponam (Tam. pun, 'inferior'), or ponacaud (Mal. punak- kātu, pun, 'inferior,' kātu, 'forest') of Malabar]. In the Philippine Islands it is known as gainges; it is practised in the Ardennes, under the name of sartage, and in Sweden under the name of svedjande (see Marsh, Earth as Modified by Human Action, 346).

[1800. — "In this hilly tract are a number of people . . . who use a kind of cultivation called the Cotucadu, which a good deal resembles that which in the Eastern parts of Bengal is called Jumea." — Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 177.]

1883. — "It is now many years since Government, seeing the waste of forest caused by juming, endeavoured to put a stop to the practice. . . . The people jumed as before, regardless of orders." — Indian Agriculturist, Sept. (Calcutta).

1885. — "Juming disputes often arose, one village against another, both desiring to jum the same tract of jungle, and these cases were very troublesome to deal with. The juming season commences about the middle of May, and the air is then darkened by the smoke from the numerous clearings. . . ." (Here follows an account of the process). — Lt.-Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 348 seqq.

JIGGY - JIGGY, adv. Japanese equivalent for 'make haste!' The Chinese syllables chih-chih, given as the origin, mean 'straight, straight!' Qu. 'right ahead'? (Bp. Moule).

JILLMILL, s. Venetian shutters, or as they are called in Italy, persiane. The origin of the word is not clear. The Hind. word 'jhilmilā' seems to mean 'sparkling,' and to have been applied to some kind of gauze. Possibly this may have been used for blinds, and thence transferred to shutters. [So Platts in his H. Dict.] Or it may have been an onomatopoeia, from the rattle of such shutters; or it may have been corrupted from a Port. word such as janella, 'a window.' All this is conjecture.

[1832. — "Besides the purdahs, the openings between the pillars have blinds neatly made of bamboo strips, wove together with coloured cords: these are called jhilmuns or cheeks" (see CHICK, a). — Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 306.]

1874. — "The front (of a Bengal house) is generally long, exhibiting a pillared verandah, or a row of French casements, and jillmilled windows." — Calc. Review, No. cxvii. 207.

JOCOLE, s. We know not what this word is; perhaps 'toys'? [Mr.

W. Foster writes: "On looking up the I.O. copy of the Ft. St. George Consultations for Nov. 22, 1703, from which Wheeler took the passage, I found that the word is plainly not jocolles, but jocollet, which is a not unusual form of chocolate." The N.E.D. s.v. Chocolate, gives as other forms jocolatte, jacolatt, jocalat.]

1703.—". . . sent from the Patriarch to the Governor with a small present of jocolles, oil, and wines."—In Wheeler, ii. 32.

JOGEE, s. Hind. jogī. A Hindu ascetic; and sometimes a 'conjurer.' From Skt. yogin, one who practises the yoga, a system of meditation combined with austerities, which is supposed to induce miraculous power over elementary matter. In fact the stuff which has of late been propagated in India by certain persons, under the names of theosophy and esoteric Buddhism, is essentially the doctrine of the Jogis.

1343.—"We cast anchor by a little island near the main, Anchediva (q.v.), where there was a temple, a grove, and a tank of water. . . . We found a jogī leaning against the wall of a budkhāna or temple of idols" (respecting whom he tells remarkable stories).—Ibn Batuta, iv. 62-63, and see p. 275.

c. 1442.—"The Infidels are divided into a great number of classes, such as the Bramins, the Joghīs and others."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in the XVth Cent., 17.

1510.—"The King of the Ioghe is a man of great dignity, and has about 30,000 people, and he is a pagan, he and all his subjects; and by the pagan Kings he and his people are considered to be saints, on account of their lives, which you shall hear . . ."—Varthema, p. 111. Perhaps the chief of the Gorakhnātha Gosains, who were once very numerous on the West Coast, and have still a settlement at Kadri, near Mangalore. See P. della Valle's notice below.

1516.—"And many of them noble and respectable people, not to be subject to the Moors, go out of the Kingdom, and take the habit of poverty, wandering the world . . . they carry very heavy chains round their necks and waists, and legs; and they smear all their bodies and faces with ashes. . . . These people are commonly called jogues, and in their own speech they are called Zoume (see SWAMY) which means Servant of God. . . . These jogues eat all meats, and do not observe any idolatry."—Barbosa, 99-100.

1553.—"Much of the general fear that affected the inhabitants of that city (Goa before its capture) proceeded from a Gentoo, of Bengal by nation, who went about in the habit of a Jogue, which is the straitest sect of their Religion . . . saying that the City would speedily have a new Lord, and would be inhabited by a strange people, contrary to the will of the natives."—De Barros, Dec. II. liv. v. cap. 3.

"For this reason the place (Adam's Peak) is so famous among all the Gentile-dom of the East yonder, that they resort thither as pilgrims from more than 1000 leagues off, and chiefly those whom they call Jogues, who are as men who have abandoned the world and dedicated themselves to God, and make great pilgrimages to visit the Temples consecrated to him."—Ibid. Dec. III. liv. ii. cap. 1.

1563.—". . . to make them fight, like the cobras de capello which the jogues carry about asking alms of the people, and these jogues are certain heathen (Gentios) who go begging all about the country, powdered all over with ashes, and venerated by all the poor heathen, and by some of the Moors also. . . ."—Garcia, f. 156v, 157.

[1567.—"Jogues." See under CASIS.

[c. 1610.—"The Gentiles have also their Abedalles (Abd-Allah), which are like to our hermits, and are called Jogues."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 343.]

1624.—"Finally I went to see the King of the Jogis (Gioghi) where he dwelt at that time, under the shade of a cottage, and I found him roughly occupied in his affairs as a man of the field and husbandman . . . they told me his name was Batinata, and that the hermitage and the place generally was called Cadira (Kadri)."—P. della Valle, ii. 724; [Hak. Soc. ii. 350, and see i. 37, 75].

[1667.—"I allude particularly to the people called Jauguis, a name which signifies 'united to God.'"—Bernier, ed. Constable, 316.]

1673.—"Near the Gate in a Choultry sate more than Forty naked Jougies, or men united to God, covered with Ashes and pleited Turbats of their own Hair."—Fryer, 160.

1727.—"There is another sort called Jougies, who . . . go naked except a bit of Cloth about their Loyns, and some deny themselves even that, delighting in Nastiness, and an holy Obscenity, with a great the infidels have reported that Sultán Fíroz went specially to see this idol, and held a golden umbrella over its head. But . . . the infidels slandered the Sultán. . . . Other infidels said that Sultán Muhammad Sháh bin Tughlik Sháh held an umbrella over this same idol, but this also is a lie. . . .”—Shams-i-Siráj Afif, in Elliot, iii. 318.

1616.—“ . . . a place called Ialla mokee, where out of cold Springs and hard Rocks, there are daily to be seen incessant Eruptions of Fire, before which the Idolatrous people fall down and worship.”—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1467.

[c. 1617.—In Sir T. Roe's Map, “Jalla-makee, the Pilgrimage of the Banians.”—Hak. Soc. ii. 535.]

1783.—“At Taullah Mhokee (sic) a small volcanic fire issues from the side of a mountain, on which the Hindoos have raised a temple that has long been of celebrity, and favourite resort among the people of the Punjab.”—G. Forster's Journey, ed. 1798, i. 308.

1799.—“Prason Poory afterwards travelled . . . to the Maha or Buree (i.e. larger) Jowalla Mookhi or Juála Múchi, terms that mean a ‘Flaming Mouth,’ as being a spot in the neighbourhood of Bakee (Baku) on the west side of the (Caspian) Sea . . . whence fire issues; a circumstance that has rendered it of great veneration with the Hindus.”—Jonathan Duncan, in As. Res. v. 41.

JOWAUR, JOWARREE, s. Hind. jawār, juār, [Skt. yava-prakāra or akāra, ‘of the nature of barley’;] Sorghum vulgare, Pers. (Holcus sorghum, L.) one of the best and most frequently grown of the tall millets of southern countries. It is grown nearly all over India in the unflooded tracts; it is sown about July and reaped in November. The reedy stems are 8 to 12 feet high. It is the chulam of the Tamil regions. The stalks are Kirbee. The Ar. dura or dhura is perhaps the same word ultimately as jawār; for the old Semitic name is dokn, from the smoky aspect of the grain. It is an odd instance of the looseness which used to pervade dictionaries and glossaries that R. Drummond (Illus. of the Gram. Parts of Guzerattee, &c., Bombay, 1808) calls “Jooar, a kind of pulse, the food of the common people.”

[c. 1590.—In Khandesh “Jowari is chiefly cultivated of which, in some places, there are three crops in a year, and its stalk is so delicate and pleasant to the taste that it is regarded in the light of a fruit.”—Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 223.]

1760.—“En suite mauvais chemin sur des levées faites de boue dans des quarrés de Jouari et des champs de Nelis (see NELLY) remplis d'eau.”—Anquetil du Perron, I. cccclxxxiii.

1800.—“ . . . My industrious followers must live either upon jowarry, of which there is an abundance everywhere, or they must be more industrious in procuring rice for themselves.”—Wellington, i. 175.

1813.—Forbes calls it “juarree or cush-cush” (?). [See CUSCUS.]—Or. Mem. ii. 406; [2nd ed. ii. 35, and i. 23].

1819.—“In 1797-8 joiwaree sold in the Muchoo Kaunta at six rupees per culsee (see CULSEY) of 24 maunds.”—Macmurdo, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 287.

[1826.—“And the sabre began to cut away upon them as if they were a field of Joanee (standing corn).”—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873 i. 66.]

JOY, s. This seems from the quotation to have been used on the west coast for jewel (Port. joia).

1810.—“The vanity of parents sometimes leads them to dress their children, even while infants, in this manner, which affords a temptation . . . to murder these helpless creatures for the sake of their ornaments or joys.”—Maria Graham, 3.

JUBTEE, JUPTEE, &c., s. Guz. japti, &c. Corrupt forms of zabt. [“Watan-zabt, or -japti, Mahr., Produce of lands sequestered by the State, an item of revenue; in Guzerat the lands once exempt, now subject to assessment” (Wilson).] (See ZUBT.)

1808.—“The Sindias as Sovereigns of Broach used to take the revenues of Mooj-moodars and Desoys (see DESSAYE) of that district every third year, amounting to Rs. 58,390, and called the periodical confiscation Juptee.”—R. Drummond. [Majmūdār “in Guzerat the title given to the keepers of the pargana revenue records, who have held the office as a hereditary right since the settlement of Todar Mal, and are paid by fees charged on the villages.” (Wilson).]

JUDEA, ODIA, &c., n.p. These names are often given in old writers to the city of Ayuthia, or Ayodhya, or Yuthia (so called apparently after the Hindu city of Rāma, Ayodhya, which we now call Oudh), which was the capital of Siam from the 14th century down to about 1767, when it was destroyed by the Burmese, and the Siamese royal residence was transferred to Bangkok [see BANCOCK.]

1522.—“All these cities are constructed like ours, and are subject to the King of Siam, who is named Siri Zacabedera, and who inhabits Iudia.”—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 156.

c. 1546.—“The capitall City of all this Empire is Odiaa, whereof I haue spoken heretofore: it is fortified with walls of brick and mortar, and contains, according to some, foure hundred thousand fires, whereof an hundred thousand are strangers of diuers countries.”—Pinto, in Cogan's E.T. p. 285; orig. cap. clxxxix.

1553.—“For the Realm is great, and its Cities and Towns very populous; insomuch that the city Hudia alone, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Siam (Siao), and the residence of the King, furnishes 50,000 men of its own.”—Barros, III. ii. 5.

1614.—“As regards the size of the City of Odia . . . it may be guessed by an experiment made by a curious engineer with whom we communicated on the subject. He says that . . . he embarked in one of the native boats, small, and very light, with the determination to go all round the City (which is entirely compassed by water), and that he started one day from the Portuguese settlement, at dawn, and when he got back it was already far on in the night, and he affirmed that by his calculation he had gone more than 8 leagues.”—Couto, VI. vii. 9.

1617.—“The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangama (see JANGOMAY) arrived at ‘the city of Judea’ before Eaton’s coming away from thence, and brought great store of merchandize.”—Sainsbury, ii. 90.

„ “1 (letter) from Mr. Benjamyn Farry in Judea, at Syam.”—Cocks's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 272.

[1639.—“The chief of the Kingdom is India by some called Odia . . . the city of India, the ordinary Residence of the Court is seated on the Menam.”—Mandelslo, Travels, E.T. ii. 122.

[1693.—“As for the City of Siam, the Siamese do call it Si-yo-thi-ya, the o of the syllable yo being closer than our (French) Diphthong au.”—La Loubère, Siam, E.T. i. 7.]

1727.—“. . . all are sent to the City of Siam or Odia for the King’s Use. . . . The City stands on an Island in the River Memnon, which by Turnings and Windings, makes the distance from the Bar about 50 Leagues.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 160; [ed. 1744].

[1774.—“Ayuttaya with its districts Dvaravati, Yodaya and Kamanpaik.”—Inac, in Ind. Antiq. xxii. 4.

[1827.—“The powerful Lord . . . who dwells over every head in the city of the sacred and great kingdom of Si-a-yoo-tha-ya.”—Treaty between E.I.C. and King of Siam, in Wilson, Documents of the Burmese War, App. lxxvii.]

JUGBOOLAK, s. Marine Hind. for jack-block (Roebuck).

JUGGURNAUT, n.p. A corruption of the Skt. Jagannātha, ‘Lord of the Universe,’ a name of Krishna worshipped as Vishnu at the famous shrine of Pūrī in Orissa. The image so called is an amorphous idol, much like those worshipped in some of the South Sea Islands, and it has been plausibly suggested (we believe first by Gen. Cunningham) that it was in reality a Buddhist symbol, which has been adopted as an object of Brahmanical worship, and made to serve as the image of a god. The idol was, and is, annually dragged forth in procession on a monstrous car, and as masses of excited pilgrims crowded round to drag or accompany it, accidents occurred. Occasionally also persons, sometimes sufferers from painful disease, cast themselves before the advancing wheels. The testimony of Mr. Stirling, who was for some years Collector of Orissa in the second decade of the last century, and that of Sir W. W. Hunter, who states that he had gone through the MS. archives of the province since it became British, show that the popular impression in regard to the continued frequency of immolations on these occasions—a belief that has made Juggernaut a standing metaphor—was greatly exaggerated. The belief indeed in the custom of such immolation had existed for centuries, and the rehearsal of these or other cognate religious suicides at one or other of the great temples of the Peninsula, founded partly on fact, and partly on popular report, finds a place in almost every old narrative relating to India. The really great mortality from hardship, exhaustion, and epidemic disease which frequently ravaged the crowds of pilgrims on such occasions, doubtless aided in keeping up the popular impressions in connection with the Juggernaut festival.

[1811.—“Jagnār.” See under MADURA.]

c. 1321.—“Annually on the recurrence of the day when that idol was made, the folk of the country come and take it down, and put it on a fine chariot; and then the King and Queen, and the whole body of the people, join together and draw it forth from the church with loud singing of songs, and all kinds of music . . . and many pilgrims who have come to this feast cast themselves under the chariot, so that its wheels may go over them, saying that they desire to die for their god. And the car passes over them, and crushes them, and cuts them in sunder, and so they perish on the spot.”—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c. i. 83.

c. 1430. — "In Bizenegalia (see BIS-NAGAR) also, at a certain time of the year, this idol is carried through the city, placed between two chariots . . . accompanied by a great concourse of people. Many, carried away by the fervour of their faith, cast themselves on the ground before the wheels, in order that they may be crushed to death, — a mode of death which they say is very acceptable to their god." — N. Conti, in India in XVth Cent., 28.

c. 1581. — "All for devotion attach themselves to the trace of the car, which is drawn in this manner by a vast number of people . . . and on the annual feast day of the Pagod this car is dragged by crowds of people through certain parts of the city (Negapatam), some of whom from devotion, or the desire to be thought to make a devoted end, cast themselves down under the wheels of the cars, and so perish, remaining all ground and crushed by the said cars." — Gasparo Balbi, f. 84. The preceding passages refer to scenes in the south of the Peninsula.

c. 1590. — "In the town of Pursotem on the banks of the sea stands the temple of Jagnaut, near to which are the images of Kishen, his brother, and their sister, made of Sandal-wood, which are said to be 4,000 years old. . . . The Brahmins . . . at certain times carry the image in procession upon a carriage of sixteen wheels, which in the Hindoo language is called Rahth (see RUT); and they believe that whoever assists in drawing it along obtains remission of all his sins." — Gladwin's Ayeen, ii. 13-15; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 127].

1632. — "Vnto this Pagod or house of Sathen . . . doe belong 9,000 Brammines or Priests, which doe dayly offer sacrifice vnto their great God Iaggarnat, from which Idoll the City is so called. . . . And when it (the chariot of Iaggarnat) is going along the city, there are many that will offer themselves a sacrifice to this Idoll, and desperately lye downe on the ground, that the Chariott wheelles may runne over them, whereby they are killed outright; some get broken armes, some broken legges, so that many of them are destroyed, and by this meanes they thinke to merit Heauen." — W. Bruton, in Hakl. v. 57.

1667. — "In the town of Jagannat, which is seated upon the Gulf of Bengala, and where is that famous Temple of the Idol of the same name, there is yearly celebrated a certain Feast. . . . The first day that they shew this Idol with Ceremony in the Temple, the Crowd is usually so great to see it, that there is not a year, but some of those poor Pilgrims, that come afar off, tired and harassed, are suffocated there; all the people blessing them for having been so happy. . . . And when this Hellish Triumphant Chariot marcheth, there are found (which is no Fable) persons so foolishly credulous and superstitious as to throw themselves with their bellies under those large and heavy wheels, which bruise them to death. . . ." — Bernier, a Letter to Mr. Chapelain, in Eng. ed. 1684, 97; [ed. Constable, 304 seq.].

[1669-79. — "In that great and Sumptuous Diabolicall Pagod, there Standeth theere gretest God Jn^o. Gernact, whence ye Pagod receued that name alsoe." — MS. Asia, &c., by T. B. f. 12. Col. Temple adds: "Throughout the whole MS. Jagannath is repeatedly called Jn^o. Gernact, which obviously stands for the common transposition Jangannath.]

1682. — ". . . We lay by last night till 10 o'clock this morning, ye Captain being desirous to see ye Jagernot Pagodas for his better satisfaction. . . ." — Hedges, Diary, July 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 30].

1727. — "His (Jagarynat's) Effigy is often carried abroad in Procession, mounted on a Coach four stories high . . . they fasten small Ropes to the Cable, two or three Fathoms long, so that upwards of 2,000 People have room enough to draw the Coach, and some old Zealots, as it passes through the Street, fall flat on the Ground, to have the Honour to be crushed to Pieces by the Coach Wheels." — A. Hamilton, i. 387; [ed. 1744].

1809. —

"A thousand pilgrims strain Arm, shoulder, breast, and thigh, with might and main,
To drag that sacred wain,
And scarce can draw along the enormous load.
Prone fall the frantic votaries on the road,
And calling on the God
Their self-devoted bodies there they lay
To pave his chariot way.
On Jaga-Naut they call,
The ponderous car rolls on, and crushes
all,
Through flesh and bones it ploughs its dreadful path.
Groans rise unheard; the dying cry.
And death, and agony
Are trodden under foot by yon mad throng,
Who follow close and thrust the deadly wheels along."

Curse of Kehama, xiv. 5.

1814. — "The sight here beggars all description. Though Juggernaut made some progress on the 19th, and has travelled daily ever since, he has not yet reached the place of his destination. His brother is ahead of him, and the lady in the rear. One woman has devoted herself under the wheels, and a shocking sight it was. Another also intended to devote herself, missed the wheels with her body, and had her arm broken. Three people lost their lives in the crowd." — In Asiatic Journal — quoted in Beveridge, Hist. of India, ii. 54, without exacter reference.

c. 1818. — "That excess of fanaticism which formerly prompted the pilgrims to court death by throwing themselves in crowds under the wheels of the car of Jagannāth has happily long ceased to actuate the worshippers of the present day. During 4 years that I have witnessed the ceremony, three cases only of this revolting species of immolation have occurred, one of which I may observe is doubtful, and should probably be ascribed to accident; in the others the victims had long been suffering from some excruciating complaints, and chose this method of ridding themselves of the burthen of life in preference to other modes of suicide so prevalent with the lower orders under similar circumstances."—A. Stirling, in As. Res. xv. 324.

1827.—March 28th in this year, Mr. Poynder, in the E. I. Court of Proprietors, stated that "about the year 1790 no fewer than 28 Hindus were crushed to death at Ishera on the Ganges, under the wheels of Juggernaut."—As. Journal, 1821, vol. xxiii. 702.

[1864.—"On the 7th July 1864, the editor of the Friend of India mentions that, a few days previously, he had seen, near Serampore, two persons crushed to death, and another frightfully lacerated, having thrown themselves under the wheels of a car during the Rath Jatra festival. It was afterwards stated that this occurrence was accidental."—Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurispr. 665.]

1871.—". . . poor Johnny Tetterby staggering under his Moloch of an infant, the Juggernaut that crushed all his enjoyments."—Forster's Life of Dickens, ii. 415.

1876.—"Le monde en marchant n'a pas beaucoup plus de souci de ce qu'il écrase que le char de l'idole de Jagarnata."—E. Renan, in Revue des Deux Mondes, 3^e Série, xviii. p. 504.

JULIBDAR, s. Pers. jilaudār, from jilau, the string attached to the bridle by which a horse is led, the servant who leads a horse, also called janībahdār, janībahkash. In the time of Hedges the word must have been commonly used in Bengal, but it is now quite obsolete.

[c. 1590.—"For some time it was a rule that, whenever he (Akbar) rode out on a khāṣak horse, a rupee should be given, viz., one dām to the Ātbegi, two to the Jilaudār. . . ."—Āin, ed. Blochmann, i. 142. (And see under PYKE.)]

1673.—"In the heart of this Square is raised a place as large as a Mountebank's Stage, where the Gelabdar, or Master Muliteer, with his prime Passengers or Servants, have an opportunity to view the whole Caphala."—Fryer, 341.

1683.—"Your Jylibdar, after he had received his letter would not stay for the Gen^l, but stood upon departure."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 15; [Hak. Soc. i. 112].

"We admire what made you send peons to force our Gyllibdar back to your Factory, after he had gone 12 cosses on his way, and dismisse him again without any reason for it."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 26; [Hak. Soc. i. 120].

1754.—"100 Gilodar; those who are charged with the direction of the couriers and their horses."—Hanway's Travels, i. 171; 252.

[1812.—"I have often admired the courage and dexterity with which the Persian Jelowdars or grooms throw themselves into the thickest engagement of angry horses."—Morier, Journey through Persia, 63 seq.]

1880.—"It would make a good picture, the surroundings of camels, horses, donkeys, and men. . . . Pascal and Remise cooking for me; the Jellaodars, enveloped in felt coats, smoking their kalliūns, amid the half-light of fast fading day. . . ."—M.S. Journal in Persia of Capt. W. Gill, R.E.

JUMBEEA, s. Ar. janhiya, probably from janb, 'the side'; a kind of dagger worn in the girdle, so as to be drawn across the body. It is usually in form slightly curved. Sir R. Burton (Camões, Commentary, 413) identifies it with the agomia and gomio of the quotations below, and refers to a sketch in his Pilgrimage, but this we cannot find, [it is in the Memorial ed. i. 236], though the jambiyah is several times mentioned, e.g. i. 347, iii. 72. The term occurs repeatedly in Mr. Egerton's catalogue of arms in the India Museum. Janbwa occurs as the name of a dagger in the Āin (orig. i. 119); why Blochmann in his translation [i. 110] spells it jhanbwah we do not know. See also Dozy and Eng. s.v. jambette. It seems very doubtful if the latter French word has anything to do with the Arabic word.

c. 1328.—"Takī-ud-dīn refused roughly and pushed him away. Then the maimed man drew a dagger (khānjar) such as is called in that country janbiya, and gave him a mortal wound."—Ibn Batuta, i. 534.

1516.—"They go to fight one another bare from the waist upwards, and from the waist downwards wrapped in cotton cloths drawn tightly round, and with many folds, and with their arms, which are swords, bucklers, and daggers (gomios)."—Barbosa, p. 80.

1774.—"Autour du corps ils ont un ceinturon de cuir brodé, ou garni d'argent, en milieu duquel sur le devant ils passent un couteau large recourbé, et pointu (jambes), dont la pointe est tournée du côté droit."—Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie, 64.

JUMDUD, s. H. jamdad, jamdhar. A kind of dagger, broad at the base and slightly curved, the hilt formed with a cross-grip like that of the Katdr (see KUTTAUR). [A drawing of what he calls a jamdhar katdri is given in Egerton's Catalogue (Pl. IX. No. 344-5).] F. Johnson's Dictionary gives jamdar as a Persian word with the suggested etymology of janb-dar, 'flank-render.' But in the Ām the word is spelt jamdhar, which seems to indicate Hind. origin; and its occurrence in the poem of Chand Bardāi (see Ind. Antig. i. 281) corroborates this. Mr. Beames there suggests the etymology of Yama-dant 'Death's Tooth.' The drawings of the jamdhar or jamdhar in the Ām illustrations show several specimens with double and triple toothed points, which perhaps favours this view; but Yama-dhara, 'death-wielder,' appears in the Sanskrit dictionaries as the name of a weapon. [Rather, perhaps, yama-dhara, 'death-bearer.']

c. 1526.—"Jamdhar." See quotation under KUTTAUR.

[1813.—"... visited the jamdar khana, or treasury containing his jewels ... curious arms. ..."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 469.]

JUMMA, s. Hind. from Ar. jama'. The total assessment (for land revenue) from any particular estate, or division of country. The Arab. word signifies 'total' or 'aggregate.'

1781.—"An increase of more than 26 lacks of rupees (was) effected on the former jumma."—Fifth Report, p. 8.

JUMMABUNDEE, s. Hind. from P.—Ar. jama'bandi. A settlement (q.v.), i.e. the determination of the amount of land revenue due for a year, or a period of years, from a village, estate, or parcel of land. [In the N.W.P. it is specially applied to the annual village rent-roll, giving details of the holding of each cultivator.]

[1765.—"The rents of the province, according to the jumma-bundy, or rent-roll ... amounted to ..."—Verelst, Views of Bengal, App. 214.

[1814.—"Jummabundee." See under PATEL.]

JUMNA, n.p. The name of a famous river in India which runs by Delhi and Agra. Skt. Yamundā, Hind. Jamund and Jamud, the Δαμωδρα of Ptolemy, the Ἰωβασφης of Arrian, the Jomanes of Pliny. The spelling of Ptolemy almost exactly expresses the modern Hind. form Jamund. The name Jamund is also applied to what was in the 18th century, an unimportant branch of the Brahmaputra R. which connected it with the Ganges, but which has now for many years been the main channel of the former great river. (See JENNYE.) Jamund is the name of several other rivers of less note.

[1616-17.—"I proposed for a water works, w^{ch} might give the Chief Citye of the Mogores content ... w^{ch} is to be don vpon the Riuer Jaminy w^{ch} passeth by Agra. ..."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 480.

[1619.—"The river Gemini was vnfit to set a Myll vpon."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 477.

[1663.—"... the Gemna, a river which may be compared to the Loire. ..."—Bernier, Letter to M. De la Mothe le Vayer, ed. Constable, 241.]

JUMNA MASJID, n.p. A common corruption of the Ar. jāmd' masjid, 'the cathedral or congregational mosque,' Ar. jama', 'to collect.' The common form is supposed to represent some great mosque on the Jumna R.

[1785.—"The Jumna-masjid is of great antiquity. ..."—Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 448.

[1849.—"In passing we got out to see the Jumna Masjid, a very fine building now used as a magazine."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 170.

[1865.—"... the great mosque or Djamia ... this word Djamia means literally 'collecting' or 'uniting,' because here attends the great concourse of Friday worshippers. ..."—Palgrave, Central and E. Arabia, ed. 1868, 286.]

JUNGEERA, n.p., i.e. Janjira. The name of a native State on the coast, south of Bombay, from which the Fort and chief place is 44 m. distant. This place is on a small island, rising in the entrance to the Rajpuri inlet, to which the name Janjira properly pertains, believed to be a local corruption of the Ar. jazīra, 'island.' The State is also called Habesh, meaning 'Hubehee's land,' from the fact that for 3 or 4 centuries its chief has been of that race. Taba was not at first continuous, nor have the chiefs, even when of African blood, been always of one family; but they have apparently been so for the last 200 years. 'The Sidi' (see SEEDY) and 'The Habshi,' are titles popularly applied to this chief. This State has a port and some land in Kāthiāwār.

Gen. Keatinge writes: "The members of the Sidi's family whom I saw were, for natives of India, particularly fair." The old Portuguese writers call this harbour Danda (or as they write it Damda), e.g. João de Castro in Primeiro Roteiro, p. 48. His rude chart shows the island-fort.

JUNGLE, s. Hind. and Mahr. jangal, from Skt. jangala (a word which occurs chiefly in medical treatises). The native word means in strictness only waste, uncultivated ground; then, such ground covered with shrubs, trees or long grass; and thence again the Anglo-Indian application is to forest, or other wild growth, rather than to the fact that it is not cultivated. A forest; a thicket; a tangled wilderness. The word seems to have passed at a rather early date into Persian, and also into use in Turkistan. From Anglo-Indian it has been adopted into French as well as in English. The word does not seem to occur in Fryer, which rather indicates that its use was not so extremely common among foreigners as it is now.

c. 1200.—". . . Now the land is humid, jungle (jangalah), or of the ordinary kind."—Susruta, i. ch. 35.

c. 1370.—"Elephants were numerous as sheep in the jangal round the Rāī's dwelling."—Tārīkh-i-Fīroz-Shāhī, in Elliot, iii. 314.

c. 1450.—"The Kings of India hunt the elephant. They will stay a whole month or more in the wilderness, and in the jungle (Jangal)."—Abdurrazāk, in Not. et Ext. xiv. 51.

1474.—". . . Bicheneger. The vast city is surrounded by three ravines, and intersected by a river, bordering on one side on a dreadful Jungel."—Ath. Nikitin, in India in XVth Cent., 29.

1776.—"Land waste for five years . . . is called Jungle."—Halhed's Gentoo Code, 190.

1809.—"The air of Calcutta is much affected by the closeness of the jungle around it."—Ld. Valentia, i. 207.

1809.—

"They built them here a bower of jointed cane, Strong for the needful use, and light and long
Was the slight framework rear'd, with little pain;

JUNGLO.

JUNK, n. A large Eastern ship; especially (and in later use exclusively) a Chinese ship. This indeed is the earliest application also; any more general application belongs to an intermediate period. This is one of the oldest words in the Europeo-Indian vocabulary. It occurs in the travels of Friar Odorico, written down in 1331, and a few years later in the rambling reminiscences of John de' Marignolli. The great Catalan World-map of 1375 gives a sketch of one of those ships with their sails of bamboo matting and calls them Jacki, no doubt a clerical error for Jüchi. Dobner, the original editor of Marignolli, in the 18th century, says of the word (junkos): "This word I cannot find in any medieval glossary. Most probably we are to understand vessels of platted reeds (a juncus texta) which several authors relate to be used in India." It is notable that the same erroneous suggestion is made by Amerigo Vespucci in his curious letter to one of the Medici, giving an account of the voyage of Da Gama, whose squadron he had met at C. Verde on its way home.

The French translators of Ibn Batuta derive the word from the Chinese schouen (schouen), and Littré gives the same etymology (a.v. jonque). It is possible that the word may be eventually traced to a Chinese original, but not very probable. The old Arab traders must have learned the word from Malay pilots, for it is certainly the Javanese and Malay jong and ajong, 'a ship or large vessel.' In Javanese the Great Bear is called Lintang jong, 'The Constellation Junk,' [which is in Malay Bintang Jong. The various forms in Malay and cognate languages, with the Chinese words which have been suggested as the origin, are very fully given by Scott, Malayan Words in English, p. 59 seq.]

c. 1300.—"Large ships called in the language of China 'Junks' bring various sorts of choice merchandise and cloths from Chin and Máchin, and the countries of Hind and Sind."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 69.

1331.—"And when we were there in harbour at Polumban, we embarked in another ship called a Junk (aliam naviu nomine Lunum). . . Now on board that ship were good 700 souls, what with sailors and with merchants. . ."—Friar Odoric, in Cutley, &c., 73.

c. 1345.—"They make no voyages on the China Sea except with Chinese vessels . . .

of these there are three kinds; the big ones which are called junk, in the plural junkat. . . Each of these big ships carries from three up to twelve sails. The sails are made of bamboo slips, woven like mats, they are never hauled down, but are shifted round as the wind blows from one quarter or another."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 91. The French translators write the words as gont (and gontat). Ibn Batuta really indicates chank (and chankat); but both must have been quite wrong.

c. 1348.—"Wishing them to visit the shrine of St. Thomas the Apostle . . . we embarked on certain Junks (ascendentes Junkos) from Lower India, which is called Minubar."—Marignolli, in Cutley, &c., 356.

1459.—"About the year of Our Lord 1420, a Ship or Junk of India, in crossing the Indian Sea, was driven . . . in a westerly and south-westerly direction for 40 days, without seeing anything but sky and sea. . . The ship having touched on the coast to supply its wants, the mariners beheld there the egg of a certain bird called chrolo, which egg was as big as a butt. . ."—Rubric on Fra Mauro's Great Map at Venice.

"The Ships or junks (Zonchi) which navigate this sea, carry 4 masts, and others besides that they can set up or strike (at will); and they have 40 to 60 little chambers for the merchants, and they have only one rudder. . ."—Ibid.

1516.—"Many Moorish merchants reside in it (Malacca), and also Gentiles, particularly Chetis (see CHETTY), who are natives of Choldmendel; and they are all very rich, and have many large ships which they call jungos."—Barbose, 191.

1549.—"Exclusus isto concilio, applicavit animum ad novam Sinesis formam, quam Iunsum vocant."—Sci. Franc. Xavieri Epist. 337.

[1554.—". . . in the many ships and junks (Juges) which certainly passed that way."—Cautenheda, ii. c. 20.]

1563.—"Junoon are certain long ships that have stern and prow fashioned in the same way."—Garcia, i. 585.

1591.—"By this Negro we were advertised of a small Barks of some thirtie tunnes (which the Moors call a Iunoo)."—Bart's Acc. of Lancaster's Voyage, in Hakl. v. 539.

1616.—"And doubtless they had made havock of them all, had they not presently been relieved by two Arabian Junks (for so their small ill-built ships are named. . .)"—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 342.

[1625.—"An hundred Prawes and Junkes."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, i. 2, 43.

[1627.—"China also, and the great Atlantis (that you call America), which have now but Junks and Canoes, abounded then in tall Ships."—Bacon, New Atlantis, p. 12.]

1630.—"So repairing to Jagres (see JAKE), a place in the Persian Gulph, they obtained a fleet of Seven Junks, to convey them and theirs as Merchantmen bound for the Shores of India."—Lord, Religion of the Perses, 3.

1673.—Fryer also speaks of “Portugal Junks.” The word had thus come to mean any large vessel in the Indian Seas. Barker’s use for a small vessel (above) is exceptional.

JUNKAMEER, s. This word occurs in Wheeler, i. 300, where it should certainly have been written Juncaneer. It was long a perplexity, and as it was the subject of one of Dr. Burnell’s latest, if not the very last, of his contributions to this work, I transcribe the words of his communication:

“Working at improving the notes to v. Linschoten, I have accidentally cleared up the meaning of a word you asked me about long ago, but which I was then obliged to give up—‘Jonkamir.’ It=‘a collector of customs.’

“(1745). — Notre Supérieur qui sçavoit qu’à moitié chemin certains Jonquaniens mettoient les passans à contribution, nous avoit donné un ou deux fanons (see FANAM) pour les payer en allant et en revenant, au cas qu’ils l’exigeassent de nous.”—P. Norbert, Memoires, pp. 159-160.

“The original word is in Malayalam chungakdran, and do. in Tamil, though it does not occur in the Dictionaries of that language; but chungam (=‘Customs’) does.

“I was much pleased to settle this curious word; but I should never have thought of the origin of it, had it not been for that rascally old Capuchin P. Norbert’s note.”

My friend’s letter (from West Stratton) has no date, but it must have been written in July or August 1882. —[H.Y.] (See JUNKEON.)

1680.—“The Didwan (see DEWAUN) returned with Lingapas Ruccas (see ROOCKA) upon the Avaldar (see HAVILDAR) at St. Thoma, and upon the two chief Juncaneers in this part of the country, ordering them not to stop goods or provisions coming into the town.”—Fort St. Geo. Consn., Nov. 22, Notes and Exts., iii. 39.

1746.—“Given to the Governor’s Servants, Juncaneers, &c., as usual at Christmas, Salampores (see SALEMPOORY) 18Ps. P. 13.”—Acct. of Extra Charges at Fort St. David, to Dec. 31. MS. Report, in India Office.

JUNK-CEYLON, n.p. The popular name of an island off the west coast of the Malay Peninsula. Forrest (Voyage to Mergui, pp. iii. and 29-30) calls it Jan-Sylan, and says it is properly Ujong (i.e. in Malay, ‘Cape’) Sylang. This appears to be nearly right. The name is, according to Crawford (Malay Dict. s.v. Salang, and Dict. Ind. Archip. s.v. Ujung) Ujung Salang, ‘Salang Headland.’ [Mr. Skeat doubts the correctness of this. “There is at least one quite possible alternative, i.e. jong salang, in which jong means ‘a junk,’ and salang, when applied to vessels, ‘heavily tossing’ (see Klinkert, Dict. s.v. salang). Another meaning of salang is ‘to transfix a person with a dagger,’ and is the technical term for Malay executions, in which the kris was driven down from the collar-bone to the heart. Parles in the first quotation is now known as Perlis.”]

1539.—“There we crost over to the firm Land, and passing by the Port of Juncalan (Iuncalão) we sailed two days and a half with a favourable wind, by means whereof we got to the River of Parles in the Kingdom of Queda. . . .”—Pinto (orig. cap. xix.) in Cogan, p. 22.

1592.—“We departed thence to a Baie in the Kingdom of Iunsalaom, which is betweene Malacca and Pegu, 8 degrees to the Northward.”—Barker, in Hakl. ii. 591.

1727.—“The North End of Jonk Ceyloan lies within a mile of the Continent.”—A. Hamilton, 69; [ed. 1744, ii. 67].

JUNKEON, s. This word occurs as below. It is no doubt some form of the word chungam, mentioned under JUNKAMEER. Wilson gives Telugu Sunkam, which might be used in Orissa, where Bruton was. [Shungum (Mal. chunkam) appears in the sense of toll or customs duties in many of the old treaties in Logan, Malabar, vol. iii.]

1638.—“Any Iunkeon or Custome.”—Bruton’s Narrative, in Hakl. v. 53.

1676.—“These practices (claims of perquisite by the factory chiefs) hath occasioned some to apply to the Governour for relief, and chosen rather to pay Juncan than submit to the unreasonable demands aforesaid.”—Major Puckle’s Proposals, in Fort St. Geo. Consn., Feb. 16. Notes and Exts., i. 39.

[1727.—“ . . . at every ten or twelve Miles end, a Fellow to demand Junkaun or Poll-Money for me and my Servants. . . .”—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 392.]

* “Ce sont des Maures qui exigent de l’argent sur les grands chemins, de ceux qui passent avec quelques marchandises; souvent ils en demandent à ceux mêmes qui n’en portent point. On regarde ces gens-là à peu pres comme des voleurs.”

JURIBASSO, s. This word, meaning ‘an interpreter,’ occurs constantly in the Diary of Richard Cocks, of the English Factory in Japan, admirably edited for the Hakluyt Society by Mr. Edward Maunde Thompson (1883). The word is really Malayo-Javanese jurubahasa, lit. 'language-master,' juru being an expert, 'a master of a craft,' and bahasa the Skt. bhāṣā, 'speech.' [Wilkinson, Dict., writes Juru-bēhasa; Mr. Skeat prefers juru-bhasa.]

1603.—At Patani the Hollanders having arrived, and sent presents—"ils furent pris par un officier nommé Orantaea (see ORANKAY) Jurebassa, qui en fit trois portions."—In Rec. du Voyages, ed. 1703, ii. 667. See also pp. 672, 675.

1613.—"(Said the Mandarin of Ancão) . . . 'Captain-major, Auditor, residents, and jerubacas, for the space of two days you must come before me to attend to these instructions (capitulos), in order that I may write to the Alão.' . . .

"These communications being read in the Chamber of the City of Macau, before the Vereadores, the people, and the Captain-Major then commanding in the said city, João Serrão da Cunha, they sought for a person who might be charged to reply, such as had knowledge and experience of the Chinese, and of their manner of speech, and finding Lourenço Carvalho . . . he made the reply in the following form of words ' . . . To this purpose we the Captain-Major, the Auditor, the Vereadores, the Padres, and the Jurubaca, assembling together and beating our foreheads before God. . . .'"—Bocarro, pp. 725-729.

"The foureteenth, I sent M. Cockes, and my Jurebasso to both the Kings to entreat them to provide me of a dozen Seamen."—Capt. Saris, in Purchas, 378.

1615.—". . . his desire was that, for his sake, I would geve over the pursute of this matter against the sea bongew, for that yf it were followed, of force the said bongew must cut his bellie, and then my jurebasso must do the lyke. Unto which his request I was content to agree. . . ."—Cocks's Diary, i. 33.

[, "This night we had a conference with our Jurybassa."—Foster, Letters, iii. 167].

JUTE, s. The fibre (gunny-fibre) of the bark of Corchorus capsularis, L., and Corchorus olitorius, L., which in the last 45 years has become so important an export from India, and a material for manufacture in Great Britain as well as in India. "At the last meeting of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, Professor Skeat commented on various English words. Jute, a fibrous substance, he explained from the Sanskrit jūta, a less usual form of jāta, meaning, 1st, the matted hair of an ascetic; 2ndly, the fibrous roots of a tree such as the banyan; 3rdly, any fibrous substance" (Academy, Dec. 27, 1879). The secondary meanings attributed here to jāta are very doubtful.* The term jute appears to have been first used by Dr. Roxburgh in a letter dated 1795, in which he drew the attention of the Court of Directors to the value of the fibre "called jute by the natives." [It appears, however, as early as 1746 in the Log of a voyage quoted by Col. Temple in J.R.A.S., Jan. 1900, p. 158.] The name in fact appears to be taken from the vernacular name in Orissa. This is stated to be properly jhōṭṭō, but jhūṭṭō is used by the uneducated. See Report of the Jute Commission, by Babu Hemchundra Kerr, Calcutta, 1874; also a letter from Mr. J. S. Cotton in the Academy, Jan. 17, 1880.

JUTKA, s. From Dak.—Hind. jhatkā, 'quick.' The native cab of Madras, and of Mofussil towns in that Presidency; a conveyance only to be characterised by the epithet ramshackle, though in that respect equalled by the Calcutta cranchee (q.v.). It consists of a sort of box with venetian windows, on two wheels, and drawn by a miserable pony. It is entered by a door at the back. (See SHIGRAM, with like meanings).

JUZAIL, s. This word jazdīl is generally applied to the heavy Afghan rifle, fired with a forked rest. If it is Ar. it must be jazd'il, the plural of jazīl, 'big,' used as a substantive. Jazīl is often used for a big, thick thing, so it looks probable. (See GINGALL.) Hence jazd'ilchī, one armed with such a weapon.

[1812.—"The jezaerchi also, the men who use blunderbusses, were to wear the new Russian dress."—Morier, Journey through Persia, 30.

[1898.—

"All night the cressets glimmered pale
On Ulwur sabre and Tonk jezail."
R. Kipling, Barrack-room Ballads, 84.

[1900.—"Two companies of Khyber Jezailchies."—Warburton, Eighteen Years in the Khyber, 78.]

JYEDAD, s. P.—H. jāidād. Territory assigned for the support of troops.

[1824.—"Rampoora on the Chumbul . . . had been granted to Dudernaic, as Jaidad,

* This remark is from a letter of Dr. Burnell's dd. Tanjore, March 16, 1880.

or temporary assignment for the payment of his troops."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 223.]

JYSHE, s. This term, Ar. jaish, 'an army, a legion,' was applied by Tippoo to his regular infantry, the body of which was called the Jaish Kachari (see under CUTCHERRY).

c. 1782.—"About this time the Bar or regular infantry, Kutcheri, were called the Jyah Kutcheri."—Hist. of Tipu Sultan, by Hussein Ali Khan Kermāni, p. 32.

1786.—"At such times as new levies or recruits for the Jyshe and Piadehs are to be entertained, you two and Syed Peer assembling in Kucherry are to entertain none but proper and eligible men."—Tippoo's Letters, 256.

K

KAJEE, s. This is a title of Ministers of State used in Nepaul and Sikkim. It is no doubt the Arabic word (see CAZEE for quotations). Kājī is the pronunciation of this last word in various parts of India.

[KALA JUGGAH, s. Anglo-H. kālā jagah for a 'dark place,' arranged near a ball-room for the purpose of flirtation.

[1885.—"At night it was rather cold, and the frequenters of the Kala Jagah (or dark places) were unable to enjoy it as much as I hoped they would."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 91.

KALINGA, n.p. (See KLING.)

KALLA-NIMMACK, s. Hind. kālā-namak, 'black salt,' a common mineral drug, used especially in horse-treatment. It is muriate of soda, having a mixture of oxide of iron, and some impurities. (Royle.)

KAPAL, s. Kāpāl, the Malay word for a ship, [which seems to have come from the Tam. kappal,] "applied to any square-rigged vessel, with top and top-gallant masts" (Marsden, Memoirs of a Malay Family, 57).

KARBAREE, s. Hind. kārbārī, 'an agent, a manager.' Used chiefly in Bengal Proper.

[c. 1857.—"The Foudar's report stated that a police Carbaree was sleeping in his own house."—Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurisp. 467.]

1867.—"The Lushai Karbaris (literally men of business) duly arrived and met me at Kassalong."—Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, 293.

KARCANNA, s. Hind. from Pers. kār-khāna, 'business-place.' We cannot improve upon Wilson's definition: "An office, or place where business is carried on; but it is in use more especially applied to places where mechanical work is performed; a workshop, a manufactory, an arsenal; also, fig., to any great fuss or bustle." The last use seems to be obsolete.

[1663.—"Large halls are seen in many places, called Kar-Kanays or workshops for the artizans."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 258 seq. Also see CARCANA.]

KARDAR, s. P.—H. kārdār, an agent (of the Government) in Sindh.

[1842.—"I further insist upon the offending Kardar being sent a prisoner to my head-quarters at Sukkur within the space of five days, to be dealt with as I shall determine."—Sir C. Napier, in Napier's Conquest of Scinde, 149.]

KAREETA, s. Hind. from Ar. kharīta, and in India also khalīta. The silk bag (described by Mrs. Parkes, below) in which is enclosed a letter to or from a native noble; also, by transfer, the letter itself. In 2 Kings v. 23, the bag in which Naaman bound the silver is kharīt; also in Isaiah iii. 22, the word translated 'crisping-pins' is kharītim, rather 'purses.'

c. 1350.—"The Sherif Ibrāhīm, surnamed the Khāritadār, i.e. the Master of the Royal Paper and Pens, was governor of the territory of Hānsī and Sarsatī."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 337.

1838.—"Her Highness the Bāiza Bā'i did me the honour to send me a Kharītā, that is a letter enclosed in a long bag of Kim-khucāb (see KINCOB), crimson silk brocaded with flowers in gold, contained in another of fine muslin: the mouth of the bag was tied with a gold and tasseled cord, to which was appended the great seal of her Highness."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim (Mrs. Parkes), ii. 250.

In the following passage the thing is described (at Constantinople).

1673.—". . . le Visir prenant un sachet de beau brocard d'or à fleurs, long tout au moins d'une demi aulne et large de cinq ou six doigts, lié et scellé par le haut avec v inscription qui y estoit attachée, et disant que c'estoit une lettre du Grand Seigneur. . . .”—Journal d'Ant. Galland, ii. 94.

KAUL, s. Hind. Kal, properly 'Time,' then a period, death, and popularly the visitation of famine. Under this word we read :

1808.—“Scarcity, and the scourge of civil war, embittered the Mahratta nation in A.D. 1804, of whom many emigrants were supported by the justice and generosity of neighbouring powers, and (a large number) were relieved in their own capital by the charitable contributions of the English at Bombay alone. This and opening of Hospitals for the sick and starving, within the British settlements, were gratefully told to the writer afterwards by many Mahrattas in the heart, and from distant parts, of their own country.”—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

KAUNTA, CAUNTA, s. This word, Mahr. and Guz. kānthā, 'coast or margin,' [Skt. kantha, 'immediate proximity,' kanthī, 'the neck,'] is used in the northern part of the Bombay Presidency in composition to form several popular geographical terms, as Mahi Kānthā, for a group of small States on the banks of the Mahi River ; Rewā Kānthā, south of the above ; Sindhu Kānthā, the Indus Delta, &c. The word is no doubt the same which we find in Ptolemy for the Gulf of Kachh, Kānthi κόλπος. Kānthī-Kot was formerly an important place in Eastern Kachh, and Kānthī was the name of the southern coast district (see Ritter, vi. 1038).

KEBULEE. (See MYROBOLANS.)

KEDDAH, s. Hind. Khedā (khednā, 'to chase,' from Skt. akṣeta, 'hunting'). The term used in Bengal for the enclosure constructed to entrap elephants. [The system of hunting elephants by making a trench round a space and enticing the wild animals by means of tame decoys is described by Arrian, Indika, 13.] (See CORRAL.)

[c. 1590. — “There are several modes of hunting elephants. 1. k'hedah” (then follows a description).—Āin, i. 284.]

1780-90.—“The party on the plain below have, during this interval, been completely occupied in forming the Keddah or enclosure.”—Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 191.

1810. — “A trap called a Keddah.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 436.

1860.—“The custom in Bengal is to construct a strong enclosure (called a Keddah) in the heart of the forest.”—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 342.

KEDGEREE, KITCHERY, s. Hind. khichrī, a mess of rice, cooked with butter and dāl (see DHALL), and flavoured with a little spice, shred onion, and the like ; a common dish all over India, and often served at Anglo-Indian breakfast tables, in which very old precedent is followed, as the first quotation shows. The word appears to have been applied metaphorically to mixtures of sundry kinds (see Fryer, below), and also to mixt jargon or lingua franca. In England we find the word is often applied to a mess of re-cooked fish, served for breakfast ; but this is inaccurate. Fish is frequently eaten with kedgerie, but is no part of it. [“Fish Kitcherie” is an old Anglo-Indian dish, see the recipe in Riddell, Indian Domestic Economy, p. 437.]

c. 1340.—“The munj (Moong) is boiled with rice, and then buttered and eaten. This is what they call Kishrī, and on this dish they breakfast every day.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 131.

c. 1443.—“The elephants of the palace are fed upon Kitchri.”—Abdurrazzāk, in India in XVth Cent. 27.

c. 1475.—“Horses are fed on pease ; also on Kichiris, boiled with sugar and oil ; and early in the morning they get shishenico” (?).—Athan. Nikitin, in do., p. 10.

The following recipe for Kedgerie is by Abu'l Fazl :—

c. 1590.—“Khichri, Rice, split dāl, and ghī, 5 ser of each ; $\frac{1}{2}$ ser salt ; this gives 7 dishes.”—Āin, i. 59.

1648.—“Their daily gains are very small, . . . and with these they fill their hungry bellies with a certain food called Kitserye.”—Van Twist, 57.

1653.—“Kicheri est vne sorte de legume dont les Indiens se nourrissent ordinairement.”—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 545.

1672.—Baldaeus has Kitzery, Tavernier Quicheri [ed. Ball, i. 282, 391].

1673.—“The Diet of this Sort of People admits not of great Variety or Cost, their delightfulest Food being only Cutcherry a sort of Pulse and Rice mixed together, and boiled in Butter, with which they grow fat.”—Fryer, 81.

Again, speaking of pearls in the Persian Gulf, he says : “Whatever is of any Value is very dear. Here is a great Plenty of what they call Ketchery, a mixture of all together, or Refuse of Rough, Yellow, and Unequal, which they sell by Bushels to the Russians.”—Ibid. 320.

1727.—"Some Doll and Rice, being mingled together and boiled make Kitcheree, the common Food of the Country. They eat it with Butter and Atchar (see ACHAR)."—A. Hamilton, i. 161; [ed. 1744, i. 162].

1750-60.—"Kitcheree is only rice stewed, with a certain pulse they call Dholi, and is generally eaten with salt-fish, butter, and pickles of various sorts, to which they give the general name of Atchar."—Grove, i. 150.

[1813.—"He was always a welcome guest . . . and ate as much of their rice and Outcheres as he chose."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 502.]

1880.—"A correspondent of the Indian Mirror, writing of the annual religious fair at Ajmere, thus describes a feature in the proceedings: "There are two tremendous copper pots, one of which is said to contain about eighty maunds of rice and the other forty maunds. To fill these pots with rice, sugar, and dried fruits requires a round sum of money, and it is only the rich who can afford to do so. This year His Highness the Nawab of Tonk paid Rs. 8,000 to fill up the pots. . . . After the pots filled with khichri had been inspected by the Nawab, who was accompanied by the Commissioner of Ajmere and several Civil Officers, the distribution, or more properly the plunder, of khichri commenced, and men well wrapped up with clothes, stuffed with cotton, were seen leaping down into the boiling pot to secure their share of the booty."—Pioneer Mail, July 8. [See the reference to this custom in Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 314, and a full account in Rajasthan Gazetteer, ii. 63.]

KEDGEREE, n.p. Kājiri or Kējari, a village and police station on the low lands near the mouth of the Hoogly, on the west bank, and 68 miles below Calcutta. It was formerly well known as a usual anchorage of the larger Indiamen.

1683.—"This morning early we weighed anchor with the tide of Ebb, but having little wind, got no further than the Point of Keguria Island."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 26; [Hak. Soc. i. 64].

1684.—"Signr Nicolò Pareres, a Portugall Merchant, assured me their whole community had wrote y^e Vice King of Goa . . . to send them 2 or 3 Frigates with . . . Soldiers to possess themselves of y^e Islands of Keguria and Ingellac."—Ibid. Dec. 17; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1727.—"It is now inhabited by Fishers, as are also Ingellac and Kidguria, two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mouth of the Ganges."—A. Hamilton, ii. 2; [ed. 1744]. (See HIDGELEE.)

1753.—"De l'autre côté de l'entrée, les rivières de Cajori et de l'Ingeli (see HIDGELEE), puis plus au large la rivière de Pipli et celle de Balacor (see BALABORE), sont avec Tombati (see TOMLOOK), rivière mentionnée plus haut, et qu'on peut ajouter ici, des dérivations d'un grand fleuve, dont le nom de Ganga lui est commun avec le Gange. . . . Une carte du Golfe de Bengale insérée dans Blau, fera même distinguer les rivières d'Ingeli et de Cajori (si on prend la peine de l'examiner) comme des bras du Ganga."—D'Anville, p. 66.

As to the origin of this singular error, about a river Ganga flowing across India from W. to E., see some extracts under GODAVERY. The Rupnarain River, which joins the Hoogly from the W. just above Diamond Harbour, is the grand seu here spoken of. The name Gunga or Old Gunga is applied to this in charts late in the 18th century. It is thus mentioned by A. Hamilton, 1727: "About five leagues farther up on the West Side of the River of Hughly, is another Branch of the Ganges, called Gunga, it is broader than that of the Hughly, but much shallower."—ii. 3; [ed. 1744].

KEDGEREE-POT, a. A vulgar expression for a round pipkin such as is in common Indian use, both for holding water and for cooking purposes. (See CHATTY, GHURRA.)

1811.—"As a memorial of such misfortunes, they plant in the earth an ear bearing a cadgeri, or earthen pot."—Satryna, Les Hindous, iii.

1830.—"Some natives were in readiness with a small raft of Kedgeres-pots, on which the palkes was to be ferried over."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 110.

KENNERY, n.p. The site of a famous and very extensive group of cave-temples on the Island of Balasetta, near Bombay, properly Kājari.

1602.—"Holding some conversation with certain very aged Christians, who had been among the first converts there of Padre Fr. Antonio de Porto, . . . one of them, who alleged himself to be more than 120 years old, and who spoke Portuguese very well, and read and wrote it, and was continually reading the Flor Sanctorum, and the Lives of the Saints, assured me that without doubt the work of the Pagoda of Canari was made under the orders of the father of Saint Jomfat the Prince, whom Barlaam converted to the Faith of Christ. . . ."—Canto, VII. iii. cap. 10.

1673.—"Next Morn before Break of Day we directed our steps to the anciently fam'd, but now ruin'd City of Canorein . . . all out out of a Rock," &c.—Fryer, 71-72.

1825.—"The principal curiosities of Balasetta . . . are the cave temples of Kennery. These are certainly in every way remarkable, from their number, their beautiful situation, their elaborate carving, and their marked connection with Buddh and his religion."—Heber, ii. 130.

KERSEYMERE, a. This is an English draper's term, and not Anglo-

Indian. But it is through forms like cassimere (also in English use), a corruption of cashmere, though the corruption has been shaped by the previously existing English word kersey for a kind of woollen cloth, as if kersey were one kind and kerseymere another, of similar goods. Kersey is given by Minsheu (2nd ed. 1627), without definition, thus: "Kersie cloth, G. (i.e. French) carisé." The only word like the last given by Littré is "Carisil, sorte de canevas." This does not apply to kersey, which appears to be represented by "Creseau—Terme de Commerce; étoffe de laine croissée à deux envers; etym. croiser." Both words are probably connected with croiser or with carre. Planché indeed (whose etymologies are generally worthless) says: "made originally at Kersey, in Suffolk, whence its name." And he adds, equal to the occasion, "Kersey-mere, so named from the position of the original factory on the mere, or water which runs through the village of Kersey" (!) Mr. Skeat, however, we see, thinks that Kersey, in Suffolk, is perhaps the origin of the word Kersey: [and this he repeats in the new ed. (1901) of his Concise Etym. Dict., adding, "Not from Jersey, which is also used as the name of a material." Kersey-mere, he says, is "a corruption of Cashmere or Cassimere, by confusion with kersey"].

1495.—"Item the xv day of Februar, bocht fra Jhonne Andersoun x ellis of quhit Caresay, to be tua coitis, ane to the King, and ane to the Lard of Balgony; price of ellne vjs.; summa . . . iij. li."—Accts. of the Ld. H. Treasurer of Scotland, 1877, p. 225.

1583.—"I think cloth, Kerseys and tinne have never bene here at so lowe prices as they are now."—Mr. John Newton, from Babylon (i.e. Bagdad) July 20, in Hakl. 378.

1603.—"I had as lief be a list of an English kersey, as be pil'd as thou art pil'd, for a French velvet."—Measure for Measure, i. 2.

1625.—"Ordanet the thesaurer to tak aff to ilk ane of the officeris and to the drummer and pyper, ilk ane of thame, fyve elne of reid Kairsie claithe."—Krts. from Recds. of Glasgow, 1876, p. 347.

1626.—In a contract between the Factor of the King of Persia and a Dutch "Opper Koopman" for goods we find: "2000 Persian ells of Carsay at 1 cocri (?) the ell."—Valentijn, v. 295.

1784.—"For sale—superfine cambrics and edgings . . . scarlet and blue Kassimeres."—In Seton-Karr, i. 47.

c. 1880.—(no date given) "Kersey-mere. Cassimere. A finer description of kersey . . . (then follows the absurd etymology as given by Planché). . . . It is principally a manufacture of the west of England, and except in being tweeled (sic) and of narrow width it in no respect differs from superfine cloth."—Draper's Dict. s.v.

KHADIR, s. H. khadar; the recent alluvial bordering a large river. (See under BANGUR).

[1828.—"The river . . . meanders fantastically . . . through a Khader, or valley between two ranges of hills."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 130.

[The Khadir Cup is one of the chief racing trophies open to pig-stickers in upper India.]

KHAKEE, vulgarly KHARKI, KHARKEE, s. or adj. Hind. khaki, 'dusty or dust-coloured,' from Pers. khak, 'earth,' or 'dust'; applied to a light drab or chocolate-coloured cloth. This was the colour of the uniform worn by some of the Punjab regiments at the siege of Delhi, and became very popular in the army generally during the campaigns of 1857-58, being adopted as a convenient material by many other corps. [Gubbins (Mutinies in Oudh, 296) describes how the soldiers at Lucknow dyed their uniforms a light brown or dust colour with a mixture of black and red office inks, and Cave Brown (Punjab and Delhi, ii. 211) speaks of its introduction in place of the red uniform which gave the British soldier the name of "Lal Coortee Wallahs."]]

[1858.—A book appeared called "Service and Adventures with the Khakee Ressalah, or Meerut Volunteer Horse during the Mutinies in 1857-8," by R. H. W. Dunlop.

[1859.—"It has been decided that the full dress will be of dark blue cloth, made up, not like the tunic, but as the native ungreekah (angarkha), and set off with red piping. The undress clothing will be entirely of Khakee."—Madras Govt. Order, Feb. 18, quoted in Calcutta Rev. ciii. 407.

[1862.—"Khakee does not catch in brambles so much as other stuffs."—Brinckman, Rifle in Cashmere, 136.]

1878.—"The Amir, we may mention, wore a khaki suit, edged with gold, and the well-known Herati cap."—Sat. Review, Nov. 30, 683.

[1899.—"The batteries to be painted with the Kirkee colour, which being similar to the roads of the country, will render the vehicles invisible."—Times, July 12.

[1890-91.—The newspapers have constant references to a khaki election, that is an election started on a war policy, and the War Loan for the Transvaal Campaign has been known as "khakia."

Recent military operations have led to the general introduction of khaki as the service uniform. Something like this has been used in the East for clothing from a very early time:—

[1611.—"See if you can get me a piece of very fine brown calico to make me clothes."—Danvers, Letters, i. 109.]

KHALSA, s. and adj. Hind. from Ar. khālṣa (properly khālīṣa) 'pure, genuine.' It has various technical meanings, but, as we introduce the word, it is applied by the Sikhs to their community and church (so to call it) collectively.

1783.—"The Sicques salute each other by the expression Wah Gooroo, without any inclination of the body, or motion of the hand. The Government at large, and their armies, are denominated Khalsa, and Khalsajee."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, i. 307.

1881.—

"And all the Punjab knows me, for my father's name was known

In the days of the conquering Khalsa, when I was a boy half-grown."

Attar Singh loquitur, by Sonar, in an Indian paper; name and date lost.

KHAN, s. a. Turki through Pers. Khān. Originally this was a title, equivalent to Lord or Prince, used among the Mongol and Turk nomad hordes. Besides this sense, and an application to various other chiefs and nobles, it has still become in Persia, and still more in Afghanistan, a sort of vague title like "Esq.," whilst in India it has become a common affix to, or in fact part of, the name of Hindustānis out of every rank, properly, however of those claiming a Pathān descent. The tendency of swelling titles is always thus to degenerate, and when the value of Khān had sunk, a new form, Khān-Khānān (Khān of Khāns) was devised at the Court of Delhi, and applied to one of the high officers of State.

[c. 1610.—The "Assant Caounas" of Pyrard de Laval, which Mr. Gray fails to identify, is probably Hasan-Khan, Hak. Soc. i. 69.

[1675.—"Cawn." See under GINGI.]

b. Pers. khān. A public building for the accommodation of travellers, a caravanserai. [The word appears in English as early as about 1400; see Stanf. Dict. s.v.]

1653.—"Han est vn Serrail ou enclos que les Arabes appellent fondoux où se retirent les Carauanes, ou les Marchands Estrangers, . . . ce mot de Han est Turq, et est le mesme que Kiarauansarai ou Karbasara (see CARAVANSERAY) dont parle Belon. . . ."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 540.

1827.—"He lost all hope, being informed by his late fellow-traveller, whom he found at the Khan, that the Nuwaub was absent on a secret expedition."—W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

KHANNA, CONNAH, &c. s. This term (Pers. khāna, 'a house, a compartment, apartment, department, receptacle,' &c.) is used almost ad libitum in India in composition, sometimes with most incongruous words, as bobachee (for bāwarchī) connah, 'cook-house,' buggy-connah, 'buggy, or coach-house,' bottle-khanna, tosha-khana (q.v.), &c. &c.

1784.—"The house, cook-room, bottle-connah, godown, &c., are all pukka built."—In Seton-Karr, i. 41.

KHANSAMA. See CONSUMAH.

KHANUM, s. Turki, through Pers. khānum and khānim, a lady of rank; the feminine of the title Khān, a (q.v.)

1404.—". . . la mayor delle avia nōbre Cañon, que quiere dezir Reyna, o Señora grande."—Clavijo, f. 52v.

"The great wall and tents were for the use of the chief wife of the Lord, who was called Caño, and the other was for the second wife, called Quinchi Caño, which means 'the little lady.'"—Markham's Clavijo, 145.

1505.—"The greatest of the Begs of the Sagharichi was then Shīr Haji Beg, whose daughter, Ais-doulet Begum, Yunis Khan married. . . . The Khan had three daughters by Ais-doulet Begum. . . . The second daughter, Kullūk Nigar Khānum, was my mother. . . . Five months after the taking of Kabul she departed to God's mercy, in the year 911" (1505).—Baber, p. 12.

1619.—"The King's ladies, when they are not married to him . . . and not near relations of his house, but only concubines or girls of the Palace, are not called begum, which is a title of queens and princesses, but only canum, a title given in Persia to all noble ladies."—P. della Valle, ii. 13.

coming under the class legally defined as 'superior holders.'

The position and claims of the *khot*s have been the subject of much debate and difficulty, especially with regard to the rights and duties of the tenants under them, whose position takes various forms; but to go into these questions would carry us much more deeply into local technicalities than would be consistent with the scope of this work, or the knowledge of the editor. Practically it would seem that the khot is, in the midst of provinces where ryotwarry is the ruling system, an exceptional person, holding much the position of a petty zemindar in Bengal (apart from any question of permanent settlement); and that most of the difficult questions touching khoti have arisen from this its exceptional character in Western India.

The khot occurs especially in the Konkan, and was found in existence when, in the early part of the last century, we occupied territory that had been subject to the Mahratta power. It is apparently traceable back at least to the time of the 'Adil Shāhī (see IDALCAN) dynasty of the Deccan. There are, however, various denominations of khot. In the Southern Konkan the khoti has long been a hereditary zemindar, with proprietary rights, and also has in many cases replaced the ancient patel as headman of the village; a circumstance that has caused the khoti to be sometimes regarded and defined as the holder of an office, rather than of a property. In the Northern Konkan, again, the Khotis were originally mere revenue-farmers, without proprietary or hereditary rights, but had been able to usurp both.

As has been said above, administrative difficulties as to the Khotis have been chiefly connected with their rights over, or claims from, the ryots, which have been often exorbitant and oppressive. At the same time it is in evidence that in the former distracted state of the country, a Khoti was sometimes established in compliance with a petition of the cultivators. The Khoti "acted as a buffer between them and the extortionate demands of the revenue officers under the native Government. And this is easily comprehended, when it is remembered that formerly districts used to be farmed to the native officials, whose sole object was to squeeze as much revenue as possible out of each village. The Khot bore the brunt of this struggle. In many cases he prevented a new survey of his village, by consenting to the imposition of some new patti.* This no doubt he recovered from the ryots, but he gave them their own time to pay, advanced them money for their cultivation, and was a milder master than a rapacious revenue officer would have been" (Candy, pp. 20-21). See Selections from Records of Bombay Government, No. cxxxiv., N.S., viz., Selections with Notes, regarding the Khoti Tenure, compiled by E. T. Candy, Bo. C. S. 1873; also Abstract of Proceedings of the Govt. of Bombay in the Revenue Dept., April 24, 1876, No. 2474.

KHOTI, s. The holder of the peculiar khot tenure in the Bombay Presidency.

KHUDD, KUDD, s. This is a term chiefly employed in the Himālaya, khadd, meaning a precipitous hill-side, also a deep valley. It is not in the dictionaries, but is probably allied to the Hind. khāt, 'a pit,' Dakh. —Hind. khaddā. [Platts gives Hind. khad. This is from Skt. khanda, 'a gap, a chasm,' while khāt comes from Skt. khāta, 'an excavation.'] The word is in constant Anglo-Indian colloquial use at Simla and other Himālayan stations.

1837.—"The steeps about Mussoori are so very perpendicular in many places, that a person of the strongest nerve would scarcely be able to look over the edge of the narrow footpath into the Khud, without a shudder." —Bacon, First Impressions, ii. 146.

1838.—"On my arrival I found one of the ponies at the estate had been killed by a fall over the precipice, when bringing up water from the khud." —Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 240.

1866.—"When the men of the 43d Regt. refused to carry the guns any longer, the Eurasian gunners, about 20 in number, accompanying them, made an attempt to bring them on, but were unequal to doing so, and under the direction of this officer (Capt. Cockburn, R.A.) threw them down a Khud, as the ravines in the Himalaya are called. . . ." —Bhotan and the H. of the Doogar War, by Surgeon Rennie, M.D. p. 199.

1879.—"The commander-in-chief . . . is perhaps alive now because his horse so judiciously chose the spot on which suddenly to swerve round that its hind hoofs were only half over the chud" (sic).—Times Letter, from Simla, Aug. 15.

* Patti is used here in the Mahratti sense of a 'contribution' or extra cess. It is the regular Mahratti equivalent of the abwāb of Bengal, on which see Wilson, s.v.

KHURREEF, s. Ar. kharīf, 'autumn'; and in India the crop, or harvest of the crop, which is sown at the beginning of the rainy season (April and May) and gathered in after it, including rice, the tall millets, maize, cotton, rape, sesamum, &c. The obverse crop is rubbee (q.v.).

[1809.—"Three weeks have not elapsed since the Kureef crop, which consists of Bajru (see BAJRA), Joor (see JOWAUR), several smaller kinds of grain, and cotton, was cleared from off the fields, and the same ground is already ploughed . . . and sown for the great Rubbee crop of wheat, barley and chunu (see GRAM)."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 215.]

KHUTPUT, s. This is a native slang term in Western India for a prevalent system of intrigue and corruption. The general meaning of khatpat in Hind. and Mahr. is rather 'wrangling' and 'worry,' but it is in the former sense that the word became famous (1850-54) in consequence of Sir James Outram's struggles with the rascality, during his tenure of the Residency of Baroda.

[1881.—"Khutput, or court intrigue, rules more or less in every native State, to an extent incredible among the more civilised nations of Europe."—Frazer, Records of Sport, 204.]

KHUTTRY, KHETTRY, CUTTRY, s. Hind. Khatrī, Khatrī, Skt. Kshatriya. The second, or military caste, in the theoretical or fourfold division of the Hindus. [But the word is more commonly applied to a mercantile caste, which has its origin in the Punjab, but is found in considerable numbers in other parts of India. Whether they are really of Kshatriya descent is a matter on which there is much difference of opinion. See Crooke, Tribes and Castes of N.W.P., iii. 264 seqq.] The Xarpiāoi whom Ptolemy locates apparently towards Rājputānā are probably Kshatriyas.

[1623.—"They told me Ciautru was a title of honour."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 312.

1630.—"And because Cuttery was of a martial temper God gave him power to sway Kingdoms with the scepter."—Lord, Banians, 5.

1638.—"Les habitans . . . sont la plus-part Benyans et Ketteris, tisserans, teinturiers, et autres ourriers en coton."—Mandelslo, ed. 1659, 130.

[1671.—"There are also Cuttarees, another Sect Principally about Agra and those parts up the Country, who are as the Banian Gentoos here."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxi.]

1673.—"Opium is frequently eaten in great quantities by the Rashpoots, Queteries, and Patans."—Fryer, 193.

1726.—"The second generation in rank among these heathen is that of the Settre-as."—Valentijn, Chorum. 87.

1782.—"The Chittery occasionally betakes himself to traffic, and the Sooder has become the inheritor of principalities."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, i. 64.

1836.—"The Banians are the mercantile caste of the original Hindoos. . . . They call themselves Shudderies, which signifies innocent or harmless (!)"—Sir R. Phillips, Million of Facts, 322.

KHYBER PASS, n.p. The famous gorge which forms the chief gate of Afghanistan from Peshawar, properly Khaibar. [The place of the same name near Al-Madinah is mentioned in the Āin (iii. 57), and Sir R. Burton writes: "Khaybar in Hebrew is supposed to mean a castle. D'Herbelot makes it to mean a pact or association of the Jews against the Moslems." (Pilgrimage, ed. 1893, i. 346, note).]

1519.—"Early next morning we set out on our march, and crossing the Kheiber Pass, halted at the foot of it. The Khizer-Khail had been extremely licentious in their conduct. Both on the coming and going of our army they had shot upon the stragglers, and such of our people as lagged behind, or separated from the rest, and carried off their horses. It was clearly expedient that they should meet with a suitable chastisement."—Baber, p. 277.

1603.—

"On Thursday Jamrud was our encamping ground.

"On Friday we went through the Khaibar Pass, and encamped at 'Alī Musjid."—Jahāngir, in Elliot, vi. 314.

1783.—"The stage from Timrood (read Jimrood) to Dickah, usually called the Hyber-pass, being the only one in which much danger is to be apprehended from banditti, the officer of the escort gave orders to his party to . . . march early on the next morning. . . . Timur Shah, who used to pass the winter at Peshour . . . never passed through the territory of the Hybers, without their attacking his advanced or rear guard."—Forster's Travels, ed. 1808, ii. 65-66.

1856.—

" . . . See the booted Moguls, like a pack Of hungry wolves, burst from their desert lair,

And crowding through the Khyber's rocky strait,

Sweep like a bloody harrow o'er the land." The Banyan Tree, p. 6.

1809.—"On paying a visit to any Asiatic Prince, an inferior receives from him a complete dress of honour, consisting of a khelaut, a robe, a turban, a shield and sword, with a string of pearls to go round the neck."—Ld. Valentia, i. 99.

1813.—"On examining the khelauts . . . from the great Maharajah Madajee Sindia, the serpeych (see SIRPECH) . . . presented to Sir Charles Malet, was found to be composed of false stones."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 50; [2nd ed. ii. 418].

KINCOP, s. Gold brocade. P.—H. kamkhāb, kamkhwāb, vulgarly kimkhwāb. The English is perhaps from the Gujaraṭī, as in that language the last syllable is short.

This word has been twice imported from the East. For it is only another form of the medieval name of an Eastern damask or brocade, cammocca. This was taken from the medieval Persian and Arabic forms kamkhā or kimkhwā, 'damasked silk,' and seems to have come to Europe in the 13th century. F. Johnson's Dict. distinguishes between kamkhā, 'damask silk of one colour,' and kimkhā, 'damask silk of different colours.' And this again, according to Dozy, quoting Hoffmann, is originally a Chinese word kin-kha; in which doubtless kin, 'gold,' is the first element. Kim is the Fuhkien form of the word; qu. kim-hoa, 'gold-flower'? We have seen kimkhwāb derived from Pers. kam-khwāb, 'less sleep,' because such cloth is rough and prevents sleep! This is a type of many etymologies. ["The ordinary derivation of the word supposes that a man could not even dream of it who had not seen it (kam, 'little,' khwāb, 'dream')"] (Yusuf Ali, Mono. on Silk, 86). Platts and the Madras Gloss. take it from kam, 'little,' khwāb, 'nap.'] Ducange appears to think the word survived in the French moCADE (or moquette); but if so the application of the term must have degenerated in England. (See in Draper's Dict. mockado, the form of which has suggested a sham stuff.)

c. 1300.—"Παῖδός γὰρ εὐδαιμονοῦντος, καὶ τὸν πατέρα δεῖ συνευδαιμονεῖν· κατὰ τὴν ἱμνουμένην ἀντιπελάργωσιν. Ἐσθῆτα πηνοῖφῃ πεπομφῶς ἦν καμχᾶν ἡ Περσῶν φησι γλῶττα, δράσων εὖ ἴσθι, οὐ δίπλακα μὲν οὐδὲ μαρμαρέην οἶαν Ἑλένη ἐξύφαινε, ἀλλ'

1781.—"My holiday suit, consisting of a flowered Velvet Coat of the Carpet Pattern, with two rows of broad Gold Lace, a rich Kingcob Waistcoat, and Crimson Velvet Breeches with Gold Garters, is now a butt to the shafts of Macaroni ridicule."—Letter from An Old Country Captain, in India Gazette, Feb. 24.

1786—" . . . but not until the nabob's mother aforesaid had engaged to pay for the said change of prison, a sum of £10,000 . . . and that she would ransack the zenanah . . . for Kincoba, muslins, cloths, &c. &c. &c. . . ."—Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burke's Works, 1852, vii. 28.

1809.—"Twenty trays of shawls, kheen-kauba . . . were tendered to me."—Ld. Valentia, i. 117.

[1813.—Forbes writes keemcob, keemcab, Or. Mem. 2nd i. 311 ; ii. 418.]

1829.—"Tired of this service we took possession of the town of Muttra, driving them out. Here we had glorious plunder—shawls, silks, satins, khemkauba, money, &c."—Mem. of John Shipp, i. 124.

KING-CROW, s. A glossy black bird, otherwise called Drongo shrike, about as large as a small pigeon, with a long forked tail, Dicrurus macrocercus, Vieillot, found all over India. "It perches generally on some bare branch, whence it can have a good look-out, or the top of a house, or post, or telegraph-wire, frequently also on low bushes, hedges, walks, or ant-hills" (Jerdon).

1883.—" . . . the King-crow . . . leaves the whole bird and beast tribe far behind in originality and force of character. . . . He does not come into the house, the telegraph wire suits him better. Perched on it he can see what is going on . . . drops, beak foremost, on the back of the kite . . . spies a bee-eater capturing a goodly moth, and after a hot chase, forces it to deliver up its booty."—The Tribes on My Frontier, 143.

KIOSQUE, s. From the Turki and Pers. kūshk or kushk, 'a pavilion, a villa,' &c. The word is not Anglo-Indian, nor is it a word, we think, at all common in modern native use.

c. 1350.—"When he was returned from his expedition, and drawing near to the capital, he ordered his son to build him a palace, or as those people call it a kushk, by the side of a river which runs at that place, which is called Afghanpūr."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 212.

1623.—"There is (in the garden) running water which issues from the entrance of a great kiosck, or covered place, where one may stay to take the air, which is built at the end of the garden over a great pond which adjoins the outside of the garden, so that, like the one at Surat, it serves also for the public use of the city."—P. della Valle, i. 535 ; [Hak. Soc. i. 68].

KIRBEE, KURBEE, s. Hind. karbi, kirbi, Skt. kadamba, 'the stalk of a pot-herb.' The stalks of jūir (see JOWAUR), used as food for cattle.

[1809.—"We also fell in with large ricks of kurbee, the dried stalks of Bajiru and Jocar, two inferior kinds of grain ; an excellent fodder for the camels."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 41.

[1823.—"Ordinary price of the straw (kirba) at harvest-time Rs. 1½ per hundred sheaves. . . ."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bombay, iii. 243.]

KISHM, n.p. The largest of the islands in the Persian Gulf, called by the Portuguese Queixome and the like, and sometimes by our old travellers, Kishmish. It is now more popularly called Jazirat-al-tawila, in Pers. Jaz. dardz, 'the Long Island' (like the Lewes), and the name of Kishm is confined to the chief town, at the eastern extremity, where still remains the old Portuguese fort taken in 1622, before which William Baffin the Navigator fell. But the oldest name is the still not quite extinct Brokht, which closely preserves the Greek Oaracta.

B.C. 325.—"And setting sail (from Harmozeia), in a run of 300 stadia they passed a desert and bushy island, and moored beside another island which was large and inhabited. The small desert island was named Organa (no doubt Gerun, afterwards the site of N. Hormuz—see ORMUS); and the one at which they anchored 'Oáparra, planted with vines and date-palms, and with plenty of corn."—Arrian, Voyage of Nearchus, ch. xxxvii.

1538.—" . . . so I hasted with him in the company of divers merchants for to go from Babylon (orig. Babylonia) to Caixem, whence he carried me to Ormuz. . . ."—F. M. Pinto, chap. vi. (Cogan, p. 9).

1553.—"Finally, like a timorous and despairing man . . . he determined to leave the city (Ormuz) deserted, and to pass over to the Isle of Queixome. That island is close to the mainland of Persia, and is within sight of Ormuz at 3 leagues distance."—Barros, III. vii. 4.

1554.—"Then we departed to the Isle of Kais or Old Hormuz, and then to the island of Brakhta, and some others of the Green Sea, i.e. in the Sea of Hormuz, without being able to get any intelligence."—Sidi 'Ali, 67.

[1600.—"Queixiome." See under RESHIRE.

[1623.—"They say likewise that Ormuz and Keschiome are extremely well fortified by the Moors."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 188 ; in i. 2, Kesom.

[1652.—"Keckmishe." See under CONGO BUNDER.]

1673. — "We refreshed ourselves an entire Day at Gerom, where a small White Grape, without any Stone, was an excellent Cordial . . . they are called Kismas Grapes, and the Wine is known by the same Name farther than where they grow." — Fryer, 242.

1711. — "I could never meet with any of the Kishmishes before they were turned. These are Raisins, a size less than our Malagas, of the same Colour, and without Stones." — Lockyer, 233.

1883. — "Kishmish, a delicious grape, of white elongated shape, also small and very sweet, both eaten and used for wine-making. When dried this is the Sultana raisin. . . ." — Wills, Modern Persia, 171.

KISSMISS, s. Native servant's word for Christmas. But that festival is usually called Bard din, 'the great day.' (See BURRA DIN.)

KIST, s. Ar. kist. The yearly land revenue in India is paid by instalments which fall due at different periods in different parts of the country; each such instalment is called a kist, or quota. [The settlement of these instalments is kist-bandī.]

[1767. — "This method of comprising the whole estimate into so narrow a compass . . . will convey to you a more distinct idea . . . than if we transmitted a monthly account of the deficiency of each person's Kistbundee." — Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 56.]

1810. — "The heavy Kists or collections of Bengal are from August to September." — Williamson, V. M. ii. 498.

1817. — "'So desperate a malady,' said the President, 'requires a remedy that shall reach its source. And I have no hesitation in stating my opinion that there is no mode of eradicating the disease, but by removing the original cause; and placing these districts, which are pledged for the security of the Kists, beyond the reach of his Highness's management.'" — Mill, vi. 55.

KITMUTGAR, s. Hind. khidmat-gār, from Ar. — P. khidmat, 'service,' therefore 'one rendering service.' The Anglo-Indian use is peculiar to the Bengal Presidency, where the word is habitually applied to a Musulman servant, whose duties are connected with serving meals and waiting at table under the Consumah, if there be one. Kismutgar is a vulgarism, now perhaps obsolete. The word is spelt by Hadley in his Grammar (see under MOORS) khuzmutgār. In the word khidmat, as in khil'at (see KILLUT), the terminal t in uninflected Arabic has long been dropt, though retained in the form in which these words have got into foreign tongues.

1759. — The wages of a Khedmutgar appear as 3 Rupees a month. — In Long, p. 182.

1765. — ". . . they were taken into the service of Soujah Dowlah as immediate attendants on his person; Hodjee (see HADJEE) in capacity of his first Kistmutgar (or valet)." — Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 60.

1782. — "I therefore beg to caution strangers against those race of vagabonds who ply about them under the denomination of Consumahs and Kismutdars." — Letter in India Gazette, Sept. 28.

1784. — "The Bearer . . . perceiving a quantity of blood . . . called to the Hookaburdar and a Kistmutgar." — In Seton-Karr, i. 13.

1810. — "The Khedmutgar, or as he is often termed, the Kismutgar, is with very few exceptions, a Musulman; his business is to . . . wait at table." — Williamson, V. M. i. 212.

c. 1810. — "The Kitmutgaur, who had attended us from Calcutta, had done his work, and made his harvests, though in no very large way, of the 'Tazer Willant' or white people."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 283. The phrase in italics stands for tāzi Wilāyatī (see BILAYUT), "fresh or green Europeans"—Griffins (q.v.).

1813.—"We . . . saw nothing remarkable on the way but a Khidmutgar of Chimnagio Appa, who was rolling from Poona to Punderpoor, in performance of a vow which he made for a child. He had been a month at it, and had become so expert that he went on smoothly and without pausing, and kept rolling evenly along the middle of the road, over stones and everything. He travelled at the rate of two coss a day."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 257-8.

1878.—"We had each our own . . . Kitmutgar or table servant. It is the custom in India for each person to have his own table servant, and when dining out to take him with him to wait behind his chair."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 32.

[1889.—"Here's the Khut coming for the late change."—R. Kipling, The Gadsbys, 24.]

KITTY SOL, KITSOL, s. This word survived till lately in the Indian Tariff, but it is otherwise long obsolete. It was formerly in common use for 'an umbrella,' and especially for the kind, made of bamboo and paper, imported from China, such as the English fashion of to-day has adopted to screen fire-places in summer. The word is Portuguese, quita-sol, 'bar-sun.' Also tirasole occurs in Scot's Discourse of Java, quoted below from Purchas. See also Hulsius, Coll. of Voyages, in German, 1602, i. 27. [Mr. Skeat points out that in Howison's Malay Dict. (1801) we have, s.v. Payong: "A kittasol, sombrera," which is nearer to the Port. original than any of the examples given since 1611. This may be due to the strong Portuguese influence at Malacca.]

1588.—"The present was fortie peeces of silke . . . a litter chaire and guilt, and two quitasoles of silke."—Parkes's Mendoza, ii. 105.

KLING, n.p. This is the name (Kāling) applied in the Malay countries, including our Straits Settlements, to the people of Continental India who trade thither, or are settled in those regions, and to the descendants of the—settlers. [Mr. Skeat remarks: "The standard Malay form is not Kaling, which is the Sumatran form, but Keling (K'ling or Kling). The Malay use of the word is, as a rule, restricted to Tamils, but it is very rarely used in a wider sense."]

The name is a form of Kalinga, a very ancient name for the region known as the "Northern Circars," (q.v.), i.e. the Telugu coast of the Bay of Bengal, or, to express it otherwise in general terms, for that coast which extends from the Kistna to the Mahānadi. "The Kalingas" also appear frequently, after the Pauranic fashion, as an ethnic name in the old Sanskrit lists of races. Kalinga appears in the earliest of Indian inscriptions, viz. in the edicts of Aśoka, and specifically in that famous edict (XIII.) remaining in fragments at Gīrnār and Kapurdi-giri, and more completely at Khālsī, which preserves the link, almost unique from the Indian side, connecting the histories of India and of the Greeks, by recording the names of Antiochus, Ptolemy, Antigonos, Magas, and Alexander.

Kalinga is a kingdom constantly mentioned in the Buddhist and historical legends of Ceylon; and we find commemoration of the kingdom of Kalinga and of the capital city of Kalinganagara (e.g. in Ind. Antiq. iii. 152, x. 243). It was from a daughter of a King of Kalinga that sprang, according to the Mahawanso, the famous Wijayo, the civilizer of Ceylon and the founder of its ancient royal race.

Kalingapatam, a port of the Ganjam district, still preserves the ancient name of Kalinga, though its identity with the Kalinganagara of the inscriptions is not to be assumed. The name in later, but still ancient, inscriptions appears occasionally as Tri-Kalinga, "the Three Kalingas"; and this probably, in a Telugu version Mūdu-Kalinga, having that meaning, is the original of the Modogalinga of Pliny in one of the passages quoted from him. (The possible connection which obviously suggests itself of this name Trikalinga with the names Tilinga and Tilingdna, applied, at least since the Middle Ages, to the same region, will be noticed under TELINGA).

The coast of Kalinga appears to be that part of the continent whence commerce with the Archipelago at an early date, and emigration thither, was most rife; and the name appears to have been in great measure adopted in the Archipelago as the designation of India in general, or of the whole of the Peninsular part of it. Throughout the book of Malay historical legends called the Sijara Malayu the word Kaling or Kling is used for India in general, but more particularly for the southern parts (see Journ. Ind. Archip. v. 133). And the statement of Forrest (Voyage to Mergui Archip. 1792, p. 82) that Macassar "Indostan" was called "Neegree Telinga" (i.e. Nagara Telinga) illustrates the same thing and also the substantial identity of the names Telinga, Kalinga.

The name Kling, applied to settlers of Indian origin, makes its appearance in the Portuguese narratives immediately after the conquest of Malacca (1511). At the present day most, if not all of the Klings of Singapore come, not from the "Northern Circars," but from Tanjore, a purely Tamil district. And thus it is that so good an authority as Roorda van Eijsinga translates Kaling by 'Coromandel people.' They are either Hindūs or Labbais (see LUBBYE). The latter class in British India never take domestic service with Europeans, whilst they seem to succeed well in that capacity in Singapore. "In 1876," writes Dr. Burnell, "the head-servant at Bekker's great hotel there was a very good specimen of the Nagūr Labbais; and to my surprise he recollected me as the head assistant-collector of Tanjore, which I had been some ten years before." The Hindu Klings appear to be chiefly drivers of hackney carriages and keepers of eating-houses. There is a Śiva temple in Singapore, which is served by Pandārāms (q.v.). The only Brahmans there in 1876 were certain convicts. It may be noticed that Calingas is the name of a heathen tribe of (alleged) Malay origin in the east of N. Luzon (Philippine Islands).

KOËL.

KOHINOR, n.p. Pers. Koh-i-nār, 'Mountain of Light'; the name of one of the most famous diamonds in the world. It was an item in the Deccan booty of Alauddin Khilji (dd. 1316), and was surrendered to Baber (or more precisely to his son Humayun) on the capture of Agra (1526). It remained in the possession of the Moghul dynasty till Nadir extorted it at Delhi from the conquered Mahommed Shah (1739). After Nadir's death it came into the hands of Ahmed Shah, the founder of the Afghan monarchy. Shah Shuja', Ahmed's grandson, had in turn to give it up to Ranjit Singh when a fugitive in his dominions. On the annexation of the Punjab in 1849 it passed to the English, and is now among the Crown jewels of England. Before it reached that position it ran through strange risks, as may be read in a most diverting story told by Bosworth Smith in his Life of Lord Lawrence (i. 327-8). In 1850-51, before being shown at the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, it went through a process of cutting which, for reasons unintelligible to ordinary mortals, reduced its weight from 186½ carats to 106½. [See an interesting note in Ball's Tavernier, ii. 431 seqq.]

1526.—"In the battle in which Ibrahim was defeated, Bikramjit (Raja of Gwalior) was sent to hell. Bikramjit's family . . . were at this moment in Agra. When Humayun arrived . . . (he) did not permit them to be plundered. Of their own free will they presented to Humayun a peacock (see PERCUSE), consisting of a quantity of jewels and precious stones. Among these was one famous diamond which had been acquired by Sultan Alauddin. It is so valuable that a judge of diamonds valued it at half the daily expense of the whole world. It is about eight mishtals. . . ."—Baber, p. 308.

1676.—(With an engraving of the stone.) "This diamond belongs to the Great Mogul . . . and it weighs 319 Ratis (see BUTTEE) and a half, which make 279 and nine 16ths of our Carats; when it was rough it weigh'd 907 Ratis, which make 793 carats."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 148; [ed. Ball, ii. 123].

1856.—"He (Akbar) bears no weapon, save his dagger, hid
Up to the ivory haft in muslin swathes;
No ornament but that one famous gem,

Mountain of Light! bound with a silken thread
Upon his nervous wrist; more used, I ween,
To feel the rough strap of his buckler there."

KOOMKY, s. (See COOMKY.)

KOONBEE, KUNBEE, KOOL-UMBEE, n.p. The name of the prevalent cultivating class in Guzerat and the Konkan, the Kurmi of N. India. Skt. kufumba. The Kundi is the pure Sudra, [but the N. India branch are beginning to assert a more respectable origin]. In the Deccan the title distinguished the cultivator from him who wore arms and preferred to be called a Mahratta (Drummond).

KOSHOUN, s. This is a term which was affected by Tippoo Sahib in his military organisation, for a brigade, or a regiment in the larger Continental use of that word. His Piddah 'askar, or Regular Infantry, was formed into 5 Kachahris (see CUTCHERRY), composed in all of 27 Kushūns. A MS. note on the copy of Kirkpatrick's Letters in the India Office Library says that Kushoon was properly Skt. kshuni or kshauni, ‘a grand division of the force of an Empire, as used in the Mahābhārata. But the word adopted by Tippoo appears to be Turki. Thus we read in Quatremère's transl. from Abdur-razzāk: “He (Shāh Rukh) distributed to the emirs who commanded the tomāns (corps of 10,000), the koshūn (corps of 1000), the sadeh (of 100), the deheh (of 10), and even to the private soldiers, presents and rewards” (Notes et Exts. xiv. 91; see also p. 89). Again: “The soldiers of Isfahan having heard of the amnesty accorded them, arrived, koshūn by koshūn.” (Ibid. 130.) Vambéry gives koshūn as Or. Turki for an army, a troop (literally whatever is composed of several parts).

[1753.—“... Kara-kushun, are also foot soldiers . . . the name is Turkish and signifies black guard.”—Hanway, I. pt. ii. 252.]

c. 1782.—“In the time of the deceased Nawab, the exercises . . . of the regular troops were . . . performed, and the word given according to the French system . . . but now, the Sultan (Tippoo) . . . changed the military code . . . and altered the technical terms or words of command . . . to words of the Persian and Turkish languages. . . . From the regular infantry 5000 men being selected, they were named Kushoon, and the officer commanding that body was called a Sipahdar. . . .”—Hist. of Tipu Sultan, p. 31.

[1810.—“... with a division of five regular cushoons. . . .”—Wilks, Mysore, reprint 1869, ii. 218.]

KOTOW, KOWTOW, s. From the Chinese k'o-t'ou, lit. ‘knock-head’; the salutation used in China before the Emperor, his representatives, or his symbols, made by prostrations repeated a fixed number of times, the forehead touching the ground at each prostration. It is also used as the most respectful form of salutation from children to parents, and from servants to masters on formal occasions, &c.

This mode of homage belongs to old Pan-Asiatic practice. It was not, however, according to M. Pauthier, of indigenous antiquity at the Court of China, for it is not found in the ancient Book of Rites of the Cheu Dynasty, and he supposes it to have been introduced by the great destroyer and reorganiser, Tsin shi Hwangti, the Builder of the Wall. It had certainly become established by the 8th century of our era, for it is mentioned that the Ambassadors who came to Court from the famous Hārūn-al-Rashīd (A.D. 798) had to perform it. Its nature is mentioned by Marco Polo, and by the ambassadors of Shāh Rukh (see below). It was also the established ceremonial in the presence of the Mongol Khāns, and is described by Baber under the name of kornish. It was probably introduced into Persia in the time of the Mongol Princes of the house of Hulākū, and it continued to be in use in the time of Shāh 'Abbās. The custom indeed in Persia may possibly have come down from

c. 1590.—The kowtow under Akbar had been greatly modified:

"His Majesty has commanded the palm of the right hand to be placed upon the forehead, and the head to be bent downwards. This mode of salutation, in the language of the present age, is called Kormak."—Ata, ed. Blackman, i. 158.

But for his position as the head of religion, in his new faith he permitted, or claimed prostration (sijda) before him:

"As some perverse and dark-minded men look upon prostration as blasphemous man-worship, His Majesty, from practical wisdom, has ordered it to be discontinued by the ignorant, and remitted it to all ranks. . . . However, in the private assembly, when any of those are in waiting, upon whom the star of good fortune shines, and they receive the order of seating themselves, they certainly perform the prostration of gratitude by bowing down their foreheads to the earth."—Ibid. p. 159.

[1615.—". . . Whereat some officers called me to siz-da (sij-da), but the King answered no, no, in Persian."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 244; and see ii. 296.]

1618.—"The King (Shah 'Abbas) halted and looked at the Sultan, the latter on both knees, as is their fashion, near him, and advanced his right foot towards him to be kissed. The Sultan having kissed it, and touched it with his forehead . . . made a circuit round the king, passing behind him, and making way for his companions to do the like. This done the Sultan came and kissed a second time, as did the other, and this they did three times."—P. della Valle, i. 646.

[c. 1686.—"Job (Charnock) made a salam Kormak, or low obeisance, every second step he advanced."—Orme, Fragments, quoted in Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xcvi.]

1818.—"Lord Amherst put into my hands . . . a translation . . . by Mr. Morrison of a document received at Tongchow with some others from Chang, containing an official description of the ceremonies to be observed at the public audience of the Ambassador. . . . The Ambassador was then to have been conducted by the Mandarins to the level area, where kneeling . . . he was next to have been conducted to the lower end of the hall, where facing the upper part . . . he was to have performed the ko-tou with 9 prostrations; afterwards he was to have been led out of the hall, and having prostrated himself once behind the row of Mandarins, he was to have been allowed to sit down; he was further to have prostrated himself with the attendant Princes and Mandarins when the Emperor drank. Two other prostrations were to have been made, the first when the milk-tea was presented to him, and the other when he had finished drinking."—Ellis's Journal of (Lord Amherst's) Embassy to China, 213-214.

1824.—"The first ambassador, with all his following, shall then perform the ceremonial of the three kneelings and the nine prostrations; they shall then rise and be led away in proper order."—Ceremonial observed at the Court of Peking for the Reception of Ambassadors, ed. 1824, in Pauthier, 192.

1855.—". . . The spectacle of one after another of the aristocracy of nature making the kotow to the aristocracy of the accident."—H. Martineau, Autobiog. ii. 377.

1860.—"Some Saiks, and a private in the Buffs having remained behind with the grog-carts, fell into the hands of the Chinese. On the next morning they were brought before the authorities, and commanded to perform the kotow. The Saiks obeyed; but Moyse, the English soldier, declaring that he would not prostrate himself before any Chinaman alive, was immediately knocked upon the head, and his body thrown upon a dunghill" (see China Correspondent of the Times). This passage prefaces some noble lines by Sir F. Doyle, ending:

"Vain mightiest fleets, of iron framed;
Vain those all-shattering guns;
Unless proud England keep, untamed,
The strong heart of her sons.
So let his name through Europe ring—
A man of mean estate,
Who died, as firm as Sparta's king,
Because his soul was great."

Macmillan's Mag. iii. 130.

1876.—"Nebba more kowtow big people."—Leland, 46.

1879.—"We know that John Bull adores a lord, but a man of Major L'Estrange's social standing would scarcely kowtow to every shabby little title to be found in stuffy little rooms in Mayfair."—Sat. Review, April 19, p. 506.

KOTUL, a. This appears to be a Turki word, though adopted by the Afghans. Kotal, 'a mountain pass, a col.' Pavet de Courteille quotes several passages, in which it occurs, from Baber's original Turki.

[1554.—"Kotel." See under REINOCEROS.]

[1809.—"We afterwards went on through the hills, and crossed two Cotals or passes."—Elphinstone, India, ed. 1842, i. 51.]

KUBBER, KHUBBER, a. Ar.—P.—H. khabar, 'news,' and especially as a sporting term, news of game, c.g. "There is pucka khubber of a tiger this morning."

[1828.—". . . the servant informed us that there were some gongwala, or villagers, in waiting, who had some khubber (news about tigers) to give us."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 53.]

1878.—"Khabar of innumerable black partridge had been received."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 159.

1879.—"He will not tell me what khhabar has been received."—Varsity Fair, Nov. 29, p. 299.

KUBBERDAUR. An interjectional exclamation, 'Take care!' Pers. khavar-dār! 'take heed!' (see KUBBER). It is the usual cry of chokidārs to show that they are awake. [As a substantive it has the sense of a 'scout' or 'spy.']

c. 1664.—"Each omrah causeth a guard to be kept all the night long, in his particular camp, of such men that perpetually go the round, and cry Kaber-dar, have a care."—Bernier, E.T. 119; [ed. Constable, 369].

c. 1665.—"Les archers crient ensuite a pleine tête, Caberdar, c'est à dire prends garde."—Thevenot, v. 58.

[1813.—"There is a strange custom which prevails at all Indian courts, of having a servant called a khubur-dar, or newsman, who is an admitted spy upon the chief, about whose person he is employed."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 25.]

KUHĀR, s. Hind. Kahār, [Skt. skandha-kāra, 'one who carries loads on his shoulders']. The name of a Sūdra caste of cultivators, numerous in Bahār and the N.W. Provinces, whose speciality is to carry palankins. The name is, therefore, in many parts of India synonymous with 'palankin-bearer,' and the Hindu body-servants called bearers (q.v.) in the Bengal Presidency are generally of this caste.

c. 1350.—"It is the custom for every traveller in India . . . also to hire kahārs, who carry the kitchen furniture, whilst others carry himself in the palankin, of which we have spoken, and carry the latter when it is not in use."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 415.

c. 1550.—"So saying he began to make ready a present, and sent for bulbs, roots, and fruit, birds and beasts, with the finest of fish . . . which were brought by kahārs in basketfuls."—Rāmāyana of Tulsi Dās, by Growse, 1878, ii. 101.

1673.—"He (the President of Bombay) goes sometimes in his Coach, drawn by large Milk-white Oxen, sometimes on Horseback, other times in Palankeens, carried by Cohors, Musselmen Porters."—Fryer, 68.

1810.—"The Cahar, or palanquin-bearer, is a servant of peculiar utility in a country where, for four months, the intense heat precludes Europeans from taking much exercise."—Williamson, V.M. i. 209.

1873.—"Bhut Kahār. A widely spread caste of rather inferior rank, whose occupation is to carry palkis, dolis, water-skins, &c. ; to act as Porters . . . they eat flesh and drink spirits: they are an ignorant but industrious class. Buchanan describes them as of Telinga descent. . . ."—Dr. H. V. Carter's Notices of Castes in Bombay Pry., quoted in Ind. Antiq. ii. 154.

KULĀ, KLĀ, n.p. Burmese name of a native of Continental India; and hence misapplied also to the English and other Westerns who have come from India to Burma; in fact used generally for a Western foreigner.

The origin of this term has been much debated. Some have supposed it to be connected with the name of the Indian race, the Kols; another suggestion has connected it with Kalinga (see KLING); and a third with the Skt. kula, 'caste or tribe'; whilst the Burmese popular etymology renders it from kū, 'to cross over,' and la, 'to come,' therefore 'the people that come across (the sea).' But the true history of the word has for the first time been traced by Professor Forchhammer, to Gola, the name applied in old Pegu inscriptions to the Indian Buddhist immigrants, a name which he identifies with the Skt. Gauda, the ancient name of Northern Bengal, whence the famous city of Gaur (see GOUR, c).

14th cent.—"The Heroes Sona and Uttara were sent to Rāmañña, which forms a part of Suvannabhūmi, to propagate the holy faith. . . . This town is called to this day Golamattikanagara, because of the many houses it contained made of earth in the fashion of houses of the Gola people."—Inscr. at Kalyāni near Pegu, in Forchhammer, ii. 5.

1795.—"They were still anxious to know why a person consulting his own amusement, and master of his own time, should walk so fast; but on being informed that I was a 'Colar,' or stranger, and that it was the custom of my country, they were reconciled to this. . . ."—Symes, Embassy, p. 290.

1855.—"His private dwelling was a small place on one side of the court, from which the women peeped out at the Kalās; . . ."—Yule, Mission to the Court of Ava (Phayre's), p. 5.

„ "By a curious self-delusion, the Burmans would seem to claim that in theory at least they are white people. And what is still more curious, the Bengalees appear indirectly to admit the claim; for our servants in speaking of themselves and their countrymen, as distinguished from the Burmans, constantly made use of the term kālā admi—'black man,' as the representative of the Burmese kālā, a foreigner."—Ibid. p. 37.

KUMPÁSS, s. Hind. kampās, corruption of English compass, and hence applied not only to a marine or a surveying compass, but also to theodolites, levelling instruments, and other were of European manufacture, and that one of these bore the famous name of Andrea Ferrara. I add an extract. Mr. Walhouse accounts for the adoption of these blades in a country possessing the far-famed Indian steel, in that the latter was excessively brittle. The passage from Stavorinus describes the weapon, without giving a native name. We do not know what name is indicated by 'belly piercer.'

c. 1343.—"The villagers gathered round him, and one of them stabbed him with a kattāra. This is the name given to an iron weapon resembling a plough-share; the hand is inserted into it so that the forearm is shielded; but the blade beyond is two cubits in length, and a blow with it is mortal."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 31-32.

1442.—"The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked. . . . In one hand they hold an Indian poignard (katārah-i-Hindī), and in the other a buckler of ox-hide . . . this costume is common to the king and the beggar."—Abdurrazzak, in India in the XVth Cent., p. 17.

c. 1526.—"On the whole there were given one tipchāk horse with the saddle, two pairs of swords with the belts, 25 sets of enamelled daggers (khanjar—see HANGER), 16 enamelled kitārehs, two daggers (jamdher—see JUMDUD) set with precious stones."—Baber, 338.

[c. 1590.—In the list of the Moghul arms we have: "10. Katārah, price $\frac{1}{2}$ R. to 1 Muhur."—Āin, ed. Blochmann, i. 110, with an engraving, No. 9, pl. xii.]

1638.—"Les personnes de qualité portēt dans la ceinture vne sorte d'armes, ou de poignards, courte et large, qu'ils appellent ginda (?) ou Catarre, dont la garde et la gaine sont d'or."—Mandelslo, Paris, 1659, 223.

1673.—"They go rich in Attire, with a Poniard, or Catarre, at their girdle."—Fryer, 93.

1690.—". . . which chafes and ferments him to such a pitch; that with a Catarry or Bagonet in his hands he first falls upon those that are near him . . . killing and stabbing as he goes. . . ."—Orington, 237.

1754.—"To these were added an enamelled dagger (which the Indians call cuttarri) and two swords. . . ."—H. of Nadir, in Hanway's Travels, ii. 386.

1768-71.—"They (the Moguls) on the left side . . . wear a weapon which they call by a name that may be translated belly-piercer; it is about 14 inches long; broad near the hilt, and tapering away to a sharp point; it is made of fine steel; the handle has, on each side of it, a catch, which, when the weapon is griped by the hand, shuts round the wrist, and secures it from being dropped."—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 457.

1813.—"After a short silent prayer, Lullabhy, in the presence of all the company, waved his catarra, or short dagger, over the bed of the expiring man. . . . The patient continued for some time motionless: in half an hour his heart appeared to beat, circulation quickened, . . . at the expiration of the third hour Lullabhy had effected his cure."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 249; [2nd ed. ii. 272, and see i. 69].

1856.—"The manners of the bardic tribe are very similar to those of their Rajpoot clients; their dress is nearly the same, but the bard seldom appears without the 'Kutār,' or dagger, a representation of which is scrawled beside his signature, and often rudely engraved upon his monumental stone, in evidence of his death in the sacred duty of Trāgā" (q.v.).—Forbes, Rās Mālā, ed. 1878, pp. 559-560.

1878.—"The ancient Indian smiths seem to have had a difficulty in hitting on a medium between this highly refined brittle steel and a too soft metal. In ancient sculptures, as in Srirangam near Trichinapalli, life-sized figures of armed men are represented, bearing Kuttars or long daggers of a peculiar shape; the handles, not so broad as in the later Kuttars, are covered with a long narrow guard, and the blades $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches broad at bottom, taper very gradually to a point through a length of 18 inches, more than $\frac{3}{4}$ of which is deeply channelled on both sides with 6 converging grooves. There were many of these in the Tanjor armoury, perfectly corresponding . . . and all were so soft as to be easily bent."—Ind. Antiq. vii.

KUZZANNA, s. Ar.—H. khizdna, or khazdna, 'a treasury.' [In Ar. kha-zīnah, or khaznah, means 'a treasury,' representing 1000 kis or purses, each worth about £5 (see Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 405).] It is the usual word for the district and general treasuries in British India; and khazānchī for the treasurer.

1683.—"Ye King's Duan (see DEWAUN) had demanded of them 8000 Rupees on account of remains of last year's Tallecas (see TALLICA) . . . ordering his Peasdash (Peshdash, an assistant) to see it suddenly paid in ye King's Cuzzanna."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 103.

[1757.—"A mint has been established in Calcutta; continue coining gold and silver into Siccas and Mohurs . . . they shall pass current in the provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, and be received into the Cadganna. . . ."—Perwannah from Jaffier Ally Khan, in Verelst, App. 145.]

KUZZILBASH, n.p. Turki kizil-bāsh, 'red-head.' This title has been since the days of the Safavi (see SOPHY) dynasty in Persia, applied to the Persianized Turks, who form the ruling class in that country, from the red caps which they wore. The class is also settled extensively over Afghanistan. ["At Kābul," writes Bellew (Races of Afghanistan, 107), "he (Nādir) left as chandaul, or 'rear guard,' a detachment of 12,000 of his Kizilbāsh (so named from the red caps they wore), or Mughal Persian troops. After the death of Nādir they remained at Kābul as a military colony, and their descendants occupy a distinct quarter of the city, which is called Chandaul. These Kizilbāsh hold their own ground here, as a distinct Persian community of the Shia persuasion, against the native population of the Sunni profession. They constitute an important element in the general population of the city, and exercise a considerable influence in its local politics. Owing to their isolated position and antagonism to the native population, they are favourably inclined to the British authority."] Many of them used to take service with the Delhi emperors; and not a few do so now in our frontier cavalry regiments.

c. 1510.—"L'vianza loro è di portare vna berretta rossa, ch'auanza sopra la testa mezzo braccio, a guisa d'vn zon ('like a top'), che dalla parte, che si mette in testa, vine a essar larga, ristringendosi tuttauia sino in cima, et è fatta con dodici coste grosse vn dito . . . ne mai tagliano barba ne mostacchi."—G. M. Angiolello, in Ramusio, ii. f. 74.

1550.—"Oltra il deserto che è sopra il Corussam fino à Samarcand . . . signorreggiano Iescil bas, cioè le berrette verdi, le quali benette verdi sono alcuni Tartari Musulmani che portano le loro berrette di feltro verde acute, e così si fanno chiamare à differentia de Soffiani suoi capitali nemici che signoreggiano la Persia, pur anche essi Musulmani, i quali portano le berrette rosse, quali berrette verdi e rosse, hanno continuamente hauuta fra se guerra crudelissima per causa di diversità di opinione nella loro religione."—Chaggi Memet, in Ramusio, ii. f. 16v. "Beyond the desert above Corassam, as far as Samarkand and the idolatrous cities, the Yeshilbas (Iescilbas) or 'Green-caps,' are predominant. These Green-caps are certain Musulman Tartars who wear pointed caps of green felt, and they are so called to distinguish them from their chief enemies the Soffians, who are predominant in Persia, who are indeed also Musulmans, but who wear red caps."

1574.—"These Persians are also called Red Turks, which I believe is because they have behind on their Turbants, Red Marks, as Cotton Ribbands &c. with Red Brims, whereby they are soon discerned from other Nations."—Rauwolf, 173.

1606.—"Cocelbaxas, who are the soldiers

1653.—"Le visité le keselbache qui y commande vne petite forteresse, duquel ie receu beaucoup de civilitez."—De La Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, pp. 284-5.

"Keselbache est vn mot composé de Kesel, qui signifie rouge, et bachi, teste, comme qui diroit teste rouge, et par ce terme s'entendent les gens de guerre de Perse, à cause du bonnet de Sophi qui est rouge."—Ibid. 545.

1673.—"Those who compose the Main Body of the Cavalry, are the Cusle-Bashees, or with us the Chevaliers."—Fryer, 356. Fryer also writes Cusselbash (Index).

1815.—"The seven Turkish tribes, who had been the chief promoters of his (Ismail's) glory and success, were distinguished by a particular dress; they wore a red cap, from which they received the Turkish name of Kuzelbash, or 'golden heads,' which has descended to their posterity."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, ii. 502-3.

1828.—"The Kuzzilbash, a Tale of Khorasan. By James Baillie Fraser."

1883.—"For there are rats and rats, and a man of average capacity may as well hope to distinguish scientifically between Ghilzais, Kuki Kheyls, Logar Maliks, Shigwals, Ghazis, Jezailchis, Hazaras, Logaris, Wardaks, Mandozais, Lepel-Griffin, and Kizilbashes, as to master the division of the great race of rats."—Tribes on My Frontier, 15.

KYFE, n. One often meets with this word (Ar. kaif) in books about the Levant, to indicate the absolute enjoyment of the dolce far niente. Though it is in the Hindustāni dictionaries, we never remember to have heard it used in India; but the first quotation below shows that it is, or has been, in use in Western India, in something like the Turkish sense. The proper meaning of the Ar. word is 'how?' 'in what manner?' the secondary is 'partial intoxication.' This looks almost like a parallel to the English vulgar slang of 'how comed you so?' But in fact a man's kaif is his 'howness,' i.e. what pleases him, his humour; and this passes into the sense of gaiety caused by hashish, &c.

1808.—". . . a kind of confectio Japonica loaded with opium, Ganja or Bang, and causing keif, or the first degree of intoxication, lulling the senses and disposing to sleep."—R. Drummond.

KYOUNG, s. Burm. kyaung. A Buddhist monastery. The term is not employed by Padre Sangermano, who uses baio, a word, he says, used by the Portuguese in India (p. 88). I cannot explain it. [See BAO.]

1799.—“The kloums or convents of the Rhahaans are different in their structure from common houses, and much resemble the architecture of the Chinese; they are made entirely of wood; the roof is composed of different stages, supported by strong pillars,” &c.—Symes, p. 210.

KYTHEE, s. Hind. Kaithi. A form of cursive Nagari character, used by Bunyas, &c., in Gangetic India. It is from Kāyath (Skt. Kayastha), a member of the writer-caste.

LAC, s. Hind. lākḥ, from Skt. lākṣhā, for rākṣhā. The resinous incrustation produced on certain trees (of which the dhāk (see DEHAWK) is one, but chiefly Peepul, and khossum [kusum, kusumb], i.e. Schleichera bijuga, trijuga) by the puncture of the Lac insect (Coccus Lacca, L.). See Roxburgh, in Vol. III. As. Res., 384 seqq; [and a full list of the trees on which the insect feeds, in Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 410 seq.]. The incrustation contains 60 to 70 per cent. of resinous lac, and 10 per cent. of dark red colouring matter from which is manufactured lac-dye. The material in its original crude form is called stick-lac; when boiled in water it loses its red colour, and is then termed seed-lac; the melted clarified substance, after the extraction of the dye, is turned out in thin irregular laminae called shell-lac. This is used to make sealing-wax, in the fabrication of varnishes, and very largely as a stiffening for men's hats.

Though lāk bears the same sense in Persian, and lak or luk are used in modern Arabic for sealing-wax, it would appear from Dozy (Glos., pp. 295-6, and Oosterlingen, 57), that identical or approximate forms are used in various Arabic-speaking regions for a variety of substances giving a red dye, including the coccus ilicis or Kermes. Still, we have seen no evidence that in India the word was applied otherwise than to the lac of our heading. (Garcia says that the Arabs called it loc-sumutri, ‘lac of Sumatra’; probably because the Pegu lac was brought to the ports of Sumatra, and purchased there.) And this the term in the Periplus seems unquestionably to indicate; whilst it is probable that the passage quoted from Aelian is a much misconceived account of the product. It is not nearly so absurd as De Monfart's account below. The English word lake for a certain red colour is from this. So also are lacquer and lacked ware, because lac is used in some of the varnishes with which such ware is prepared.

c. A.D. 80-90.—These articles are imported (to the ports of Barbaricē, on the W. of the Red Sea) from the interior parts of Ariakē:—

“Σίδηρος Ἰνδικὸς καὶ στρόμωμα (Indian iron and steel)

* * * * *

Λάκκος χρωματίνος (Lac-dye).”

c. 250.—“There are produced in India animals of the size of a beetle, of a red colour, and if you saw them for the first time you would compare them to cinnabar. They have very long legs, and are soft to the touch; they are produced on the trees that bear electrum, and they feed on the fruit of these. The Indians catch them and crush them, and with these dye their red cloaks, and the tunics under these, and everything else that they wish to turn to this colour, and to dye. And this kind of clothing is carried also to the King of Persia.”—Aelian, de Nat. Animal. iv. 46.

c. 1343.—The notice of lacca in Pegolotti is in parts very difficult to translate, and we do not feel absolutely certain that it refers to the Indian product, though we believe it to be so. Thus, after explaining that there are two classes of lacca, the matura and acerba, or ripe and unripe, he goes on: “It is produced attached to stalks, i.e. to the branches of shrubs, but it ought to be clear from stalks, and earthy dust, and sand, and from costiere (!). The stalks are the twigs of the wood on which it is produced, the costiere or figs, as the Catalans call them, are composed of the dust of the thing, which when it is fresh heaps together and hardens like pitch; only that pitch is black, and those costiere or figs are red and of the colour of unripe lacca. And more of these costiere is found in the unripe than the ripe lacca,” and so on.—Della Decima, iii. 365.

1510.—“There also grows a very large quantity of lacca (or lacra) for making red colour, and the tree of this is formed like our trees which produce walnuts.”—Varthema, 238.

1516.—“Here (in Pegu) they load much fine laquar, which grows in the country.”—Barbosa, Lisbon Acad., 366.

1554.—“(Money of Ormuz).—A leque is equivalent to 50 pardaos of çadis, which is called ‘bad money,’ (and this leque is not a coin but a number by which they reckon at Ormuz): and each of these pardaos is equal to 2 azares, and each azar to 10 çadis, each çadi to 100 dinars, and after this fashion they calculate in the books of the Custom-house. . . .”—Nunez, Livro dos Pesos, &c., in Subsídios, 25.

Here the azar is the Persian hazār or 1000 (dīnārs); the çadi Pers. sad or 100 (dīnārs); the leque or lak, 100,000 (dīnārs); and the tomān (see TOMAUN), which does not appear here, is 10,000 (dīnārs).

c. 1300.—“They went to the Kāfir’s tent, killed him, and came back into the town, whence they carried off money belonging to the Sultan amounting to 12 laks. The lak is a sum of 100,000 (silver) dīnārs, equivalent to 10,000 Indian gold dīnārs.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 106.

c. 1340.—“The Sultan distributes daily two laks in alms, never less; a sum of which the equivalent in money of Egypt and Syria would be 160,000 pieces of silver.”—Shihābuddīn Dimishki, in Notes and Exts., xiii. 192.

In these examples from Pinto the word is used apart from money, in the Malay form, but not in the Malay sense of 10,000:

c. 1540.—“The old man desiring to satisfy Antonio de Faria’s demand, Sir, said he . . . the chronicles of those times affirm, how in only four yeares and an half sixteen Lacazaas (lacasá) of men were slain, every Lacazaa containing an hundred thousand.”—Pinto (orig. cap. xlv.) in Cogan, p. 53.

c. 1546.—“. . . he ruined in 4 months space all the enemies countries, with such a destruction of people as, if credit may be given to our histories . . . there died fifty Laquesaas of persons.”—Ibid. p. 224.

1615.—“And the whole present was worth ten of their Leakes, as they call them; a Leake being 10,000 pounds sterling; the whole 100,000 pounds sterling.”—Coryat’s Letters from India (Crudities, iii. f. 25v).

1616.—“He received twenty lecks of roupies towards his charge (two hundred thousand pounds sterling).”—Sir T. Roe, reprint, p. 35; [Hak. Soc. i. 201, and see i. 95, 183, 238].

1651.—“Yeder Lac is hondert duysend.”—Rogierius, 77.

c. 1665.—“Il faut cent mille roupies pour faire un lek, cent mille leks pour faire un courou, cent mille courous pour faire un padan, et cent mille padan pour faire un nil.”—Thevenot, v. 54.

1673.—“In these great Solemnities, it is usual for them to set it around with Lamps to the number of two or three Leaques, which is so many hundred thousand in our account.”—Fryer, [p. 104, reading Lecques].

1684.—“They have by information of the servants dug in severall places of the house, where they have found great summes of money. Under his bed were found Lacks 4½. In the House of Office two Lacks. They in all found Ten Lacks already, and make no doubt but to find more.”—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 145].

1692.—“. . . a lack of Pagodas. . . .”—In Wheeler, i. 262.

1747.—“The Nabob and other Principal Persons of this Country are of such an extreme lacrative (sic) Disposition, and . . . are so exceedingly avaritious, occasioned by the large Proffers they have received from the French, that nothing less than Lacks will go near to satisfy them.”—Letter from Ft. St. David to the Court, May 2 (MS. Records in India Office).

1778.—“Sir Matthew Mite will make up the money already advanced in another name, by way of future mortgage upon his estate, for the entire purchase, 5 lacks of roupies.”—Footte, The Nabob, Act I. sc. i.

1785.—“Your servants have no Trade in this country; neither do you pay them high wages, yet in a few years they return to England with many lacs of pagodas.”—Nabob of Arcot, in Burke’s Speech on his Debts, Works, iv. 18.

1833.—“Tout le reste (et dans le reste il y a des intendants riches de plus de vingt laks) s’assied par terre.”—Jacquemont, Correspond. ii. 120.

1879.—“In modern times the only numbers in practical use above ‘thousands’ are laks (‘lac’ or ‘lakh’) and koṭi (‘crore’); and an Indian sum is wont to be pointed thus: 123, 45, 67, 890, to signify 123 crores, 45 laks, + 67 thousand, eight hundred and ninety.”—Whitney, Sansk. Grammar, 161.

The older writers, it will be observed (c. 1600-1620), put the lakh at £10,000; Hamilton (c. 1700) puts it at £12,500; Williamson (c. 1810) at the same; then for many years it stood again as the equivalent of £10,000; now (1880) it is little more than £8000; [now (1901) about £6666].

LACKERAGE. (See KHIRAJ.)

[c. 1780.—“To every plate are set down two glasses; one pyramidal (like hobnob glasses in England) for Loll Shrub (scilicet, claret); the other a common sized wineglass for whatever beverage is most agreeable.”—Diary of Mrs. Fay, in Busteed, Echoes, 123.]

LALLA, s. P.—H. lālā. In Persia this word seems to be used for a kind of domestic tutor; now for a male nurse, or as he would be called in India, ‘child’s bearer.’ In N. India it is usually applied to a native clerk writing the vernacular, or to a respectable merchant. [For the Pers. usage see Blochmann, Ain, i. 426 note.]

[1765.—“Amongst the first to be considered, I would recommend Juggut Seet, and one Gurdy Loll.”—Verelst, App. 218.

[1841.—“Where there are no tigers, the Lalla (scribe) becomes a shikaree.”—Society in India, ii. 176.]

LAMA, s. A Tibetan Buddhist monk. Tibet. bLama (b being silent). The word is sometimes found written Llama; but this is nonsense. In fact it seems to be a popular confusion, arising from the name of the S. American quadruped which is so spelt. See quotation from Times below.

c. 1590.—“Fawning Court doctors . . . said it was mentioned in some holy books that men used to live up to the age of 1000 years . . . and in Thibet there were even now a class of Lāmahs or Mongolian devotees, and recluses, and hermits that live 200 years and more. . . .”—Badaoni, quoted by Blochmann, Ain, i. 201.

1664.—“This Ambassador had in his suit a Physician, which was said to be of the Kingdom of Lassa, and of the Tribe Lamy or Lama, which is that of the men of the Law in that country, as the Brahmans are in the Indies . . . he related of his great Lama that when he was old, and ready to die, he assembled his council, and declared to them that now he was passing into the Body of a little child lately born. . . .”—Bernier, E.T. 135; [ed. Constable, 424].

c. 1818.—

“The Parliament of Thibet met—

The little Lama, called before it,
Did there and then his whipping get,
And, as the Nursery Gazette
Assures us, like a hero bore it.”

T. Moore, The Little Grand Lama.

1876.—“ . . . Hastings . . . touches on the analogy between Tibet and the high valley of Quito, as described by De la Condamine, an analogy which Mr. Markham brings out in interesting detail. . . . But when he enlarges on the wool which is a staple of both countries, and on the animals producing it, he risks confirming in careless readers that popular impression which might be expressed in the phraseology of Fluelen—“’Tis all one; ’tis alike as my fingers is to my fingers, and there is Llamas in both.”—Rev. of Markham's Tibet, in Times, May 15.

The passage last quoted is in jesting vein, but the following is serious and delightful:—

1879.—“The landlord prostrated himself as reverently, if not as lowly, as a Peruvian before his Grand Llama.”—Patty's Dream, a novel reviewed in the Academy, May 17.

LAMASERY, LAMASERIE, s. This is a word, introduced apparently by the French R. C. Missionaries, for a lama convent. Without being positive, I would say that it does not represent any Oriental word (e.g. compound of lami and serai), but is a factitious French word analogous to nonnerie, vacherie, laiterie, &c.

[c. 1844.—“According to the Tartars, the Lamasery of the Five Towers is the best place you can be buried in.”—Huc, Travels in Tartary, i. 78.]

LAMBALLIE, LOMBALLIE, LOMBARDIE, LUMBANAH, &c., s. Dakh. Hind. Lāmbārd, Mahr. Lambān, with other forms in the languages of the Peninsula. [Platts connects the name with Skt. lamba, ‘long, tall’; the Madras Gloss. with Skt. lampata, ‘greedy.’] A wandering tribe of dealers in grain, salt, &c., better known as *Banjārd*s (see BRINJARRY). As an Anglo-Indian word this is now obsolete. It was perhaps a corruption of Lubhāna, the name of one of the great clans or divisions of the Banjārās. [Another suggestion made is that the name is derived from their business of carrying salt (Skt. lavana); see Crooke, Tribes of N.W.P. i. 158.]

1756.—“The army was constantly supplied . . . by bands of people called Lamballis, peculiar to the Deccan, who are constantly moving up and down the country, with their flocks, and contract to furnish the armies in the field.”—Orme, ii. 102.

1785.—“What you say of the scarcity of grain in your army, notwithstanding your having a cutwāl (see COTWAL), and so many Lumbānehs with you, has astonished us.”—Letters of Tippoo, 49.

LANCHARA, s. A kind of small vessel often mentioned in the Portuguese histories of the 16th and 17th centuries. The derivation is probably Malay lanchār, ‘quick, nimble.’ [Mr. Skeat writes: “The real Malay form is Lanchar-an, which is regularly formed from Malay lanchār, ‘swift,’ and lanchara I believe to be a Port. form of lanchar-an, as lanchara could not possibly, in Malay, be formed from lanchār, as has hitherto been implied or suggested.”]

c. 1535.—“In questo paese di Cambaia (read Camboja) vi sono molti fiumi, nelli quali vi sono li nauili detti Lancharas, cō li quali vanno nauigando la costa di Siam. . . .”—Sommario de' Regni, &c., in Ramusio, i. f. 336.

c. 1539.—“This King (of the Batas) understanding that I had brought him a letter and a Present from the Captain of Malaca, caused me to be entertained by the Xabundar (see SHABUNDER). . . . This General, accompanied with five Lanchares and twelve Ballons, came to me to the Port where I rode at anchor.”—Pinto, E.T. p. 81.

LANDWIND, s. Used in the south of India. A wind which blows seaward during the night and early morning. [The dangerous effects of it are described in Madras Gloss. s.v.] In Port. Terrenho.

1561.—“Correndo a costa com terrenhos.”—Correa, Lendas, I. i. 115.

[1598.—“The East winds beginne to blow from off the land into the seas, whereby they are called Terreinhs.”—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 234.

[1612.—“Send John Dench . . . that in the morning he may go out with the land-torne and return with the seatorne.”—Danvers, Letters, i. 206.]

1644.—“And as it is between monsoon and monsoon (monsam) the wind is quite uncertain only at the beginning of summer. The N.W prevails more than any other wind . . . and at the end of it begin the land winds (terrenhos) from midnight to about noon, and these are E. winds.”—Bocarro, MS.

1673.—“. . . we made for the Land, to gain the Land Breezes. They begin about Midnight, and hold till Noon, and are by the Portugals named Terrhenoes.”—Fryer, 23.

[1773.—See the account in Ives, 76.]

1838.—“We have had some very bad weather for the last week; furious land-wind, very fatiguing and weakening. . . . Everything was so dried up, that when I attempted to walk a few yards towards the beach, the grass crunched under my feet like snow.”—Letters from Madras, 199-200.

LANGASQUE, n.p. The most usual old form for the Japanese city which we now call Nagasaki (see Sainsbury, passim).

1611.—“After two or three dayes space a Iesuite came vnto vs from a place called Langesacke, to which place the Carake of Macao is yeerely wont to come.”—W. Adams, in Purchas, i. 126.

1613.—The Journal of Capt. John Saris has both Nangasaque and Langasaque.—Ibid. 366.

1614.—“Geve hym counsell to take heed of one Pedro Guzano, a papist Christian, whoe is his hoste at Miaco; for a lyinge fryre (or Jesuit) tould Mr. Peacock at Langasaque that Capt. Adams was dead in the howse of the said Guzano, which now I know is a lye per letters I received. . . .”—Cocks, to Wickham, in Diary, &c., ii. 284.

1618.—“It has now com to passe, which before I feared, that a company of rich usurers have gotten this sentence against us, and com doune together every yeare to Langasaque and this place, and have allwais byn accustomed to buy by the pancado (as they call it), or whole sale, all the goodes which came in the carick from Amacan, the Portingales having no prevelegese as we have.”—The same to the E.I. Co., ii. 207-8.

Two years later Cocks changes his spelling and adopts Nangasaque (Ibid. 300 and to the end).

LAN JOHN, LANGIANNE, &c., n.p. Such names are applied in the early part of the 17th century to the Shan or Laos State of Luang Prabang on the Mekong. Lan-chan is one of its names signifying in Siamese, it is said, ‘a million of elephants.’ It is known to the Burmese by the same name (Len-Shen). It was near this place that the estimable French traveller Henri Mouhot died, in 1861.

1587.—“I went from Pegu to Iamahey (see JANGOMAY), which is in the country of the Langiannes; it is five and twentie dayes iourney North-east from Pegu.”—Fitch, in Hakl. ii.

c. 1598.—“Thus we arrived at Lanchan, the capital of the Kingdom (Lao) where the King resides. It is a Kingdom of great extent, but thinly inhabited, because it has been frequently devastated by Pegu.”—De Morga, 98.

1617.—“The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangoma (JANGOMAY) arrived at the city of Judea . . . and brought great store of merchandize.”—Sainsbury, ii. 90.

1663.—“Entre tant et de si puissans Royaumes du dernier Orient, desquels on n’a presque iamais entendu parler en Europe, il y en a vn qui se nomme Lao, et plus proprement le Royaume des Langiens . . . le Royaume n’a pris son nom que du grand nombre d’Elephants qui s’y rencontrent: de vray ce mot de Langiens signifie proprement, milliers d’Elephants.”—Marini, H. Nouvelle et Curieuse des Royaumes de Tunquin et de Lao (Fr. Tr., Paris, 1666), 329, 337.

1668.—Lanchang appears in the Map of Siam in De la Loubère's work, but we do not find it in the book itself.

c. 1692.—“Laos est situé sous le même Climat que Tonquin; c'est un royaume grand et puissant, séparé des Etats voisins par des forets et par des deserts. . . . Les principales villes sont Landjam et Tsiamaja.”—Kaempfer, H. du Japon, i. 22-3.

LANTEA, s. A swift kind of boat frequently mentioned by F. M. Pinto and some early writers on China; but we are unable to identify the word.

c. 1540.—“. . . that . . . they set sail from Liampoo for Malaca, and that being advanced as far as the Isle of Sumbor they had been set upon by a Pyrat, a Guzarat by Nation, called Coia Acem, who had three Junks, and four Lanteas. . . .”—Pinto, E.T. p. 69.

c. 1560.—“There be other lesser shipping than Iunkes, somewhat long, called Bancones, they place three Oares on a side, and rowe very well, and load a great deal of goods; there be other lesse called Lanteas, which doe rowe very swift, and beare a good burthen also: and these two sorts of Ships, viz., Bancones and Lanteas, because they are swift, the theeues do commonly vse.”—Caspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 174.

LAOS, n.p. A name applied by the Portuguese to the civilised people who occupied the inland frontier of Burma and Siam, between those countries on the one hand and China and Tongking on the other; a people called by the Burmese Shans, a name which we have in recent years adopted. They are of the same race of Thai to which the Siamese belong, and which extends with singular identity of manners and language, though broken into many separate communities, from Assam to the Malay Peninsula. The name has since been frequently used as a singular, and applied as a territorial name to the region occupied by this people immediately to the North of Siam. There have been a great number of separate principalities in this region, of which now one and now another predominated and conquered its neighbours. Before the rise of Siam the most important was that of which Sakotai was the capital, afterwards represented by Xieng-mai, the Zimmé of the Burmese and the Jango-may of some old English documents. In later times the chief States were Muang Luang Praban (see LAN JOHN) and Vien-shan, both upon the Mekong.

It would appear from Lieut. Macleod's narrative, and from Garnier, that the name of Lao is that by which the branch of these people on the Lower Mekong, i.e. of those two States, used to designate themselves. Muang Praban is still quasi independent; Vien-Shan was annexed with great cruelties by Siam, c. 1828.

1553.—“Of silver of 11 dinheiros alloy he (Albuquerque) made only a kind of money called Malaquezes, which silver came thither from Pegu, whilst from Siam came a very pure silver of 12 dinheiros assay, procured from certain people called Laos, lying to the north of these two kingdoms.”—Barros, II. vi. 6.

1553.—“. . . certain very rugged mountain ranges, like the Alps, inhabited by the people called Gueos who fight on horseback, and with whom the King of Siam is continually at war. They are near him only on the north, leaving between the two the people called Laos, who encompass this Kingdom of Siam, both on the North, and on the East along the river Mecon . . . and on the south adjoin these Laos the two Kingdoms of Camboja and Choampa (see CHAMPA), which are on the sea-board. These Laos . . . though they are lords of so great territories, are all subject to this King of Siam, though often in rebellion against him.”—Ibid. III. ii. 5.

“Three Kingdoms at the upper part of these, are those of the Laos, who (as we have said) obey Siam through fear: the first of these is called Jangoma (see JANGO-MAY), the chief city of which is called Chiamay . . . the second Chancray (Chencran): the third Lanchaa (see LAN JOHN) which is below the others, and adjoins the Kingdom of Cacho, or Cauchichina. . . .”—Ibid.

c. 1560.—“These Laos came to Camboia, downe a River many daies Iournie, which they say to have his beginning in China as many others which runne into the Sea of India; it hath eight, fifteene, and twentie fathome water, as myselfe saw by experience in a great part of it; it passeth through manie vnknowne and desart Countries of great Woods and Forests where there are innumerable Elephants, and many Buffes . . . and certayne beastes which in that Countrie they call Badas (see ABADA).”—Gaspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 169.

c. 1598.—“. . . I offered to go to the Laos by land, at my expense, in search of the King of Cambodia, as I knew that that was the road to go by. . . .”—Blas de Herman Gonzalez, in De Morga (E.T. by Hon. H. Stanley, Hak. Soc.), p. 97.

1641.—“Concerning the Land of the Louwen, and a Journey made thereunto by our Folk in Anno 1641” (&c.).—Valentijn, III. Pt. ii. pp. 50 seqq.

1766.—“Les peuples de Lao, nos voisins, n'admettent ni la question ni les peines arbitraires . . . ni les horribles supplices qui sont parmi nous en usage; mais aussi nous les regardons comme de barbares. . . . Toute l'Asie convient que nous dansons beaucoup mieux qu'eux.”—Voltaire, Dialogue XXI., André des Couches à Siam.

LAR, n.p. This name has had several applications.

(a). To the region which we now call Guzerat, in its most general application. In this sense the name is now quite obsolete; but it is that used by most of the early Arab geographers. It is the Λαρικὴ of Ptolemy; and appears to represent an old Skt. name Lāta, adj. Lataka, or Latika. [“The name Lāta appears to be derived from some local tribe, perhaps the Lattas, who, as r and l are commonly used for each other, may possibly be the well-known Rashtrakūtas since their great King Amoghavarsha (A.D. 851-879) calls the name of the dynasty Ratta.”—Bombay Gazetteer, I. pt. i. 7.]

c. A.D. 150.—“Τῆς δὲ Ἰνδοσκυθίας τὰ ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν τὰ μὲν ἀπὸ θαλάσσης κατέχει ἡ Λαρικὴ χώρα, ἐν ᾗ μεσόγειοι ἀπὸ μὲν δύσεως τοῦ Ναμάδου ποταμοῦ πόλις ἦδε. . . . Βαρύγαζα ἐμπόριον.”—Ptolemy, VII. ii. 62.

c. 940.—“On the coast, e.g. at Saimūr, at Sūbāra, and at Tāna, they speak Lārī; these provinces give their name to the Sea of Lār (Lārawī) on the coast of which they are situated.”—Maṣ'ūdī, i. 381.

c. 1020.—“ . . . to Kach the country producing gum (mokl, i.e. Bdellium, q.v.), and bārdrūd (?) . . . to Somnāt, fourteen (para-sangs); to Kambāya, thirty . . . to Tāna five. There you enter the country of Lārān, where is Jaimūr” (i.q. Saimūr, see CHOUL).—Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i. 66.

c. 1190.—“Udaya the Parmār mounted and came. The Dors followed him from Lār. . . .”—The Poem of Chand Bardai, E.T. by Beames, in Ind. Antiq. i. 275.

c. 1330.—“A certain Traveller says that Tāna is a city of Guzerat (Juzrāt) in its eastern part, lying west of Malabar (Munibār); whilst Ibn Sa'yid says that it is the furthest city of Lār (Al-Lār), and very famous among traders.”—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, p. 188.

(b). To the Delta region of the Indus, and especially to its western part. Sir H. Elliot supposes the name in this use, which survived until recently, to be identical with the preceding, and that the name had originally extended continuously over the coast, from the western part of the Delta to beyond

Bombay (see his Historiana, i. 378). We have no means of deciding this question (see LARRY BUNDER).

c. 1820.—“Dīwal . . . was reduced to ruins by a Muhammedan invasion, and another site chosen to the eastward. The new town still went by the same name . . . and was succeeded by Lārī Bandar or the port of Lār, which is the name of the country forming the modern delta, particularly the western part.”—M'Murdo, in J.R. As. Soc. i. 29.

(c). To a Province on the north of the Persian Gulf, with its capital.

c. 1220.—Lar is erroneously described by Yakūt as a great island between Sirāf and Kish. But there is no such island.* It is an extensive province of the continent. See Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, p. 501.

c. 1330.—“We marched for three days through a desert . . . and then arrived at Lār, a big town having springs, considerable streams, and gardens, and fine bazars. We lodged in the hermitage of the pious Shaikh Abu Dulaf Muhammad. . . .”—Ibn Batuta, ii. 240.

c. 1487.—“Retorneing alongest the coast, forneagainst Ormuz there is a towne called Lar, a great and good towne of merchaundise, about ij^ml. houses. . . .”—Joasfa Barbaro, old E.T. (Hak. Soc.) 80.

[c. 1590.—“Lār borders on the mountains of Great Tibet. To its north is a lofty mountain which dominates all the surrounding country, and the ascent of which is arduous. . . .”—Āin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 363.]

1553.—“These benefactions the Kings of Ormuz . . . pay to this day to a mosque which that Caciz (see CASIS) had made in a district called Hongez of Sheikh Doniar, adjoining the city of Lara, distant from Ormuz over 40 leagues.”—Barros, II. ii. 2.

1602.—“This man was a Moor, a native of the Kingdom of Lara, adjoining that of Ormuz: his proper name was Cufo, but as he was a native of the Kingdom of Lara he took a surname from the country, and called himself Cufo Larym.”—Couto, IV. vii. 6.

1622.—“Lar, as I said before, is capital of a great province or kingdom, which till our day had a prince of its own, who rightfully or wrongfully reigned there absolutely; but about 23 years since, for reasons rather generous than covetous, as it would seem, it was attacked by Abbas K. of Persia, and the country forcibly taken. . . . Now Lar is the seat of a Sultan dependent on the Khan of Shiraz. . . .”—P. della Valle, ii. 322.

1727.—“And 4 Days Journey within Land, is the City of Laar, which according to their fabulous tradition is the Burying-

* It is possible that the island called Shaikh Shu'aib, which is off the coast of Lār, and not far from Sirāf, may be meant. Barbosa also mentions Lār among the islands in the Gulf subject to the K. of Ormuz (p. 87).
